of the series of concerts here ston Symphony Orchestra, in Hall last night, attracted a ge and brilliant audience. In ering were President Faunce of University, Mr. Harry Parsons Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Metcalf, Mr. Theodore Francis Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, er Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriett M. Smith, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Buxton, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. Lacey Baker, Miss Cecelia Lacey Baker, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Carr, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Irons, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. Seth K. Gifford, Miss Gifford, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Edith Nichols, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar J. Lowenstein, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. F. W. Matteson, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Sprague, Mr. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Dwyer, the Misses Vaughn, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson.

(clarinette), the quail (oboe), and the the ce

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913
Establ

[illegible] Symphonie-Konzert.

Das zweite Programm Dr. Muck's war unbedingt intereſſanter, als das des Eröffnungskonzerts, denn es enthielt wirkſame Kontraſte und innere Harmonie. Nach der lebendigen Fünften Symphonie Glazounoff's kam Smetana's lebensſprühende „Verkaufte Braut"-Ouverture, ſodann César Franck's ſymphoniſches Poem „Les Eolides" und zum Schluß Dvorak's [illegible] „Huſſitska"-Ouverture. Alſo ſlaviſch mit franzöſiſchem Einſchlag, was ſich ſehr pikant und vielfarbig ausnahm.

Glazounoff dürfte man nach meinem Empfinden häufiger in unſeren Konzertſälen begegnen, als es gegenwärtig der Fall iſt, denn ich halte ihn für den bedeutendſten der lebenden muſikaliſchen Ruſſen. Nicht nur ſeine gelegentlich allerdings etwas weichliche Melodik hat Phantaſie, dieſe Eigenſchaft zeichnet auch ſein reiches kontrapunktiſches Können aus, das ſich gelegentlich überreich giebt, unter welcher ſcheinbaren Ueberarbeitung der näher Hinhorchende jedoch die überſichtliche Gruppirung und die formale Abrundung nicht überſehen kann. Pruntvoll iſt Glazounoff's Orcheſterkleid, die reiche, oft national angehauchte Klangfarbe, welche ſo überzeugend Optimismus predigt.

Unverkennbar iſt bei dieſem Komponiſten der Einfluß Wagner's, der ſich häufig bis zu unabweislichen Zitaten verdichtet, wie
denn im erſten Satz der geſtern g
Fünften Symphonie das Wag
S[illegible]motiv immer [illegible]eder in den ſten Einkleidungen ſpuckt. Dieſem zenden Satz gege[illegible] wandelt da
[illegible]che graziö[illegible] Sc[illegible] den Bahn
Ro[illegible]ntik, eine Art [illegible]mernachts in dem [illegible] Holzblä[illegible] die ne Rolle zufällt. Der dritte Satz brin ſchärfſten Kontraſte, die von ſla
Melancholie üb[illegible] freudigere Töne
Verzweiflungslaute ſich zu einer faſ teren Entſagung durchringt. Das iſt faſt orgiaſtiſch in ſeinen reichen ſterkünſten und dem mitreißenden Sch der Synkope, gelegentlich etwas allzu mend, aber wirkungsvoll. Muck hat ſen Schluß geſtern ſehr feinſinnig etwas abgedämpft. Ganz entzückend legte er das Scherzo hin, brennendes Kolorit verlieh er dem erſten und dritten Satz. An ſeinem Meiſterorcheſter hatte er wieder ein ganz einzigartiges Inſtrument.

Das kam uns in der unwiderſtehlich geiſtreich und friſch pulſirend geſpielten Smetana'ſchen Ouverture zur „Verkauften Braut" wieder ſo recht zum Bewußtſein. Es lag eine ſchier Mahler'ſche Friſche und Urſprünglichkeit über dieſen Klängen. Dagegen hatten die Franck'ſchen „Eoliden" keinen leichten Stand, aber das wundervolle harmoniſche und kontrapunktiſche Gewebe des Stückes kam klar und deutlich, wenn auch nicht frei von einer gewiſſen Monotonie der Klangfarbe, zum Ausdruck.

Von der das Programm abſchließenden Dvorak'ſchen „Huſſitska"-Ouverture hat Hanslick einmal geſagt, daß ſie „ſo fanatiſch klinge, als ob ſie mit Aexten, Senſen und Morgenſternen inſtrumentirt worden wäre".

Hier ließ Muck geſtern alle Zügel los, und wie ein edler, feuriger Renner, der die Luft der Freiheit wieder athmet, ſtürmte das Orcheſter dahin. Die langſame Einleitung war in ihrer tiefen Schwermuth der wirkſame Grund, von der ſich die Wildheit des Allegro abhob. Das Orcheſter mußte mit ſeinem Führer den begeiſterten Beifall wieder theilen. Diesmal ließ ſich auch der vielverdiente Konzertmeiſter, Herr Witek, nicht lange bitten, mitzuthun, zudem Muck Miene machte, ihn ſonſt höchſtperſönlich emporzuziehen. H.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date
Esta

ORCHESTRAL RIVALRIES

Effect of Personnel Upon the Work of These Musical Organizations.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—The letter of your correspondent "X" seems to have aroused, and rightly, the resentment of more than one music-lover of Philadelphia. The present writer has read with interest two answers to the afore-mentioned letter appearing in your columns, but it seems to me that the presentation of a few facts will go further toward refuting the statements made in the uncalled-for attack upon the Philadelphia Orchestra than even the best arguments.

Among the musicians now composing the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are comparatively few men who saw the first years of its existence, and these few do not occupy first places. For example, the concertmaster has only occupied his position for three or four years. The first 'cellist, who is also assistant conductor, is a very young man who only entered the ranks of the orchestra last season. One of Boston's best players in former years now holds the position of first flute in the Philadelphia Orchestra, while the Boston Orchestra has chosen for its first trumpet a former player of the Philadelphia organization. All in all, the writer has been informed that there have been about 20 changes in the personnel of the Boston Or[illegible] the last two years alone, while [illegible] yet produced a Colonel Higginson, a man who, realizing the importance of a great symphony orchestra as one of the finest art monuments a city can have, would be willing to so place the orchestra financially that its future would be assured. But Philadelphia should realize and appreciate the fine work done in this respect by a number of men who have been striving for 14 years to bring about a great orchestra, and with success.

---

The excellence of the Boston Orchestra rests entirely, as does the success of any other orchestra, upon the individual qualities of the player, the rehearsing done for each performance, and upon the conductor. No matter how important the individual playing of each man in the orchestra may be, an orchestra is, after all, a great instrument upon which the conductor plays. The interpretation of the work is his interpretation, the ensemble is the result of his thoroughness in rehearsing and the firmness of his beat; every detail of phrasing, coloring and tonal quality, provided the men are capable of giving it, are the result of his demands at rehearsal or of the eloquence of his gestures and general magnetism at performances. Given an orchestra composed of players of a high rank, such as we have in Philadelphia, and a conductor who can accomplish what Mr. Stokowski has done, there is no reason in the world why the Philadelphia Orchestra cannot bear comparison with any orchestra, without exception. The musicians composing the Philadelphia Orchestra are "picked men," men who have played under the greatest leaders in Europe, men who stand in the front rank.

As to conductors, any conductor who ca give the inspired reading of works of a schools as Mr. Stokowski has done, showi his complete grasp of each work not on by his illuminative interpretation, but by h phenomenal feats of memory, conducting co cert after concert without a score (a recc only equaled by Toscanini), must be given place among the really great conductors the world, for his achievements mean genius

A. F. L

Philadelphia, November 8, 1913.

TELEGRAPH
From
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Estab

By PHILIP H. GOEPP.

AN INTERESTING episode occurred this week in the field of comment on the musical events, which have been of unusual frequency and brilliancy. Comment we must have, after all, which does not at all necessarily imply carping criticism. But it will never do to go to concerts open-mouthed with admiration, hearing nothing but the perfection we were prepared for by the fame of the performers. True criticism is at once the essence of right enjoyment and the vital test and support of the best performance.

After the opening concert of the week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of our leading daily contemporaries ventured to suggest some temperate criticism, with a remark on the visitors' repetition of the local programs. Whereupon an indignant subscriber of the good, old, respectable kind protests in high dudgeon, and speaks with a quite unnecessary comparison of our own "painstaking" orchestra as utterly different from the "superb" visiting players.

The interesting point is that here is evidently an expression of purely prejudiced admiration without an ounce of real critical opinion. The Boston Orchestra is a most welcome visitor; it cannot be too highly praised, both for its own excellence and for the benefit which it has conferred in spreading the best music and in setting an example for other cities. But we must, nevertheless, go to these concerts as intelligent listeners, not in a state of idolatrous worship. Even a great orchestra does not always play perfectly, and it is the more certain to lapse if there is no critical test. The plain fact of Monday's concert is that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was badly played, at too slow a pace and with a consistent absence of the right pulse and spring in the rapid movements. It was simply not the Seventh Symphony at all as it sprang from Beethoven's brain. Moreover, twice in the slow movement (which was otherwise exquisite) the high trumpet gave an ear-splitting sound that marred the poetic effect. Had this happened with our own players we may imagine the outraged feelings of these same contented admirers.

There are, unfortunately, a good many music lovers in our town who wait for the famous visiting players, and then go with a patent expression upon their faces, which says, "Now, here is a real orchestra." Nay, there are some good people who will not go at all to the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra on some mysterious "principle" of their own.

These columns are not devoted to a blind defence of local art; they are committed solely to an equal, independent criticism of all performances by whomsoever given, famous or obscure. The ideal of such an aim would be the instant discovery of an unknown genius. But one truth stands out clearly in the prospective view of Philadelphia's music, and that is that she can never come into her own, she can never realize her artistic self, if her productions are ever to be treated by her own citizens with a disparaging condescension which is committed against a hearty ap[illegible] of the true merits.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 10
Estab

Three orchestral concerts, the Longy entrance into New York, a song recital, Sousa at the Hippodrome, and the Century Sunday night concert, have occupied the attention of concert-goers in the last two days.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave its second concert Saturday afternoon, when a programme more in keeping with present-day tendencies than that of Thursday evening was given. The Glazounow symphony in B flat major was played with marvelous color and beauty of tone; Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" showed the extraordinary virtuosity of the organization, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," as also Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," sustained the modern spirit to the close. The audience which filled Carnegie Hall lavished unrestrained enthusiasm upon the great orchestra and its conductor.

In the eve[illegible]ngy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought for the first time to New York his organization, which for years has been an important factor in its home city. Aeolian Hall held a large and representative audience, which manifested the deepest interest in Mr. Longy and his associates, who gave an unusual and delightful programme. In addition to a string quartet, a harp and a quintet of woodwinds forming the combination, a very able pianist, Carolyn Beebe, assisted in the performance of an octet by Paul Juon, a Russian composer, and an introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet and woods by Maurice Ravel, the French composer. In this, as well as in the afternoon with the orchestra, the new harp player of both organizations Alfred Holy, showed his great skill.

The Ravel composition is one of the most beautiful works offered recently. The ensemble of the players was admirable. There was no monotony of color. The musical line was somewhat broken by the introduction of a Boston soprano, Marie Sundelius, who, with A de Voto at the piano, sang "Ballade," by Debussy; an aria from Aubert's "Le Foret Bleue," and "Des Harpes dans le Soir," by one Henry Woollett, whose writing is more French than his name. The singer has a high, clear, ringing voice, too metallic, perhaps, for the style of songs she sang.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
NOV 10 1913
Date
Estal

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Longy Chamber Music.

When the Longy Modern Chamber Music Society gave its first concert Saturday night at Aeolian Hall, sympathetic chords must have vibrated in Boston, for the audience evidently had been recruited from Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays, and the society bears the hallmark of that institution, its members finding their larger employment under the baton of Dr. Muck. They are: J. Theodorowicz, violin; A. Bak, violin; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, violoncello; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Longy, oboe; G. Grisez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn; P. Sadony, bassoon.

Paul Juon's octet, op. 27, has no parts for flute or second violin, and the society's pianist was replaced on this occasion by Carolyn Beebe, of New York. In ancient chamber concerts it was not unusual for the harpsichord to give the time as well as the pitch to the other performers. It is, perhaps, a touch of modernity that such direction as may now be needed should fall to oboe, and in this respect Georges Longy acquits himself admirably. But in ancient chamber music, Beethoven, doubling an octet, found material for a symphony, and in the romantic period Schumann found in a quartet of strings with piano ample means for the expression of his grandest conceptions. And since Juon's work is cast in sonata form, which is no more capable of further improvement in these days than sonnet form, it must be confessed that his harmonies are thin, his invention poor, and his thematic treatment chiefly of interest in revealing contrasted instrumental effects instead of developments in which they should be blended.

The closing number was Maurice Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp solo, played by Arthur Holy, with string quartet, flute, and clarinet accompaniment. Sandwiched between these works were three French songs, admirably interpreted by Mrs. Marie Sundelius. Despite the number of chamber-music organizations which find support in New York, there is room for more, especially for musicians of the ability of those associated with Mr. Longy in this new venture, but it may be suggested, in view of the first programme, and of the wealth of music from which a choice may be made hereafter, that there is no need of over-emphasis on the word "modern."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1913
Date
Estal 1884

NEW MUSICAL ORGANIZATION

Only those who really love the best and highest in music appreciate chamber music, but in a huge city like New York there are audiences of every sort, so the lovers of the classic in music have a rare treat in store for them in the series of concerts to be given by the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, which made its debut on Saturday night last at Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. The head of this new body of musicians is M. Georges Longy, the talented oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his aim is to produce works in which string and wind instruments unite, and the output of the modern school. There are twenty men in the new orchestra and they have had the advantage of playing frequently together in one of the best orchestras in the world, so, at the outset, they have the great attribute of a good ensemble. The opening number was an octet, by Paul Juon, for violin, viola, cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The assisting artist was Carolyn Beebe, the pianist, whose admirable work in ensemble and solo playing has been known here for several seasons. The composition did not merit the very careful preparations it had received on the part of the players. It was interesting in a way, but not absorbing. Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo, with string quartet, clarinet and flute solo work, done by A. Hoby, showed the nice balance and delicacy of shading which these artists can produce. The music was, of course, of the highest order, but the selections were, to a mixed audience of musical people, what Paul Verlaine's poems are to a general reading public, bizarre and unusual. However, the organization is a welcome one, and a large audience stamped its approval. Mme. Marie Sundelins, soprano, sang some interesting modern songs, Debussy's "Ballade," "Le Reve du petit chaperon rouge," by Aubert, and "Des Harpes dans les Soirs," by Woollett. The songs were in the most modern style, and Mme. Sundelins seems to have a complete understanding of this school. She was very well received. A number of prominent women have made these concerts possible.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 5,

Dr. Muck's New Work

WHILE Dr. Muck was at work in Boston last winter and last spring he received several invitations to conduct at "festival performances" of opera and in "festival concerts" in various cities of Germany and Austria in the course of the summer. Sundry opera houses also invited him to conduct at them "as guest." In each instance he declined, because he wished to escape professional engagements through the whole summer. Even Baireuth left him free since there was no festival there and consequently no performances of "Parsifal" for him to conduct according to his annual custom.

Before Dr. Muck returned to Boston last September he began to receive similar invitations for next summer, one of which he has accepted. Between Aug. 12 and Aug. 20 the new "Mozarteum" at Salzburg will be dedicated with festival concerts and festival performances of opera. The Mozarteum is a building that is both theatre and museum erected in Mozart's native city in his honor, largely through the efforts of Mme. Lehmann. She herself has arranged the festival. It will comprise three concerts of Mozart's orchestral music, one of his chamber music, a performance of "Don Giovanni" and a performance of "Il Seraglio." Dr. Muck will conduct in one of the orchestral concerts and in "Don Giovanni." Mr. Nikisch will lead in the other two orchestral concerts and Mr. Schalk of Vienna in "Il Seraglio." Mme. Lehmann is assembling the casts for both operas, and the orchestra throughout the festival will be the Philharmonic Society of Vienna.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913

[illegible] Symphonie-Konzert.

Das zweite Programm Dr. Muck's war unbedingt intereſſanter, als das des Eröffnungskonzerts, denn es enthielt wirkſame Kontraſte und innere Harmonie. Nach der lebendigen Fünften Symphonie Glazounoff's kam Smetana's lebensſprühende „Verkaufte Braut"-Ouverture, ſodann Céſar Franck's ſymphoniſches Poem „Les Eolides" und zum Schluß Dvorak's [illegible] „Huſſitska"-Ouverture. Alſo ſlaviſch mit franzöſiſchem Einſchlag, was ſich ſehr pikant und vielfarbig ausnahm.

Glazounoff dürfte man nach meinem Empfinden häufiger in unſeren Konzertſälen begegnen, als es gegenwärtig der Fall iſt, denn ich halte ihn für den bedeutendſten der lebenden muſikaliſchen Ruſſen. Nicht nur ſeine gelegentlich allerdings etwas weichliche Melodik hat Phantaſie, dieſe Eigenſchaft zeichnet auch ſein reiches kontrapunktiſches Können aus, das ſich gelegentlich überreich giebt, unter welcher ſcheinbaren Ueberarbeitung der näher Hinhorchende jedoch die überſichtliche Gruppirung und die formale Abrundung nicht überſehen kann. Prunkvoll iſt Glazounoff's Orcheſterkleid, die reiche, oft national angehauchte Klangfarbe, welche ſo überzeugend Optimismus predigt.

Unverkennbar iſt bei dieſem Komponiſten der Einfluß Wagner's, der ſich häufig bis zu unabweislichen Zitaten verdichtet, wie denn im erſten Satz der geſtern gehörten Fünften Symphonie das Wagner'ſche S[illegible]motiv immer wieder in den farbigſten Einkleidungen ſpuckt. Dieſem glänzenden Satz gege[illegible]r wandelt das zier[illegible]che graziöſ[illegible] Sc[illegible] den Bahnen der Ro[illegible]ntik, eine Art [illegible]mernachtstraum, in dem [illegible] Ho[illegible]zblä[illegible]n die neckiſchſte Rolle zufällt. Der dritte Satz bringt die ſchärfſten Kontraſte, die von ſlaviſcher Melancholie über freudigere Töne und Verzweiflungslaute ſich zu einer faſt heiteren Entſagung durchringt. Das Finale iſt faſt orgiaſtiſch in ſeinen reichen Orcheſterkünſten und dem mitreißenden Schwung der Synkope, gelegentlich etwas allzu lärmend, aber wirkungsvoll. Muck hat dieſen Schluß geſtern ſehr feinſinnig etwas abgedämpft. Ganz entzückend legte er das Scherzo hin, brennendes Kolorit verlieh er dem erſten und dritten Satz. An ſeinem Meiſterorcheſter hatte er wieder ein ganz einzigartiges Inſtrument.

Das kam uns in der unwiderſtehlich geiſtreich und friſch pulſirend geſpielten Smetana'ſchen Ouverture zur „Verkauften Braut" wieder ſo recht zum Bewußtſein. Es lag eine ſchier Mahler'ſche Friſche und Urſprünglichkeit über dieſen Klängen. Dagegen hatten die Franck'ſchen „Eoliden" keinen leichten Stand, aber das wundervolle harmoniſche und kontrapunktiſche Gewebe des Stückes kam klar und deutlich, wenn auch nicht frei von einer gewiſſen Monotonie der Klangfarbe, zum Ausdruck.

Von der das Programm abſchließenden Dvorak'ſchen „Huſſitska"-Ouverture hat Hanslick einmal geſagt, daß ſie „ſo fanatiſch klinge, als ob ſie mit Aexten, Senſen und Morgenſternen inſtrumentirt worden wäre".

Hier ließ Muck geſtern alle Zügel los, und wie ein edler, feuriger Renner, der die Luft der Freiheit wieder athmet, ſtürmte das Orcheſter dahin. Die langſame Einleitung war in ihrer tiefen Schwermuth der wirkſame Grund, von der ſich die Wildheit des Allegro abhob. Das Orcheſter mußte mit ſeinem Führer den begeiſterten Beifall wieder theilen. Diesmal ließ ſich auch der vielverdiente Konzertmeiſter, Herr Witek, nicht lange bitten, mitzuthun, zudem Muck Miene machte, ihn ſonſt höchſtperſönlich emporzuziehen. H.

---

not yet produced a Colonel Higginson, a man who, realizing the importance of a great symphony orchestra as one of the finest art monuments a city can have, would be willing to so place the orchestra financially that its future would be assured. But Philadelphia should realize and appreciate the fine work done in this respect by a number of men who have been striving for 14 years to bring about a great orchestra, and with success.

The excellence of the Boston Orchestra rests entirely, as does the success of any other orchestra, upon the individual qualities of the player, the rehearsing done for each performance, and upon the conductor. No matter how important the individual playing of each man in the orchestra may be, an orchestra is, after all, a great instrument upon which the conductor plays. The interpretation of the work is his interpretation, the ensemble is the result of his thoroughness in rehearsing and the firmness of his beat; every detail of phrasing, coloring and tonal quality, provided the men are capable of giving it, are the result of his demands at rehearsal or of the eloquence of his gestures and general magnetism at performances. Given an orchestra composed of players of a high rank, such as we have in Philadelphia, and a conductor who can accomplish what Mr. Stokowski has done, there is no reason in the world why the Philadelphia Orchestra cannot bear comparison with any orchestra, without exception. The musicians composing the Philadelphia Orchestra are "picked men," men who have played under the greatest leaders in Europe, men who stand in the front rank.

As to conductors, any conductor who can give the inspired reading of works of all schools as Mr. Stokowski has done, showing his complete grasp of each work not only by his illuminative interpretation, but by his phenomenal feats of memory, conducting concert after concert without a score (a record only equaled by Toscanini), must be given a place among the really great conductors of the world, for his achievements mean genius.

A. F. L.

ladelphia, November 8, 1913.

In the eve[illegible]gy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought for the first time to New York his organization, which for years has been an important factor in its home city. Aeolian Hall held a large and representative audience, which manifested the deepest interest in Mr. Longy and his associates, who gave an unusual and delightful programme. In addition to a string quartet, a harp and a quintet of woodwinds forming the combination, a very able pianist, Carolyn Beebe, assisted in the performance of an octet by Paul Juon, a Russian composer, and an introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet and woods by Maurice Ravel, the French composer. In this, as well as in the afternoon with the orchestra, the new harp player of both organizations Alfred Holy, showed his great skill.

The Ravel composition is one of the most beautiful works offered recently. The ensemble of the players was admirable. There was no monotony of color. The musical line was somewhat broken by the introduction of a Boston soprano, Marie Sundelius, who, with A de Voto at the piano, sang "Ballade," by Debussy; an aria from Aubert's "Le Foret Bleue," and "Des Harpes dans le Soir," by one Henry Woollett, whose writing is more French than his name. The singer has a high, clear, ringing voice, too metallic, perhaps, for the [illegible] of songs she sang.

ELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.

By PHILIP H. GOEPP.

N INTERESTING episode occurred this week in the field of comment on the musical events, which have been usual frequency and brilliancy. Com- we must have, after all, which does t all necessarily imply carping criti- But it will never do to go to con- open-mouthed with admiration, g nothing but the perfection we prepared for by the fame of the performers. True criticism is at once the essence of right enjoyment and the vital test and support of the best performance.

After the opening concert of the week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of our leading daily contemporaries ventured to suggest some temperate criticism, with a remark on the visitors' repetition of the local programs. Whereupon an indignant subscriber of the good, old, respectable kind protests in high dudgeon, and speaks with a quite unnecessary comparison of our own "painstaking" orchestra as utterly different from the "superb" visiting players.

The interesting point is that here is evidently an expression of purely prejudiced admiration without an ounce of real critical opinion. The Boston Orchestra is a most welcome visitor; it cannot be too highly praised, both for its own excellence and for the benefit which it has conferred in spreading the best music and in setting an example for other cities. But we must, nevertheless, go to these concerts as intelligent listeners, not in a state of idolatrous worship. Even a great orchestra does not always play perfectly, and it is the more certain to lapse if there is no critical test. The plain fact of Monday's concert is that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was badly played, at too slow a pace and with a consistent absence of the right pulse and spring in the rapid movements. It was simply not the Seventh Symphony at all as it sprang from Beethoven's brain. Moreover, twice in the slow movement (which was otherwise exquisite) the high trumpet gave an ear-splitting sound that marred the poetic effect. Had this happened with our own players we may imagine the outraged feelings of these same contented admirers.

There are, unfortunately, a good many music lovers in our town who wait for the famous visiting players, and then go with a patent expression upon their faces, which says, "Now, here is a real orchestra." Nay, there are some good people who will not go at all to the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra on some mysterious "principle" of their own.

These columns are not devoted to a blind defence of local art; they are committed solely to an equal, independent criticism of all performances by whomsoever given, famous or obscure. The ideal of such an aim would be the instant discovery of an unknown genius. But one truth stands out clearly in the prospective view of Philadelphia's music, and that is that she can never come into her own, she can never realize her artistic self, if her productions are ever to be treated by her own citizens with a disparaging condescension which is committed against a hearty appreciation of the true merits.

EVENING POST ss: New York City
NOV 10 1913

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Longy Chamber Music.

the Longy Modern Chamber Music ve its first concert Saturday night olian Hall, sympathetic chords must have vibrated in Boston, for the audience evidently had been recruited from Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays, and the society bears the hall-mark of that institution, its members finding their larger employment under the baton of Dr. Muck. They are: J. Theodorowicz, violin; A. Bak, violin; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, violoncello; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Longy, oboe; G. Grisez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn; P. Sadony, bassoon.

Paul Juon's octet, op. 27, has no parts for flute or second violin, and the society's pianist was replaced on this occasion by Carolyn Beebe, of New York. In ancient chamber concerts it was not unusual for the harpsichord to give the time as well as the pitch to the other performers. It is, perhaps, a touch of modernity that such direction as may now be needed should fall to oboe, and in this respect Georges Longy acquits himself admirably. But in ancient chamber music, Beethoven, doubling an octet, found material for a symphony, and in the romantic period Schumann found in a quartet of strings with piano ample means for the expression of his grandest conceptions. And since Juon's work is cast in sonata form, which is no more capable of further improvement in these days than sonnet form, it must be confessed that his harmonies are thin, his invention poor, and his thematic treatment chiefly of interest in revealing contrasted instrumental effects instead of developments in which they should be blended.

The closing number was Maurice Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp solo, played by Arthur Holy, with string quartet, flute, and clarinet accompaniment. Sandwiched between these works were three French songs, admirably interpreted by Mrs. Marie Sundelius. Despite the number of chamber-music organizations which find support in New York, there is room for more, especially for musicians of the ability of those associated with Mr. Longy in this new venture, but it may be suggested, in view of the first programme, and of the wealth of music from which a choice may be made hereafter, that there is no need of over-emphasis on the word "modern."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1913
Date

NEW MUSICAL ORGANIZATION

Only those who really love the best and highest in music appreciate chamber music, but in a huge city like New York there are audiences of every sort, so the lovers of the classic in music have a rare treat in store for them in the series of concerts to be given by the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, which made its debut on Saturday night last at Aeolian Hall, Manhattan. The head of this new body of musicians is M. Georges Longy, the talented oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his aim is to produce works in which string and wind instruments unite, and the output of the modern school. There are twenty men in the new orchestra and they have had the advantage of playing frequently together in one of the best orchestras in the world, so, at the outset, they have the great attribute of a good ensemble. The opening number was an octet, by Paul Juon, for violin, viola, cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The assisting artist was Carolyn Beebe, the pianist, whose admirable work in ensemble and solo playing has been known here for several seasons. The composition did not merit the very careful preparations it had received on the part of the players. It was interesting in a way, but not absorbing. Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo, with string quartet, clarinet and flute solo work, done by A. Hoby, showed the nice balance and delicacy of shading which these artists can produce. The music was, of course, of the highest order, but the selections were, to a mixed audience of musical people, what Paul Verlaine's poems are to a general reading public, bizarre and unusual. However, the organization is a welcome one, and a large audience stamped its approval. Mme. Marie Sundelins, soprano, sang some interesting modern songs, Debussy's "Ballade," "Le Reve du petit chaperon rouge," by Aubert, and "Des Harpes dans les Soirs," by Woollett. The songs were in the most modern style, and Mme. Sundelins seems to have a complete understanding of this school. She was very well received. A number of prominent women have made these concerts possible.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 5.

Dr. Muck's New Work

WHILE Dr. Muck was at work in Boston last winter and last spring he received several invitations to conduct at "festival performances" of opera and in "festival concerts" in various cities of Germany and Austria in the course of the summer. Sundry opera houses also invited him to conduct at them "as guest." In each instance he declined, because he wished to escape professional engagements through the whole summer. Even Baireuth left him free since there was no festival there and consequently no performances of "Parsifal" for him to conduct according to his annual custom.

Before Dr. Muck returned to Boston last September he began to receive similar invitations for next summer, one of which he has accepted. Between Aug. 12 and Aug. 20 the new "Mozarteum" at Salzburg will be dedicated with festival concerts and festival performances of opera. The Mozarteum is a building that is both theatre and museum erected in Mozart's native city in his honor, largely through the efforts of Mme. Lehmann. She herself has arranged the festival. It will comprise three concerts of Mozart's orchestral music, one of his chamber music, a performance of "Don Giovanni" and a performance of "Il Seraglio." Dr. Muck will conduct in one of the orchestral concerts and in "Don Giovanni." Mr. Nikisch will lead in the other two orchestral concerts and Mr. Schalk of Vienna in "Il Seraglio." Mme. Lehmann is assembling the casts for both operas, and the orchestra throughout the festival will be the Philharmonic Society of Vienna.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

ORCHESTRAL RIVALRIES

Effect of Personnel Upon the Work of These Musical Organizations.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—The letter of your correspondent "X" seems to have aroused, and rightly, the resentment of more than one music-lover of Philadelphia. The present writer has read with interest two answers to the afore-mentioned letter appearing in your columns, but it seems to me that the presentation of a few facts will go further toward refuting the statements made in the uncalled-for attack upon the Philadelphia Orchestra than even the best arguments.

Among the musicians now composing the Boston Symphony Orchestra there are comparatively few men who saw the first years of its existence, and these few do not occupy first places. For example, the concertmaster has only occupied his position for three or four years. The first 'cellist, who is also assistant conductor, is a very young man who only entered the ranks of the orchestra last season. One of Boston's best players in former years now holds the position of first flute in the Philadelphia Orchestra, while the Boston Orchestra has chosen for its first trumpet a former player of the Philadelphia organization. All in all, the writer has been informed that there have been about 20 changes in the personnel of the Boston Orchestra in the last two years alone, while [illegible] took place befor

---

ng Bureau in the World

EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date

Three orchestral concerts, the Longy entrance into New York, a song recital, Sousa at the Hippodrome, and the Century Sunday night concert, have occupied the attention of concert-goers in the last two days.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave its second concert Saturday afternoon, when a programme more in keeping with present-day tendencies than that of Thursday evening was given. The Glazounow symphony in B flat major was played with marvelous color and beauty of tone; Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" showed the extraordinary virtuosity of the organization, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," as also Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," sustained the modern spirit to the close. The audience which filled Carnegie Hall lavished unrestrained enthusiasm upon the great orchestra and its conductor.

JOURNAL, NOVEMBER 15,

OLD STYLE CLASSIC SYMPHONY IS HIT

Big Hall Is Filled at Concert of Beethoven and Schubert Works.

An old-style classic program and a soloist drawn from the ranks of the orchestra attracted an audience to the Symphony concert yesterday that filled the big hall. The "No Seats Left" sign was put out long before the concert began. No sensational novelty and no famous soloist could have done more than this conservative program, made up by Dr. Muck for the fifth pair of concerts.

The audience seemed to feel certain of thorough enjoyment with such numbers as Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and the Beethoven 'cello concerto in D major, with Heinrich Warnke, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. At any rate, enthusiasm was in the air. After the beautifully euphonious performance of the Schubert tone poem, the applause continued until the whole orchestra arose. It was virtuoso playing of the choicest description, and the ovation was well deserved.

Mr. Warnke won several recalls for his skilful playing in the concerto. The beauty of his tone showed itself especially in the lyrical adagio. It was a melodious program throughout, with none of the curious dissonances that fill the audience with doubt or dismay when most of the new works are brought out, and the "Pastoral Symphony" still remains an ideal picture of country scenes and diversions.

Next week the program will include Mahler's colossal fifth symphony and Mozart's notturno for four small orchestras, which has not been played here since 1882, when the Symphony Orchestra was giving its first season.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 15,

DOUBLE BILL BY SYMPHONY

Two Symphonies Played—Warnke Soloist

There are only a few conductors who could offer a Boston Symphony audience such a one-sided programme as that arranged by Dr. Muck for the public rehearsal of yesterday afternoon and the concert of this evening, and carry off the thing successfully. But as it proved, the concert was one of absorbing interest. There were two classic symphonies, those of Schubert in B minor (unfinished), and Beethoven in F major ("Pastoral"). And then Mr. Warnke, the admired 'cellist of the orchestra, discovered to many of his hearers a most charming 'cello concerto of Haydn's. Formal, wholly typical of Haydn's time, when composers did not dare to be too serious, written with customary polish and consideration for his soloist, his orchestra, and especially, his audience, Haydn's concerto is a gem of a work, especially when one remembers the difficulty of the combination—a solo 'cello and an orchestra.

Mr. Warnke gave a performance which was admirable in every way—technically, clean, finished—polished would be a better word—down to the finest detail. A performance characterized by the utmost refinement and appropriately conventional sentimentality, a performance which was a monument to the perception and the good taste of the musician. Nor must the delghtful accompaniment played by the orchestra be forgotten. It was indeed a rarely fitting frame for the solo instrument.

After all, is not a Beethoven symphony a final test of a conductor's powers? Not when the symphony is "individualized," as by a Safonoff or a Nikisch, but when the conductor actually succeeds in attaining for the moment the loftiness of purpose that thrilled the composer when he worked? The wonders that Dr. Muck accomplished with the work which is so well known, and which, perhaps, is not one of the strongest of the symphonies of Beethoven, really merit higher praise than print can bestow. For the symphony sounded as it must have sounded when our forefathers heard the work for the first time as fresh as it was to them. It is unfortunately true that such music is not written today.

The wonder is, that owing to Dr. Muck's masterly reading, no moment of the work became fatiguing, not even the long drawn-out movement, "By the Brook." And as for the storm music, it may be said that with far less orchestral artillery than a modern composer employs for a plain symphonic poem, Beethoven has come perhaps nearer than any other to the greatness of the thunder and the play of the elements. Perhaps this is a truism, but is it generally realized in how modern a vein Beethoven has set to work, in his landscape painting? This passage was thrown into a high light by Dr. Muck's virtuoso performance. Thanks to that, the reverberations of thunder, the hiss of rain were depicted with an incredible fidelity and distinctness, and yet never in a manner which degenerated into imitation or claptrap.

Of this old symphony Dr. Muck made a tour de force. Seldom has the orchestra played with such finish and beauty of tone, never has it spoken more eloquently. There was much applause for the orchestral performances and Mr. Warnke was several times recalled.

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 15.

5TH SYMPHONY REHEARSA

Mr. Warnke, 'Cellist, as Solois Plays Haydn's Concerto in D Major.

COMPOSED OWN CADENZA

Audience Applauds Him wit More Than Customary Warmth.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth Public Rehearsal of the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Mu conductor, took place yesterday afte noon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Warnk was the soloist. The program was follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor	Schube
Concerto in D major for 'cello	Hayd
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"	Beethove

Some may remember Anton Hekking the first 'cellist of this orchestra fo two seasons, a restless, fantastical ma of indisputable talent. He playe Haydn's concerto for the first time i Boston, and had the courage, the au dacity, to play Reinecke's cadenza to i in all its terrible length. Like a political procession, it took an hour or more in passing a given point. Mr. Hekking was sadly put out because there was objection to the cadenza and also to the concerto. When Hugo Becker visited us in 1901 he played this concerto, but spared us the maunderings of Reinecke. Mr. Warnke was also merciful yesterday afternoon. He composed, or, as he modestly said, "compiled," his own cadenzas.

There are gay and pretty passages in the Finale of the concerto and suave, f formal, measures in the middle movement. The audience apparently liked he music, which is frankly "obvious," and it applauded Mr. Warnke with more han customary warmth, and for this it had good reason. But as Mr. Warnke sat there, saying his allotted say, did anyone wonder how this concerto sounded in 1783 at the summer palace called Esterhaz? For there without doubt it was first played by Anton Kraft. The Prince's orchestra did not number over 2 players. There was never more than one 'cello. The performances before the Prince and his guests were in the afternoon, although concerts were given occasionally in the evening. The 'cellist received 430 gulden a year, much more han at Vienna. He also received free odging, six to nine casks of wine, 20 o 30 pounds of candles, three to six cords of firewood, and every two years a summer or winter uniform.

And in 1783 the ingenious Gevaert had not tinkered Haydn's score or added lutes, clarinets and bassoons to the accompaniment. This concerto must have sounded otherwise than we all heard it yesterday. Nor were the sophisticated ears of yesterday's audience the ears of prince, guests, composer, players. If Haydn's little orchestra had sat on the stage and all, with Dr. Muck himself, in uniform, we should not even then have known the concerto in the spirit with which it was written and first played.

Schubert fortunately did not finish the symphony in B minor. If he had completed it, the third and fourth movements might have killed the work in spite of the romantically beautifu first Allegro. Already in the secon movement there is a falling off, thoug the solos for oboe and clarinet ar Schubertian in their tender melancholy Too many of the composer's work show a steady diminuendo of creativ force, a flight with drooping wings lower and lower. The music was poeti cally played, and Dr. Muck gave to th Allegro a dramatic force that had no found such eloquent expression her before, not even when he conducted th symphony six years ago.

Mr. Daniel Chenneviere declares that Debussy was really the first to unveil the beauty of soul suggested by a landscape, in which we recognize an interior life, independent of the plastic form, a life sister to ours. And Debussy "unveiled" it in "Iberia." It is not always easy to understand Mr. Chenneviere's mental attitude or his verbal expression, but he flatly says that some experiments made in this unveiling, as the "Pastoral" Symphony, were incomplete or superficial. Another Frenchman, a more profound thinker, an artist in words as in music, M. Vincent d'Indy, devotes several pages of his "Beethoven" to a consideration of Nature as Beethoven knew her. It may be said that the "Pastoral" symphony needs no gloss. The music, indeed, voices Beethoven's feelings. The emotions that filled him when he was in the open country, in the forest or by the brook [illegible]

[illegible] d'Indy's discussion of Beethoven's relations with Nature as he understood her is illuminative, not impertinent. Nor do we find this ardent admirer of Beethoven making statements as a madman beats upon a drum.

We should like to hear his opinio concerning landscape-music befor "Iberia." Is not Mr. Chenneviere ac quainted with d'Indy's "Summer Da on the Mountain" or the music of nature in "Symphony On a Mountain Air?" These works are not experimental, superficial or incomplete. "Iberia" is an amazingly brilliant composition; it contains pages of the rarest beauty; it dazzles and it fascinates. Yet many find the "Unveiling," etc. in the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and even in the "Pastoral" symphony, works widely different in subject and in expression, but translations of nature into tones.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mahler's 5th symphony and a Notturno by Mozart for four small orchestras.

ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 15,

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE CLASSICAL

PROGRAMME ENTIRELY OF CONSERVATIVE SCHOOL

Schubert, Haydn and Beethoven Numbers Delight Enthusiastic Audience.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert. "Unfinished Symphony."
Haydn. Concerto for Violoncello, D major.
Beethoven. "Pastoral" Symphony.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

"How can we make bricks without straw?" inquired the oppressed Israelites, several thousand years ago. "How can we write reviews about Schubert, Haydn and Beethoven?" inquire the music critics of Boston, of Pharoah Muck, when he gives a programme as that of yesterday afternoon, devoted entirely to the conservative classical school, which is familiar to everyone. But, after all, there was much to enjoy, and considerable to write about, in this same concert.

Of course there were no technical difficulties for our orchestra to overcome in such a programme, but, for all that, there are some dangers. They might have given 200 false notes in Sibelius's recent symphony and not even the most experienced reviewer, or auditor, would have been any the wiser or the worse for them. But let any slip occur in the limpid harmony of Schubert or in the rustic picture of Beethoven, and it will stand out like a spoonful of cranberry-sauce spilled upon a white tablecloth. That there were no such slips to condone shows the routine work of our orchestra.

There is much pathos in the music of the "Unfinished Symphony" and yet more in its history. When one thinks of such a work being shelved in an incomplete state, simply because there was no chance of its ever being performed, one gets the full pity of Schubert's career. Then one remembers how poor Schumann, in his incipient insanity, was haunted by this symphony and by the belief that Schubert wanted him to finish it. Then the still more sorrowful fact that Kapellmeister Ludwig did "finish" it in every sense of the word, will also come to mind.

Another fact (a much pleasanter one) was shown in the performance of yesterday afternoon, which was that Dr. Muck does not try to elaborate the old masters. He is free from the modern curse of individualization. Except for a couple of exaggerated retards, the interpretation was perfect, and so much applauded that the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgment.

Only a year ago we had a conductor give us Beethoven's fifth symphony so retouched that it might have been called Stransky's first symphony instead. Nothing of that is found in our Boston readings.

Another point noticeable in this sedate programme was the fact that Beethoven's thunder-storm wears very well. How simple the devices in it all are, when analyzed! Contrabasses in four note phrases against violoncellos in five, and we have the rumble of the thunder; long, rising notes, upon the piccolo, and the wind is piping and blowing; a little of trombone used judiciously at the proper moment and we have all the tumult of the elements that is necessary, even if the lightning does come after the thunder.

Contrast this with all the rest of the bad weather which has arisen in modern music, St. Saens' Deluge, Berlioz's wet weather in the Symphonie Fantastique, Wagner's storm in the "Walkuere," Verdi's in "Otello," Rossini's tempest in the "William Tell" overture, and we still find that this modest score attains as strong an effect as any of them. This orchestral rainy season began as far back as Haydn's "Seasons," but, so far as we can recall at present, only Beethoven and Rossini dwelt upon the anxious hush of Nature before the crash of the elements. In the thanksgiving after the storm the French horn played well; English horn would have been a more fitting tone-color, but Beethoven never used the English horn in his orchestral scores.

The musical joke of the village band playing (in the third movement), and the old battered bassoon with its three notes (F, C, F,) was well carried out, although we should have liked the instrument made somewhat more prominent. We may depend upon it that Beethoven expected his drunken bassoon-player to emphasize his three notes whenever he had a chance to get them in, and the village band played somewhat too refinedly in this performance.

The second movement seems somewhat too long nowadays (auditors may come and auditors may go, but this brook goes on forever), and the labelled birds, the cuckoo (clarinette), the quail (oboe), and the [illegible]

[illegible] phonies, Dr. Muck's reading of them, and our orchestra's playing of them, and there must have been many young concert-goers present to whom these works had also the charm of novelty. At any rate the applause seemed to indicate a popular delight in the concert.

The Haydn violoncello concerto had this charm of novelty for almost all the audience, and the beautiful tone and the steadiness of Mr. Warnke made the work more than merely interesting. All that the present writer remembers of this work is the awfully long cadenza that was used when it was last performed in Boston, a generation ago. The first movement has a long "tutti" (orchestra alone) in the old-fashioned style, at the beginning, but the whole work was melodic and refreshing, and Mr. Warnke played with a sympathetic tone that made even the rather sentimental Adag beautiful.

Mr. Warnke's cadenzas deserve warn praise, for the first one was skilfull polyphonic in some of its double-stoppe

---

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 16.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given by the Symphony Orchestra, the first of the two given annually in aid of the pension fund of that organization. These concerts are always the occasion of an outpouring of the friends of the orchestra, who wish to aid the excellent cause, and they also attract the public that does not attend the regular concerts. The program should appeal to all classes. It begins with Beethoven's Fifth in C minor, the symphony which for over 100 years has been the most popular work of its kind in musical literature. Dr. Muck's preeminence as an interpreter of Beethoven gives special interest to this performance.

The second half of the program is frankly popular. It begins with the first "L'Arlesienne Suite of Bizet." Bizet wrote this music for Daudet's play "L'Arlesienne," or "The Woman of Arles," the famous play in which the heroine does not appear but is only talked of.

The next number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Airs." This employs the highest technical skill of an orchestra. The final number will be the "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" of Liszt, seldom played by the full orchestra, although it frequently appears on Pop programs.

PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL

Mr. Paderewski will give his second recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3:30. This will be the first time he has ever given a recital in Boston on a Sunday. It will enable many to hear him who are unable to attend his week-day concerts. He will not be heard again in Boston until the spring, when he will appear with the Symphony Orchestra. His program is as follows:

Variations and Fugue in E flat minor, op 23	Paderewski
Sonata in D minor, op. 31	Beethoven
Des Abends	Schumann
Grillen	Schumann
Warum	Schumann
Aufschwung	Schumann
Soiree de Vienne, No. 6	Schubert-Liszt
Erl King	Schubert-Liszt
Ballade, Op. 47	Chopin
Nocturne in B major, Op. 62	Chopin
Polonaise	Chopin
Isoldensliebestod	Wagner-Liszt
Mazurka in D major	Rubinstein

MAGGIE TEYTE

A recital will be given at the Copley-Plaza by Miss Maggie Teyte next Thursday afternoon. She will present in costumes of the period a program of 18th century French songs. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments will accompany her in all her songs, and play instrumental selections. This quartet, which has lately been organized, has for its members A. Gietzen, Viole d'amour; M. Belinski, Viole de Gambe; P. Fosse, Hauthois d'amour, and C. W. Adams, Harpsichord.

The program is as follows:

Ballet de Chimene	Sacchini
(a) Entree; (b) Menuet, Air Grave; (c) Air de Ballet.
Quartet of Ancient Instruments.
Rose cherie	Gretry
Voice Noel	Weckerlin
Je crains de lui parler la nuit	Gretry
Le Rosier Blanc	Weckerlin
Vous etiez ce que vous n'etes plus	Gretry
Miss Teyte.
Sonate—For Viola d'amour, Viola da Gamba and Harpsichord	Leclair
Quand le bien-aime reviendra	Dalayrac
Verduronette	Weckerlin
Eho! Eho
Petronille	Weckerlin
Ah! pour moi quelle peine extreme	Nicolo-Isouard
Miss Teyte.
(a) Tambourin	Rameau
(b) Allegro	Bald Galuppi
(c) Contredanje	Rameau
The Quartet.
C'est pour toi que je les arrange	Dezede
Il regardait mon bouquet	Monsigny
On dit qu'a quinze ans	Gretry
Maman dites-moi	Weckerlin
Jeunes fillettes	Dalayrac
Miss Teyte

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mahler's fifth symphony, which was played at the 22d concert last spring, will be the feature of the program for the concerts this week. Of all the works performed under Dr. Muck's direction last season this symphony of Gustav Mahler probably made the deepest impression.

There will only be two works on the program as the symphony is a long one. The second part of the program will contain Mozart's Noturno in D for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played only once since the orchestra organized, led by Mr. Henschel, on Jan. 28, 1882.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

[illegible] Kreisler will be the soloist with the Symphony orchestra on Nov. 28 and 29, and then will accompany the orchestra on its December trip, returning to Boston to give his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, at 3:30. The tickets will go on sale at the box office Friday, Nov. 28.

CONCERT NOTES

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the admirable violinist, whose great talent was recognized here as elsewhere when she played with the Boston Symphony orchestra and in recital, will give a concert in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 24.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 25, a colored singer from Atlanta, Ga., Uriah Sumter Richards, will give a song recital in Steinert Hall. He will have the assistance of Wesley I. Howard, violinist, and Theresa E. Stubbs, pianist.

The recital of Franz Egenieff, baritone, which was announced for Nov. 3, but postponed on account of his illness, will be given in Jordan Hall on [illegible] afternoon, Dec. 1. Tickets procured for the original date will hold good and the program will be the same as announced for Nov. 3.

The second concert of Kneisel Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Tuesday, Dec. 1.

The first concert of the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4.

Heinrich Gebhard will give a piano recital in Jordan Hall on Monday, Dec. 8.

The American String Quartet will give a concert in Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16.

Miss Beatrice Herford will soon give an entertainment in Steinert Hall.

Mme. Gadski will give a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30. The feature of her New York recital was some of Taubert's "Children's songs," and it is likely that she will repeat the program here. Tickets go on sale at Symphony Hall next Friday morning.

AMERICAN, SUNDAY

10,

RICH TREATS FOR MUSIC LOVER

Coming Attractions Offer Var Entertainment for Boston Audiences.

The concert at Symphony Hall t will be given by the Symphony Orch the first of the two given annually f of the pension fund of that organiza These concerts are always the occa of an outpouring of the friends of orchestra who wish to aid the exc cause. They attract a large num the general public which does not a the regular Symphony concerts.

The program should appeal to classes of music lovers. It begins the greatest of Beethoven's symph the Fifth in C-minor, the symp which for over 100 years has been most popular work of its kind in m literature. Dr. Muck's pre-eminence interpreter of Beethoven gives sp interest to this performance.

Novel Quartet to Aid Miss Teyte at the Copley-Plaza.

The most interesting musical event the coming week will be the recital to given in the Copley-Plaza by Miss Mag Teyte, the charming English prima do soprano. Miss Teyte will present in of the period a program of eig teenth century French songs. A uni feature of the concert will be the Bos Quartet of Ancient Instruments wh will accompany Miss Teyte in all songs and will also give two groups instrumental selections. This quart which has lately been organized, has its membership Mr. A. Gietzen, who pla the viole d'amour; Mr. M. Belinski, vi de gambe; Mr. P. Fosse, hautbois d'amo and Mr. C. W. Adams, harpsichord. T playing of the quartet will give the a dience an opportunity to hear the instr mental works of the sixteenth, seve teenth and eighteenth centuries played the instruments of their time and in t accompaniment of Miss Teyte in he songs contribute much to revive the a mosphere of past centuries.

Songs in Many Tongues in Chipman's Program

The program prepared by John Chi man, the American tenor, for his recita in Steinert Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Nov ember 18, will be divided into four parts The first group and the last will be sun in English, the second in French and the third in German. Mr. Chipman, a native of Boston, is an American singer in the full sense of the word, his training and career having been entirely in try. While Boston is not fa his work he is well and favor in New York and the cities of West.

Paderwiski's First Sund Concert in Symphony

Paderwiski will give his sec in Symphony Hall, Sunday November 23 at 3:30. This first time he has ever give in Boston on a Sunday and many to hear him who are un tend his week day concerts. be heard again in Boston Spring when he is to appear with the Symphony Orchestra.

Novelty in Program for This Week's Concerts.

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which was played at the twenty-second concert last Spring, will be the feature of the program for November 21 and 22. There will only be two works on the program as the symphony is very long. The second part will contain Mozart's Nocturne in D for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played but once since the orchestra organized and then in its first year.

Bachaus Concert in Jordan Hall on Thursday.

The return of Wilhelm Bachaus, the young pianist, to this city on November 20, in Jordan Hall, lends special lustre to the season. His program includes Brahms' Rhapsodie in G minor, Scarlatti's Allegro in G major and Scherzo in F minor, Beethoven's Sonata, opp. a group of studies by Chopin;, a Serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus), Soiree de Vienna by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement), Prelude in F minor by Rachmainoff, Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing" and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's Military March.

Has Taken High Rank Among Women Violinists.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the interesting young violinist, who made such a favorable impression in this city two seasons ago, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, November 24. Miss [illegible] is considered today as the foremost [illegible] exponent of her instrument. [illegible] instruction was received in San Francisco after which she went to [illegible] to study with the great [illegible]

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Large Audience Hears Orchestra in Program of Semi-Popular Pieces.

By JOHN BROOKS.

The first of the two annual concerts by the Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund yesterday afternoon, offered one of the few opportunities there are to hear the organization in a more popular program than that usual at the regular concerts and it was also one of the few opportunities which the general public, which does not attend the weekly concerts and rehearsals, has of hearing this remarkable aggregation of players. In spite of the rain the hall was well filled.

The program, the latter part of which had been announced as "frankly popular," was interesting as an indication of how popular taste has changed in a decade. It began with Beethoven's C minor symphony, No. 5. Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, followed. Then Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.

Throughout the concert the orchestra seemed to be on its mettle. Partly it was due to the program no doubt, but partly, perhaps, because of the occasion, the performance was marked by a spirit and dash that sometimes seems lacking at the regular concerts and that served to drive home the music in a manner to stir the audience to enthusiasm.

Beethoven's rousing Fifth symphony may have been played as well by the organization. Certainly it was never better performed. The first two movements of Bizet's suite sounded rather cheap and tawdry after the cool, refreshing vigor of Beethoven's powerful phrases, but an Adagietto for strings and the closing Carillon brought emphatic approval for the manner in which they were played. The Spanish caprice has its dull moments, but it also has interesting ones, and the constant rhythm, sprightliness and an occasional suggestion of Spanish nights with dusky senoritas and their cigarette-smoking companions, castanets, dances, romance, passion, kept one's attention. In other words, it had atmosphere, and this was due quite as much to the way it was played as to the work of the composer.

The second Hungarian rhapsody has been so much abused in its frequent repetitions by "Pop" and lesser orchestras, that it was somewhat of a surprise to find that under Dr. Muck's leadership it really amounted to something more than a show piece. Helped by the spectacle of five-score of the best musicians in the world "scratching for dear life," as they had to in the face of a combination of Liszt and Muck, the effect on the audience was much more exciting than that usually caused by the piece.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Estab

* * *

At the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, the soloist will be Miss Ruth Deyo, a brilliant American pianist, who will be heard here for the first time. Miss Deyo was announced as soloist several years ago, but was unable to appear. She will play Brahms's Concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra.

The programme is as follows: Symphony in B-flat Major, No. 5, Glazounoff; Overture, "The Sold Bride," Smetana; Concerto in B-flat, No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra, Brahms; Overture, "Jubilee," Weber,

* * *

SUNDAY POST,

NOVEMBER 16,

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which was played at the 22d concert last spring, will be the feature of the programme for Nov. 21 and 22. This work, performed under Dr. Muck's direction last season, this symphony of Gustav Mahler, made a deep impression on patrons of the Symphony concerts, and the opportunity to hear it again within a comparatively short time will undoubtedly be welcomed.

There will only be two works on the programme, as the Symphony is very long. The second part of the programme will contain Mozart's Notturno in D for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played but once since the orchestra organized, and then in its first year. Mr. Henschel, who was the conductor, gave it a place on a Mozart programme he played Jan. 27 and 28, 1882.

Lankow Recital

Edward Lankow, basso of the Metropolitan, Boston, Vienna and Dresden Opera Houses, who has just returned from a most successful concert tour in Canada, will give his first concert in Boston at Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Dec. 3, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Lankow will be assisted by Robert Pollak, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, who has [illegible] London and Ber- [illegible] before been heard [illegible] company

Postponed Recital of Egenieff

The recital of Franz Egenieff, which was announced for Nov. 3 but postponed on account of the illness of the artist, will be given in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 1. Tickets procured for the original date will hold good, and the programme will be the same as announced for Nov. 3.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Tuesday, Dec. 2. The programme will be announced later.

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, the well-known pianist of this city, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday, Dec. 8.

Mme. Gadski, who is to give a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30, gave her anual recital in New York this past week with her usual success. The feature of that programme was some of Taubert's children's songs, which Mme. Gadski has introduced to this country, and it is likely that she will repeat the same programme at her Boston concert.

PENSION FUND TODAY

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be the first of the two concerts given annually in aid of the pension fund of that organization. These concerts are always the occasion of an outpouring of the friends of the orchestra who wish to aid the excellent cause, and they also attract a large number of the general public which does not attend the regular Symphony concerts.

The programme should appeal to all classes of music lovers. It begins with the greatest of Beethoven's Symphonies, the Fifth in C-minor, the symphony which for over 100 years has been the most popular work of its kind in musical literature.

The second half of the programme is frankly popular. It begins with the first L'Arlesienne Suite of Bizet. This is in four parts, a prelude, adagio, minuetto and carillon. Bizet wrote this music to be played incidental to the performance of Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," or "The Woman of Arles," the famous play in which the heroine does not appear but is only talked of. Some of this music is now used as ballet music in the last act of "Carmen." The next number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant arrangement of Spanish tunes which he calls the Spanish Caprice. This work is in reality a brilliant tour de force and employs the highest technical skill of an orchestra. The final number will be the ever popular Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. This is seldom played by the full orchestra, although it frequently appears on Pop programmes in the spring.

Paderewski's Second Recital

Paderewski will give his second recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3:30. This will be the first time he has ever given a recital in Boston on a Sunday, and will enable many to hear him who are unable to attend his weekday concerts. He will not be heard again in Boston until the spring when he is to appear with the Symphony Orchestra. His programme is as follows:

Variations and fugue in E flat minor, ...Paderewski
op. 23 ....Beethoven
Sonata in D minor, op. 31 ....Schumann
Des Abends ....Schumann
Grillen ....Schumann
Warum ....Schumann
Aufschwung ....Schubert-Liszt
Soiree de Vienne, No. 6........Schubert-Liszt
Erl King ....Chopin
Ballade, op. 47 ....Chopin
Nocturne in B major, op. 62........Chopin
Polonaise ....Wagner-Liszt
Isoldensliebestod ....Rubinstein
Mazurka in D major........

WILHELM BACHAUS

Wilhelm Bachaus, the young pianist, will play in this city on Nov. 20, in Jordan Hall. Bachaus was born in Leipsic in 1884. He studied nine years with Reckendorf and one year with d'Albert, and at the age of 16 made his first public appearance with the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conducting. From that day Bachaus has advanced without interruption.

His programme includes Brahms' Rhapsodie in G Minor, Scarlatti's Allegro in G Major and Scherzo in F Minor, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 57, a group of studies by Chopin, a Serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus), Soiree de Vienne by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement), Prelude in F Minor by Rachmaninoff, Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing," and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's Military March.

Opera Lectures

Havrah W. L. Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver 10 of his opera talks this week, covering four of the operas in this season's repertoire. The musical illustrations will be furnished by Mr. Floyd M. Baxter, pianist.

"Tales of Hoffmann" will be given on Monday afternoon before the Monday Club of East Weymouth, Wednesday evening before the Girls' Club of Portsmouth, N. H., and Thursday afternoon before the Boston Chapter of the Women's Organization of Retail Druggists at the Hotel Vendome.

"Madama Butterfly" will be given on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the Brookline Town Hall, admission free, and again on Saturday afternoon before the Watertown Women's Club at Watertown, and on Saturday evening before the Thought and Work Club of Salem.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" will be given on Friday afternoon before the Quinshipaug Women's Club of Milford, and on Friday evening in Worcester.

"Monna Vanna" will be given Tuesday afternoon before the Tuesday Club of Jamaica Plain, and on Thursday evening at the Boston Art Club.

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra on the 28th and 29th, and then will accompany the orchestra on its December trip, returning to Boston to give his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, at 3:30. The tickets will go on sale at the boxoffice, Friday, Nov. 28.

Kathleen Parlow

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the interesting young violinist who made such a favorable impression in this city two seasons ago, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 24.

CHIPMAN IN RECITAL

The programme prepared by John Chipman, the American tenor, for his recital in Steinert Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 18, will be divided into four parts. The first group and the last will be sung in English, the second in French and the third in German. Mr. Chipman, a native of Boston, is an American singer in the full sense of the word, his training and career having been entirely in this country. While Boston is not familiar with his work, he is well and favorably known in New York and the cities of the Middle West.

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4. Full particulars will be made public soon.

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 15,

WARNKE SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

First Cellist Plays in Concert of Haydn, Schubert and Beethoven Numbers.

By JOHN BROOKS.

It was a thoroughly classical program that Dr. Muck offered for the fifth Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Heinrich Warnke, premier cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist, and he played Haydn's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

The concerto has been heard in this city only a few times. It is a very difficult piece for the principal performer, with many brilliant show passages. It is written in Haydn's most joyful mood, but without his underlying seriousness. Except as a show piece for a cello virtuoso it has little interest.

Symphony audiences have heard Mr. Warnke as a soloist for the past nine years. He played yesterday with his usual brilliance, showing himself master of his instrument and thoroughly in sympathy with his music.

Schubert's symphony with its first movement, solemn, plaintive and stirring, and the inexpressibly sweet, but sad, andante, held first place on the program and was in many ways the most satisfactory number. Though technically "a fragment," it seems to those who have heard it many times complete in itself. If a third movement, "presto vivace," which is reported to have been played at its first performance, really ever existed, it is hard to believe it would not have been a superfluity, a breaking of the spell.

The Pastoral symphony was played with all Dr. Muck's excellence of leadership in the works of Beethoven. It still holds its popularity, but the first movement did not seem as full of meaning as it once was and the attention wandered during the long and elaborate development of the andante.

Next week the Mahler symphony No. 5 will be repeated, and owing to its great length there will be but one other number on the program, Mozart's notturno for four small orchestras, which will be almost a novelty, as it has been played here but once since the orchestra was organized, in the first year, 1882, under Mr. Henschel.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 15,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PLEASURES OF A CLASSIC PROGRAMME

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, with a Concerto for 'Cello by Haydn Between—Mr. Warnke's Playing of It—Dr. Muck and the Music—Listeners of Varied Moods

IN these sophisticated and introspective days, it is hard for most of us to take a Symphony Concert, like that of yesterday afternoon, honestly and innocently. Two very familiar and relatively simple pieces, as symphonic music goes, stood on the programme—the Allegro and Andante that make Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Between them stood a concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. [illegible]

AMERICAN, SUNDAY

[illegible] 16,

RICH TREATS FOR MUSIC LOVER

Coming Attractions Offer Var Entertainment for Boston Audiences.

The concert at Symphony Hall t will be given by the Symphony Orch the first of the two given annually i of the pension fund of that organiza These concerts are always the occ of an outpouring of the friends of orchestra who wish to aid the exc cause. They attract a large num the general public which does not a the regular Symphony concerts.

The program should appeal to classes of music lovers. It begins the greatest of Beethoven's symph the Fifth in C-minor, the symp which for over 100 years has bee most popular work of its kind in m literature. Dr. Muck's pre-eminence interpreter of Beethoven gives s interest to this performance.

Novel Quartet to Aid Miss Teyte at the Copley-Plaza.

The most interesting musical event the coming week will be the recital to given in the Copley-Plaza by Miss Mag Teyte, the charming English prima do soprano. Miss Teyte will present in [illegible] of the period a program of eig eenth century French songs. A uni feature of the concert will be the Bos Quartet of Ancient Instruments wh will accompany Miss Teyte in all songs and will also give two groups instrumental selections. This quart which has lately been organized, has its membership Mr. A. Gietzen, who pla the viole d'amour; Mr. M. Belinski, vi de gambe; Mr. P. Fosse, hautbois d'amo and Mr. C. W. Adams, harpsichord. T playing of the quartet will give the a dience an opportunity to hear the instr mental works of the sixteenth, seve teenth and eighteenth centuries played the instruments of their time and in t accompaniment of Miss Teyte in h songs contribute much to revive the a mosphere of past centuries.

Songs in Many Tongues in Chipman's Program

The program prepared by John Chi man, the American tenor, for his recita in Steinert Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Nov ember 18, will be divided into four part The first group and the last will be sun in English, the second in French and the third in German. Mr. Chipman, a native of Boston, is an American singer in the full sense of the word, his training and career having been entirely in this country. While Boston is not familiar with his work he is well and favorably known in New York and the cities of the Middle West.

Paderwiski's First Sunday Concert in Symphony Hall.

Paderwiski will give his second recital in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, November 23 at 3:30. This will be the first time he has ever given a recital in Boston on a Sunday and will enable many to hear him who are unable to attend his week day concerts. He will not be heard again in Boston until the Spring when he is to appear with the Symphony Orchestra.

Novelty in Program for This Week's Concerts.

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which was played at the twenty-second concert last Spring, will be the feature of the program for November 21 and 22. There will only be two works on the program as the symphony is very long. The second part will contain Mozart's Nocturne in D for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played but once since the orchestra organized and then in its first year.

Bachaus Concert in Jordan Hall on Thursday.

The return of Wilhelm Bachaus, the young pianist, to this city on November 20, in Jordan Hall, lends special lustre to the season. His program includes Brahms' Rhapsodie in G minor, Scarlatti's Allegro in G major and Scherzo in F minor, Beethoven's Sonata, opp. a group of studies by Chopin;, a Serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus), Soiree de Vienna by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement), Prelude in F minor by Rachmainoff, Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing" and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's Military March.

Has Taken High Rank Among Women Violinists.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the interesting young violinist, who made such a favorable impression in this city two seasons ago, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, November 24. Miss [illegible] is considered today as the fore[illegible] exponent of her instrument. [illegible] distinction was received in [illegible] after which she went to [illegible] study with the great [illegible]

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Large Audience Hears Orchestra in Program of Semi-Popular Pieces.

By JOHN BROOKS.

The first of the two annual concerts by the Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund yesterday afternoon, offered one of the few opportunities there are to hear the organization in a more popular program than that usual at the regular concerts and it was also one of the few opportunities which the general public, which does not attend the weekly concerts and rehearsals, has of hearing this remarkable aggregation of players. In spite of the rain the hall was well filled.

The program, the latter part of which had been announced as "frankly popular," was interesting as an indication of how popular taste has changed in a decade. It began with Beethoven's C minor symphony, No. 5. Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, followed. Then Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.

Throughout the concert the orchestra seemed to be on its mettle. Partly it was due to the program no doubt, but partly, perhaps, because of the occasion, the performance was marked by a spirit and dash that sometimes seems lacking at the regular concerts and that served to drive home the music in a manner to stir the audience to enthusiasm.

Beethoven's rousing Fifth symphony may have been played as well by the organization. Certainly it was never better performed. The first two movements of Bizet's suite sounded rather cheap and tawdry after the cool, refreshing vigor of Beethoven's powerful phrases, but an Adagietto for strings and the closing Carillon brought emphatic approval for the manner in which they were played. The Spanish caprice has its dull moments, but it also has interesting ones, and the constant rhythm, sprightliness and an occasional suggestion of Spanish nights with dusky senoritas and their cigarette-smoking companions, castanets, dances, romance, passion, kept one's attention. In other words, it had atmosphere, and this was due quite as much to the way it was played as to the work of the composer.

The second Hungarian rhapsody has been so much abused in its frequent repetitions by "Pop" and lesser orchestras, that it was somewhat of a surprise to find that under Dr. Muck's leadership it really amounted to something more than a show piece. Helped by the spectacle of five-score of the best musicians in the world "scratching for dear life," as they had to in the face of a combination of Liszt and Muck, the effect on the audience was much more exciting than that usually caused by the piece.

R. I.

* *

e Boston Symphony which will be given on Tuesday evening, t will be Miss Ruth merican pianist, who e for the first time. ounced as soloist sev- t was unable to ap- y Brahms's Concerto forte and orchestra.

ramme is as follows: Sym- -flat Major, No. 5, Glazounoff; "The Sold Bride," Smetana; n B-flat, No. 2, for pianoforte tra, Brahms; Overture, "Jubi- r.

* * *

SUNDAY POST,

NOVEMBER 16,

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which was played at the 22d concert last spring, will be the feature of the programme for Nov. 21 and 22. This work, performed under Dr. Muck's direction last season, this symphony of Gustav Mahler, made a deep impression on patrons of the Symphony concerts, and the opportunity to hear it again within a comparatively short time will undoubtedly be welcomed.

There will only be two works on the programme, as the Symphony is very long. The second part of the programme will contain Mozart's Notturno in D for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played but once since the orchestra organized, and then in its first year. Mr. Henschel, who was the conductor, gave it a place on a Mozart programme he played Jan. 27 and 28, 1882.

Lankow Recital

Edward Lankow, basso of the Metropolitan, Boston, Vienna and Dresden Opera Houses, who has just returned from a most successful concert tour in Canada, will give his first concert in Boston at Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Dec. 3, at 3 o'clock. Mr. Lankow will be assisted by Robert Pollak, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, who has [illegible] London and Ber- [illegible]fore been heard [illegible]mpany

---

Postponed Recital of Egenieff

The recital of Franz Egenieff, which was announced for Nov. 3 but postponed on account of the illness of the artist, will be given in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 1. Tickets procured for the original date will hold good, and the programme will be the same as announced for Nov. 3.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Tuesday, Dec. 2. The programme will be announced later.

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, the well-known pianist of this city, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday, Dec. 8.

Mme. Gadski, who is to give a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30, gave her anual recital in New York this past week with her usual success. The feature of that programme was some of Taubert's children's songs, which Mme. Gadski has introduced to this country, and it is likely that she will repeat the same programme at her Boston concert.

PENSION FUND TODAY

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be the first of the two concerts given annually in aid of the pension fund of that organization. These concerts are always the occasion of an outpouring of the friends of the orchestra who wish to aid the excellent cause, and they also attract a large number of the general public which does not attend the regular Symphony concerts.

The programme should appeal to all classes of music lovers. It begins with the greatest of Beethoven's Symphonies, the Fifth in C-minor, the symphony which for over 100 years has been the most popular work of its kind in musical literature.

The second half of the programme is frankly popular. It begins with the first L'Arlesienne Suite of Bizet. This is in four parts, a prelude, adagio, minuetto and carillon. Bizet wrote this music to be played incidental to the performance of Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," or "The Woman of Arles," the famous play in which the heroine does not appear but is only talked of. Some of this music is now used as ballet music in the last act of "Carmen." The next number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant arrangement of Spanish tunes which he calls the Spanish Caprice. This work is in reality a brilliant tour de force and employs the highest technical skill of an orchestra. The final number will be the ever popular Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. This is seldom played by the full orchestra, although it frequently appears on Pop programmes in the spring.

Paderewski's Second Recital

Paderewski will give his second recital in Symph y Hall next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, at 3:30. This will be the first time he has ever given a recital in Boston on a Sunday, and will enable many to hear him who are unable to attend his weekday concerts. He will not be heard again in Boston until the spring when he is to appear with the Symphony Orchestra.

His programme is as follows:

Variations and fugue in E flat minor,	Paderewski
op. 23	Beethoven
Sonata in D minor, op. 31	Schumann
Des Abends	Schumann
Grillen	Schumann
Warum	Schumann
Aufschwung	Schubert-Liszt
Soiree de Vienne, No. 6	Schubert-Liszt
Erl King	Chopin
Ballade, op. 47	Chopin
Nocturne in B major, op. 62	Chopin
Polonaise	Wagner-Liszt
Isoldensliebestod	Rubinstein
Mazurka in D major

WILHELM BACHAUS

Wilhelm Bachaus, the young pianist, will play in this city on Nov. 20, in Jordan Hall. Bachaus was born in Leipsic in 1884. He studied nine years with Reckendorf and one year with d'Albert, and at the age of 16 made his first public appearance with the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conducting. From that day Bachaus has advanced without interruption.

His programme includes Brahms' Rhapsodie in G Minor, Scarlatti's Allegro in G Major and Scherzo in F Minor, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 57, a group of studies by Chopin, a Serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus), Soiree de Vienne by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement), Prelude in F Minor by Rachmaninoff, Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing," and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's Military March.

Opera Lectures

Havrah W. L. Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver 10 of his opera talks this week, covering four of the operas in this season's repertoire. The musical illustrations will be furnished by Mr. Floyd M. Baxter, pianist.

"Tales of Hoffmann" will be given on Monday afternoon before the Monday Club of East Weymouth, Wednesday evening before the Girls' Club of Portsmouth, N. H., and Thursday afternoon before the Boston Chapter of the Women's Organization of Retail Druggists at the Hotel Vendome.

"Madame Butterfly" will be given on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the Brookline Town Hall, admission free, and again on Saturday afternoon before the Watertown Women's Club at Watertown, and on Saturday evening before the Thought and Work Club of Salem.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" will be given on Friday afternoon before the Quinshipaug Women's Club of Milford, and on Friday evening in Worcester.

"Monna Vanna" will be given Tuesday afternoon before the Tuesday Club of Jamaica Plain, and on Thursday evening at the Boston Art Club.

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra on the 28th and 29th, and then will accompany the orchestra on its December trip, returning to Boston to give his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, at 3:30. The tickets will go on sale at the boxoffice, Friday, Nov. 28.

Kathleen Parlow

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the interesting young violinist who made such a favorable impression in this city two seasons ago, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 24.

CHIPMAN IN RECITAL

The programme prepared by John Chipman, the American tenor, for his recital in Steinert Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 18, will be divided into four parts. The first group and the last will be sung in English, the second in French and the third in German. Mr. Chipman, a native of Boston, is an American singer in the full sense of the word, his training and career having been entirely in this country. While Boston is not familiar with his work, he is well and favorably known in New York and the cities of the Middle West.

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4. Full particulars will be made public soon.

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 15,

WARNKE SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

First Cellist Plays in Concert of Haydn, Schubert and Beethoven Numbers.

By JOHN BROOKS.

It was a thoroughly classical program that Dr. Muck offered for the fifth Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Heinrich Warnke, premier cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist, and he played Haydn's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

The concerto has been heard in this city only a few times. It is a very difficult piece for the principal performer, with many brilliant show passages. It is written in Haydn's most joyful mood, but without his underlying seriousness. Except as a show piece for a cello virtuoso it has little interest.

Symphony audiences have heard Mr. Warnke as a soloist for the past nine years. He played yesterday with his usual brilliance, showing himself master of his instrument and thoroughly in sympathy with his music.

Schubert's symphony with its first movement, solemn, plaintive and stirring, and the inexpressibly sweet, but sad, andante, held first place on the program and was in many ways the most satisfactory number. Though technically "a fragment," it seems to those who have heard it many times complete in itself. If a third movement, "presto vivace," which is reported to have been played at its first performance, really ever existed, it is hard to believe it would not have been a superfluity, a breaking of the spell.

The Pastoral symphony was played with all Dr. Muck's excellence of leadership in the works of Beethoven. It still holds its popularity, but the first movement did not seem as full of meaning as it once was and the attention wandered during the long and elaborate development of the andante.

Next week the Mahler symphony No. 5 will be repeated, and owing to its great length there will be but one other number on the program, Mozart's notturno for four small orchestras, which will be almost a novelty, as it has been played here but once since the orchestra was organized, in the first year, 1882, under Mr. Henschel.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 15,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PLEASURES OF A CLASSIC PROGRAMME

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, with a Concerto for 'Cello by Haydn Between—Mr. Warnke's Playing of It—Dr. Muck and the Music—Listeners of Varied Moods

IN these sophisticated and introspective days, it is hard for most of us to take a Symphony Concert, like that of yesterday afternoon, honestly and innocently. Two very familiar and relatively simple pieces, as symphonic music goes, stood on the programme—the Allegro and Andante that make Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Between them stood a concerto for [illegible] in which [illegible] was not familiar [illegible] follow and as usual with such pieces the audience was more interested in the virtuoso than in the vehicle for his skill. Moreover, every frequenter of the Symphony Concerts—and habitués fill the hall every Friday—could surmise readily, out of long experience and pleasure with Mr. Warnke how he would play the concerto—with unobtruded but unfailing technical skill, with fine, flowing, sensitive and supple tone, with unforced and unsentimentalized feeling for the songful qualities of his instrument and his music, with easy elegance rather than striving ostentation of bravura, with thought of the concerto and his 'cello and not of himself and his audience. Neither in personality nor in virtuosity is Mr. Warnke high-colored. If he were his hearers, a little too ready to take him for granted, in spite of the cordiality of their applause, would better appreciate the fineness and the soundness of his mastery of his instrument, the music that he plays upon it and of himself when he plays. He is all expert and disciplined musicianship, by which token the professional or the quasi-professional hearer admires him more warmly than does the lay listener.

Similarly, it was easy to surmise and in some respects to recall the fashion in which conductor and orchestra would play the two symphonies. The limpid and songful tone of the wood-wind choir, full of character in each of its voices yet commingled in suffusing beauty, is the very counterpart of Schubertian melody. The strings are finely capable of light or grave intensity of accent, and Schubert in the Unfinished Symphony and indeed in all his music invites it. Forward flow the Allegro and the Andante as in a continuous and outpoured stream; yet the surface is as changeable as the sea when light and breeze play upon it. Schubert may not have written the fragment in as tragic temper as some commentators and conductors, over-zealous for a pitch of emotion to which it hardly attains, profess to believe, but he did write it moodily. With such music of sustained body and contour, but of changing surface and spirit, Dr. Muck is a past master. Perhaps, indeed, as recollection anticipated, he is a little too masterful with this music of Schubert. It speaks so clearly and directly for itself that the conductor need do no more than secure and preserve the transparent integrity of its voice. Insure Schubert untrammelled and unclouded speech and his tones will speak the moods and the fancies that gave them birth. The lyric composer, like the lyric poet, needs nothing but perfect voice for his singing. Assure him that and his imagination and ours, as we hear, take wing. Even when he is as restless as Schubert is in this fragment, his alternations of mood do not need to be emphasized. It is hard for a conductor in these days to leave Schubert quite to himself, and once and again Dr. Muck seemed to succumb a little to the temptation to "interpret" him.

The playing of the Pastoral Symphony on the other hand, left not a reservation behind. How rich and sunny the tone, in all but the few overcast moments of the storm, how clear and bright the play of the melodies, how revealing and animating the rhythms, how spontaneous the simplicity and sincerity that pervaded the whole performance. Beethoven spoke through it serenely or robustly, gaily or contemplatively, but intimately and directly always. In such complete transmission of music, the medium seems to vanish in the beauty and the emotion it is imparting. Then, more than in mighty feats of eloquence or in dexterous subtleties and suggestion, do a conductor and an orchestra excel themselves.

In such fashion were we hearers, according to our several minds, set face to face with Schubert's and Beethoven's music. (With Haydn's our response to it did not matter much. It sufficed that the concerto served the violoncellist well. It was written for no other purpose. In itself it is rarely and barely interesting.) And how were we minded toward the two symphonies and how many of us could hear them innocently and honestly without some prepossession or pose? Undoubtedly, some listened with complaisant superiority. To them this Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony and this Beethoven of the Pastoral Symphony were all very well in their way. Of course, the two pieces are classics; of course they should be played from time to time at the Symphony Concerts and played as admirably as they were yesterday. But, how much more interesting conductor and orchestra, music and playing would have been had the symphonies been striking and stimulating modern or contemporary pieces, newly revealed or freshly touching understanding and emotions. Such listeners "bear with" the Schubert and the Beethoven of yesterday and usually are at small pains to hide their endurance. At the other extreme are the hearers who listen with rejoicing ears and feeling. Here is the music after their own hearts—clear as the day, rich in the melody that delights them, suffused with familiar harmonic and instrumental color, stirring agreeable emotions, never taxing, never irritating, the acme of the easy pleasure of instrumental song, well-nigh perfectly sung. Behold music before the "modernists" laid debasing hands upon it, and take joy of it. Somewhat too complaisant and cock-sure also are these basking dwellers in the golden age.

Between these two extremes other groups listened according to their kind. Some were tranquil, because, since the Unfinished Symphony and the Pastoral Symphony are acknowledged classics, they knew they were receiving pleasure about which they need have no misgivings. Some, yet again, were uneasy. They expect music to excite their nerves, and neither Schubert nor Beethoven chose in these symphonies to be exciting. Others, as they were heard to say in the intermission, "rested" as they listened, and so appreciated music fulfilling its divine mission through an hour and a half of a day packed with engagements. Yet others heard the two symphonies out of long and glamoring memories; while on some young faces by their side was written the fresh and exhilarating pleasure of discovery. Irreproachable music, irreproachably played thought others, half unconsciously. What more was there to ask of a Symphony Orchestra or a Symphony concert— [illegible] they could [illegible] those of the young ears and the young imaginations of all ages that in fact or in illusion of spirit were hearing the two symphonies for the first time. They needed no promptings to their pleasure; they laid no after-tests upon it. They heard Schubert's melodies as pure song and gave themselves to the intrinsic beauty and emotion of it. Enough for them that it kindled their sensibilities and stirred their hearts. "Interpretation" might go hang; upon their ears fell beauty and emotion unmistakable and unescapable. Mr. d'Indy being middle-aged, analytical and finely sensitive to the substance and the spirit of the Pastoral Symphony, may write of it through many divining pages and we others, also middle-aged and analytical and with an occasional emotion of our own, may read them admiringly. Those who hear youthfully have not yet come or will never come to that penalty—half pain and half pleasure—of the years. For them, first, last and always, the beauty and the emotion of Beethoven's music are so much pleasurable sensation, engrossing, delightful, altogether sufficient in itself. They are the only listeners who are wholly innocent and honest. If Schubert and Beethoven wrote the two symphonies in a Golden Age of music, they also hear out of it.

H. T. P.

AMERICAN, NOVEMBER 15,

HEAR WARNKE AS 'CELLIST AT SYMPHONY HALL

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Doctor Muck offered the unfinished symphony of Schubert and the pastoral symphony of Beethoven at the Symphony rehearsal, with Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. He elected to play the Haydn Concerto in D major for violincello.

It is a remarkable thing that a discarded composition like the Schubert Symphony, a work that was lost for forty years, should today be the most popular of the orchestral compositions of that brilliant and unfortunate musician, who died at the age of thirty-one.

While it may not possess the grandeur of the celebrated C Symphony, its exquisite melody and the lovliness of its instrumentation make it far more potent to the average concert goer.

The performance yesterday was truly memorable. Never did the orchestra sing the andante more beautifully. The prolonged applause was a fitting tribute to Doctor Muck and his men.

The pastoral symphony, too, was delightfully performed. Its gushing streams of happiness and content were most faithfully portrayed.

The violincello is a valuable instrument, and for a few minutes it can be greatly admired as a solo instrument. A cello concerto is something to be endured under the best circumstances. Warnke seemed to be playing under unfavorable conditions yesterday. He did not succeed in making the concerto of Haydn interesting, perhaps an impossible task, and he did not always draw tones from his instrument that were good to hear. Doubtless his performance tonight will be admirable, for he is an excellent musician and usually a very satisfactory soloist.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 15,

Presenting the Haydn concerto major for violoncello, Heinrich War. appeared as soloist at the fifth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon, and won the applause of a capacity house. Two other works of the classic period were on the program with the concerto, the Schubert "Unfinished" symphony in B minor and the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony in F major, No. 6.

Considered from the academic viewpoint, the performance of Mr. Warnke had all possible brilliancy and charm. It was interesting for its disclosure of pure, classic melody and for its presentation of clever accompaniment as wrought by the editorial hand of that master of theoretical instrumentation, Gevaert. The more theorized the chief of theoretic forms of composition, the violoncello concerto, could be made, the more entertaining intellectually it became. An engaging proposition in plain geometry as Haydn put it forth, it grew to something picturesquely instructive with a third dimension added by the mathematician adapter.

Extraordinary enthusiasm Mr. Warnke's associates in the orchestra lent to their task of playing the accompaniment. They recognized the occasion as one of sheer musical contemplation, they took it as a time when they could abandon all anxiety about interpretation and just indulge in abstract tone making and blending and in phrasing for phrasing's sake. It was good to hear some music once without any motive in the playing of it beyond that of putting the notes into correct rhetorical relations.

Mr. [illegible] especially fine sounds in the first division of the concerto, when the melody stayed long on the high string. Cellists do not commonly hold their instrument in such obedience as he held his when they sit on their little platform before the orchestra and under the left arm of the conductor. The tone kept on the track throughout the performance and the melody moved from starting point to stopping point without any jolting misbehavior of the brakes.

If a cellist will give us smooth traveling, we ommonly ask no more of him; for to do this is to accomplish what is all but impossible. It must remain an answered query why one violoncello, though played by the solo man of the orchestra, can have the small emotional appeal it has in this Haydn concerto, while nine instruments played by men ranking below him can achieve the wonderful color they do in the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert.

One of the finest efforts Dr. Muck ever made at the desk of the Symphony conductor was his reading of the Schubert piece; and it was so unpretentiously done that it seems inaccurately described as an effort. The steady holding of the men to work in the old repertory, regardless of whether the selections are always of the highest attractiveness, has brought an elegance to the technique of the orchestra which is of great use when a work like the B minor symphony is revived.

The conductor gave searching interpretation to this number, which opened the concert, but to the "Pastoral" symphony, which closed it, he gave simply a clean-cut reading, with no endeavor to make it say much, except in the slow movement and in passages of the closing movement, and with evident intent to avoid making it live up to its program as a poet's visit to the country. This work, had it been lost the day after the composer wrote it had been found yesterday without any identifying mark, might have difficulty in proving itself a symphony of Beethoven. The writing is all in the composer's facile style but its moods are generally not those which had prevailing influence with him. Beethoven can be formal in manner without ceasing, but he is not wont to be so tame and irresolute as he is through the first and third movements of the "Pastoral."

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 17.

SYMPHONY FUND CONCERT

Audience Large Despite the Weather, and Enthusiastic in Appreciation.

MAGNIFICENT PERFORMANCE

Beethoven Work Given with Wonderful Effect — Dr. Muck Conducts.

At Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, the first Symphony Pension Fund concert of the season took place. This was the program:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5	Beethoven
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1	Bizet
Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Hugarian Rhapsody, No. 2	Liszt

Though bad weather reduced the attendance somewhat below the flood tide that is usual at these concerts, neither snow squalls nor empty seats dampened a particle either the enthusiastic skill of the Symphony orchestra players or the vivifying, alert genius of Dr. Muck, the conductor.

It was a privilege as well as an inspiration to hear the effulgence and the glory of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony sounded as they were.

Not a charm was missed in the romantic Bizet suite from the gossipy, rural prelude to the splendid ding-dong of the Carillon, with its delicate fretwork and arabesques of harmony.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish caprice was received with particularly ardent acclaim. Nothing could exceed the clarity, precision and sensitive illumination with which were portrayed these Spanish sketches as seen through Cossack spectacles—glimpses of Andalusia as viewed from the steppes of the Don or the Dnieper.

Of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, one who listened said: "I thought I had heard this often, but I never heard it really played before."

GLOBE

NOVEMBER 17,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Season's First Pension Fund Program.

Dr Muck and Players Distinguish Themselves.

Dr Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave the first program for the pension fund yesterday afternoon as one of the series of artistic concerts which Mr Mudgett is giving on Sunday afternoons. The program, while not frankly popular, was of a character to interest a large and general class of hearers. A Beethoven symphony may not be considered as wide in its appeal as the "pathetic" of Tschaikowsky or a program of Wagner. Beethoven's fifth began the program yesterday and was followed by applause which Dr Muck shared with the men. The other numbers were Bizet's first L'Arlesienne suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes and Liszt's sceond Hungarian Rhapsody.

It is said that when Richard Strauss once conducted Beethoven's fifth symphony at a subscription concert of the Berlin Royal Opera Orchestra in 28¾ minutes, he was accused of high speeding. Counting the intermissions between movements—and there were late arrivals to be seated after the first—Dr Muck's record yesterday was just half an hour. Yet he gave the impression of great breadth in the andante. The security and precision of his rhythm—a precision which knows elasticity—gives a poise to a rapid tempo which under a less authoritive hand would be precipitate and chaotic.

The organic unity of this great dramatic poem was made particularly clear yesterday, the effective contrasts of the movements one to another, and the beauty and spontaneity with which each of them seems to spring from germinal themes, terse, vital and luminous. It has been customary with some conductors to retard the opening theme, associated with the knocking of fate, and to give it at once a sinister character. Dr Muck did not retard the theme yesterday as it is first announced by the horns, but gradually broadened it as the movement proceded until in this manner it became portentious and took on increased dramatic significance. It was a reading throughout of poetic beauty in the plasticity and the subtle gradation of nuance with which one thought succeeded another.

The second half of the program was in lighter vein. The exquisite music of Bizet was played with the grace and clarity that is its due—the minuet and its Old World gallantry, the adagio gently stained with tears and the carillon with its persistent bells.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff was a procession of colorful, characterizing pictures, a superb performance. Liszt's hackneyed and long-suffering rhapody must have been amazed to find itself recreated in such a blaze of brilliant virtuosity.

Next Sunday afternoon Mr Paderewski will continue this series of concerts with a piano recital.

JOURNAL

NOVEMBER 17,

Symphony Audience Gives Ovation to Conductor Muck

EVEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs the assistance of a popular soloist to draw a crowd to one of its pension fund concerts; or else it has to offer some extraordinarily well-known work like Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," which is generally idolized by the musical public here and in England.

The pension fund concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon had no soloist and no pre-eminently popular number on the program. So there were many vacant seats. There were signs of nervousness in the orchestra during the performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony, which led the program, but a wealth of virtuosity more than atoned for the several slips and won an ovation for Dr. Muck and his hundred players. Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky's-Korsokoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody" were the other numbers after the monumental Beethoven work. The Liszt piece, like the final movement of the symphony, was performed with dazzling brilliancy.

Paderewski will be the star at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

ADVERT
NOVEMBER 17,

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven............Symphony in C minor, No.
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Bizet..................Suite, "L'Arlesienne, No. 1
- (a) Prelude.
- (b) Minuetto.
- (c) Adagietto.
- (d) Carillon.

Rimsky-Korsakoff....Caprice on Spanish Themes Op. 34.

Liszt..................Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2

A Pension Fund Concert without the "Pathetique," and with no Wagner numbers on the programme is such a Rara Avis that one must perforce praise its plumage! In this instance duty and inclination are identical.

The large audience had the welcome opportunity of showing its esteem for the splendid work of this body of musicians who have made this city known as a music centre here and abroad, and which has helped in no small degree to give a fine education in the classics to the thousands of students who congregate in Boston.

Dr. Muck is teaching the younger generation (and the older too) Beethoven. Thus early in the season we have already had the fifth, sixth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, and a lot of Mozart and Haydn besides.

The "Fifth Symphony" was given with fine sonority of tone and clarity of design, and the strings, wood wind and brass played with their usual distinction. The violins and 'cellos showed great beauty of tone and feeling in the "Andante;" the double basses distinguished themselves by the gusto with which they played the elephantine dance-theme of the "Scherzo;" superb spirit was shown in the finale in which the brass took a noble part.

Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," incidental music to Daudet's "Woman of Arles" (where the "woman" does not appear on the stage), is a beautiful pastoral romance. The "Overture-Prelude" is made up of three themes, opening with an old Provencal Noel attributed to Good King Rene, followed by a melancholy theme, and one of a sombre and passionate character.

The "Minuetto," at first a dance with jerky rhythm that amusingly pictures the movements of the old peasants, towards the middle becomes the tender theme of the aged lovers, beautifully "sung" by the wood wind with harp accompaniment.

In the Adagietto (or Adagio, as it was at first called), the tender love lyric was played with exquisite beauty of tone by the 'cellos, violas, and violins, while the double basses listened in silent admiration.

The Carillon, with its bell-like reiteration of the sharps G, E, and F, on the horns, was full of the holiday spirit of the peasant fete.

The programme was admirably designed to show the varied possibilities of the orchestra, every instrument having its opportunity! The virtuosity demanded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice," and the Liszt Rhapsody"; the tenderness and beauty of the Bizet Suite; the sonorous unity of ensemble, and depth of feeling in the "Fifth Symphony," could not have better shown the admirable versatility of the orchestra. F. J. F.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 17,

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Displays Its Virtuosity

In spite of the gloomy weather, an audience of good size attended the first Pension Fund concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was no soloist save that greatest of soloists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was one well calculated to make a wide popular appeal: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; four movements from the "L'Árlesienne" music of Bizet; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice"; Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody.

It is needless to say that Dr. Muck's mastery of his orchestra and his score, and the noble sincerity that especially attends his performances of Beethoven, made the familiar symphony thrill the hearer anew. Of Bizet's inimitable music there was a brilliant performance, in which the finish of the playing of the woodwind instruments was especially noticeable. For a lesson in the singing of melodies, in phrasing, attack, dynamics, in all that pertains to the most artistic musical performance, these players again distinguished themselves.

But it was in the following number, in the scintillating caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff, that the orchestra displayed its virtuosity, singly and en masse. This score remains one of the most entertaining in the modern musical library, and under Dr. Muck's baton it fairly glowed with color. The performance of the Spanish caprice was in itself worth the attendance at the concert, and in the performance of Liszt's rhapsody, become almost banal by over-frequent performance, the conductor took as great pains as he had with the Russian music or the symphony by Beethoven. He was rewarded by the heartiest applause, and after the Beethoven symphony, while the en[illegible] was making known its [illegible] Muck signalled to [illegible] knowledge the [illegible]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 9 - 191
Esta

As for the true musical cognoscenti, on Monday night they found their dilettante way to the old Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony dealt them happiness in long draughts of the most delectable harmony. The house was packed with real music lovers, whose souls reveled in the immortal Seventh Symphony and who gathered enough phonic delight to last them another month. It was truly a marvelous concert. It seems as though that orchestra had reached the very limit of human perfection. The huge audience—the line extended to Spruce street, and when I went in a man was crying "There is not a seat in the house"—was apparently as well trained to the best as were the performers. As for the latter's work, there was an exquisite finish about it that nothing in this country can approach. Indeed, I am inclined to believe that there is nothing even abroad that surpasses it. The manner in which the orchestra accompanied the "Traum," sung by Farrar, was so full of finest reserve, so poetic, so inspired, that one felt like leaving the house then, to carry away the impression untouched, to live with it, to dream of it, to feed on it one's mind and one's very soul.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

THE HERR DOKTOR HUNDWURST REVIEWS IT

Vulgarity Expounded and Analyzed from the Original Sources—The Dance and Its Relation to the Mob—Beethoven, Liszt and Rimsky-Korsakoff Under His Scrutiny

THE first concert of the Pension Fund series pleased a large audience yesterday afternoon. Herr Doktor Hundwurst said it was vulgar. He traced the word vulgar from the Latin vulgus, meaning crowd. Horace hated the crowd, he said, and Horace was a patrician, and so was he, Herr Doktor Hundwurst. The vulgar he further defined as that which everyone can understand, as opposed to what he, Herr Doktor Hundwurst, could understand. And since he had spent eight years at the University of Allesundnichts, taking a doctorate in subliminal æsthetics, and the crowd had spent most of its time tending to its daily pursuits, it followed that what he could understand was much finer than what it could understand. That, said the learned Herr Doktor, was logic, so it must be true.

He pointed out first of all that the whole programme, barring the symphony, was made up of dance music. There was the suite from Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" incidental music, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice, and Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Bizet was a mere Frenchman. True, Nietzsche thought him a very great composer, and closer to der Wille than Wagner, but that was after Nietzsche had begun to go crazy. The "L'Arlésienne" music was written for the theatre and the theatre is always vulgar. As for the Spanish Caprice, the Herr Doktor had never heard a piece of music in which mere rhythm played such a large part in proportion to the melodic and harmonic factors. As for rhythm he would speak of that sufficiently later on. Concerning the Hungarian Rhapsody he observed merely that its tunes were composed by wandering singers, whose women folk were fortune-tellers, men who had never learned the difference between a primary and a secondary seventh.

If there were any further proof needed that the music was vulgar, the Herr Doktor continued, it was furnished in the fact that the whole crowd (Latin, vulgus) responded from the first note throughout. Probably not two dozen of them had ever had a score in their hands; the engraved page would bring them no more pleasure than a chorus of Æschylus. And two-thirds of them, he was willing to wager, would go to a musical comedy in the course of the coming week. There was thus an internal relationship between the Second Hungarian Rhapsody and musical comedy, which meant either that musical comedy is on the level of the Rhapsody, or that the Rhapsody is on the level of musical comedy. Since the first supposition was ipso facto absurd, ergo the second must be true.

The Herr Doktor pointed out the peculiarly vulgar way in which the Spanish Caprice was scored. No composer, he asserted, used his orchestra so much as a whole—that is, used his separate instruments so much as a vulgus. All the strings might be playing pizzicato at once, against a theme by all the winds, giving thus a peculiar sense of unity to the orchestra. The Herr Doktor felt that this was a denial of the individual qualities of the instruments themselves. He believes in an individualistic organization of society, and therefore objects to the conception of many individuals as forming merely a crowd.

But it was chiefly to the way in which all the pieces manipulated rhythm that the Herr Doktor objected. Rhythm, he explained, is the regular recurrence of beats, organized into measures, repeated with vulgar similarity one after the other. The peculiar property of rhythm is that it makes a purely physical [illegible] once in a beer hall in Leipsic how the host sat down at the piano and thumped the keys rhythmically, tum-tum, tum-tum, long short, long short—a trochaic metre, explained the Herr Doktor—and all the men and girls took to dancing on the spot. This was because the regularly recurring beats awakened an answering muscular contraction in the hearers' bodies, according to frequently verified experiments which the Herr Doktor had made at the University of Allesundnichts. It was a purely physical response, operating directly through the nerves and not through the intelligence. Rhythm überhaupt, he said, operated through the nerves and not through the intelligence, hence rhythm is no part of music as such (die Musik-an-sich) but is only an accidental consequence of music. When it becomes the dominant factor, the music becomes vulgar. It arouses the desire to move the arms and legs, even the head, in unison with it, much as the savage dances at the beat of the tom-tom. Such rhythmic use of music will always please the crowd, and the composer who makes use of it is, ceteris paribus, a vulgar composer.

Concerning Beethoven, the Herr Doktor explained that the case was different. Beethoven, it was true, made abundant use of rhythm in the Fifth Symphony, which was undoubtedly the reason it was chosen for the Pension Fund concert. But in Beethoven's case it was not a desire to evoke an answering movement of the arms and legs but the effort of the will to achieve phenomenon, according to Schopenhauer's philosophy. Just as the flower—the ideal flower, which is the real flower—seeks expression by creating a phenomenal image of itself in matter, so Beethoven, struggling with the problem of will and idea, was forced to use mere physical rhythm as a phenomenon of the constant pressure of will under the repressing influence of the world about him. The vulgus, however, could not understand this theory, which was the peculiar property of the Allesundnichts school of metaphysics, hence the vulgus regarded Beethoven as a mere dance-writer. Schrecklich! !

The Herr Doktor considered it extremely regrettable that Dr. Muck had condescended to read the whole programme as vulgarly as his taste could possibly allow. All the rhythms were taken slowly, creating a sense of grandeur which always appeals to the imagination of the rabble. The accent was everywhere made as strong as possible. Contrasts were given the utmost sharpness. From internal evidence, the Herr Doktor said, he could, with the help of his charts, prove that the readings were vulgar. But he was spared the necessity, since the delight which an untutored rabble took in the whole programme proved its vulgarity circumstantially.

Finally, the Herr Doktor Hundwurst felt it deplorable that so many of the cultured of Boston, even those who had had the advantage of a German education, never troubled to point out these facts, but actually expressed their pleasure in vulgarity, which, even though felt, should never be made known, as it has a degrading effect upon the general Sittlichkeit—the manners and morals of the community. As he finished his fourth stein of Münchner he pointed to the uneaten ham sandwich, without which Münchner is not procurable on Sunday in Boston, and observed, with profound symbolism, that it is not like that in Germany. H. K. M.

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 17,

MUSIC

The concert called out no unusual enthusiasm, although it had a number of spectacular points. There was appreciation for the performance of the fifth symphony sufficient to recall the conductor twice, with the customary result of his bidding his men to stand in acknowledgement. But there was nothing like the surging interest evoked by the Wagnerian program of last season. As the conductor interpreted his selection, there were two high points of interest, one toward the close of the first division of the program and the other just beyond the middle of the second division. Thus the day's work was treated as a whole rather than as a collection of detached artistic efforts. This method of presenting the four pieces may have been more subtle than was advisable at such a concert, if applause was the object in view; because an early awakening of interest is generally necessary if a popular audience is going to let itself go in loud handclapping.

It would be a strange program in which Dr. Muck did not do something unexpected. In popular numbers especially he is to be depended on for overturning any preconceived notions his listeners may have. Usually the emphasis in the fifth symphony is on the first and second movements. The last section of the work is played as a relaxation for the hearers after a mood of exaltation and one of profound contemplation. But not so on Sunday afternoon. The scherzo and its associated movement, the finale, were the fifth symphony.

The music of Bizet was made to serve the program, instead of being put forward as something of large importance in itself. It was a preparation for the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Having the same clear and open ideas as the first [illegible] movements of the fifth symphony, [illegible] being almost as much a part of [illegible]body's musical possession, the little [illegible] of which the suite is composed, did [illegible] his house already understands. He is not the interpreter to use up all the attention of his listeners on what they may know well some time, even if they do not today. He is for getting to them some message which can be delivered now and only now. That message he saw in the work of the Russian orchestral painter, and with great vigor and brilliancy he presented it.

Under such interpretation the public gets a bold picture of itself. Under it the modern city shakes itself out of its old attitude of contemplation and enters into one of world contact. The brooding music of the first half of the fifth symphony and of the Bizet suite were the exact response to the art sentiment of the community a decade or two ago. Now the barrier-breaking purpose of the finale of the symphony and the nation-jogging idea of the "Spanish Caprice" tell our story.

DR. MUCK IN POPULAR PROGRAM

Before the lightest house that has ever greeted him in Boston Dr. Karl Muck presented Beethoven's fifth symphony, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody at the first pension fund concert of the season in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon. The balconies were filled, the dollar patrons of the Sunday concerts being loyal to the managers, but the floor showed many open spaces, the payers of the higher prices not finding an orchestral program of well known works without soloist an attraction.

GLOBE—NOVEMBER 16,

Pension Fund Concert Today in Symphony Hall

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra will be the first of the two given annually in aid of the Pension Fund of that organization. These concerts are always the occasion of an outpouring of the friends of the orchestra who wish to aid the excellent cause, and also they attract a large number of the general public which does not attend the regular Symphony concerts.

The program opens with the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, the Fifth, which for more than 100 years has been the most popular work of its kind in musical literature.

The second half of the program is frankly popular. It begins with the first "L'Arlesienne Suite" of Bizet. This is in four parts, a prelude, adagio, minuetto and carillon. Bizet wrote this music to be played incidental to the performance of Daudet's "L'Arlesienne," the famous play in which the heroine does not appear but is only talked of. Some of this music is now used for the ballet in the last act of "Carmen."

The next number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant arrangement of Spanish tunes which he calls the "Spanish Caprice." The final number, the second "Hungarian Rhapsody" of Liszt, is seldom played by the full orchestra, although it frequently appears on "Pop" programs in the Spring.

Maggie Teyte's Costume Recital of Ancient Songs

Maggie Teyt, the English prima donna soprano, who will be a guest singer with the Boston Opera Company this season, will present a charming novelty in the way of a song recital at the Copley-Plaza Hotel next Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock, when, appearing in various costumes of the period, she will sing an entire program of 18th-century French songs to the accompaniment of the Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments.

Instead of the usual piano accompanimnt, the instruments used will be the harpsichord, the hautbois d'amour, the viola d'amour and the viola de gamba. Al the songs presented by Miss Teyte are from manuscript, consequently special arrangement had to be made for the instruments.

The quartet, which has lately been organized, has for members Messrs A. Gietzen, M. Belinski, P. Fosse and C. W. Adams.

Piano Recital by Mr Bachaus on Thursday

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist who played here individually and with the Symphony Orchestra last season, will give a recital Thursday afternoon at Jordan Hall. The pianist is still a young man. He was born in Leipsic in 1884. He studied nine years with Reckendorf and one year with d'Albert and at the age of 16 made his first public appearance with the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conducting. From that day Bachaus has advanced without interruption to the goal he has attained.

His program will include Brahms' rhapsodie in G minor; Scarlatti allegro in G major and Scherzo in F minor; Beethoven's sonata, op 57; a group of studies by Chopin; a serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus); Soiree de Vienne by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement); prelude in F minor by Rachmaninoff; Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing," and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's military march.

Boston Opera House Sunday Evening Concerts

The first decision not to give Sunday concerts at the Opera House this season proved a temporary one. The present arrangement is to offer a series of Sunday evening concerts, at which the principal singers of the company will appear.

Among them the public will hear Mary Garden and Mme Tetrazzini, Lucrezia Bori, Louise Edvina, Alice Nielsen, Mme D'Alvarez, Rienskaja, Matzenauer and Gay, and the chief tenors and baritones of the house—Martinelli, Fontana, Marcoux, Mardones, Lankow and others to be announced from time to time. There will be no orchestra.

ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven............Symphony in C minor, No. 5
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Bizet..................Suite, "L'Arlesienne, No. 1
- (a) Prelude.
- (b) Minuetto.
- (c) Adagietto.
- (d) Carillon.

Rimsky-Korsakoff....Caprice on Spanish Themes Op. 34.

Liszt..................Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2

A Pension Fund Concert without the "Pathetique," and with no Wagner numbers on the programme is such a Rara Avis that one must perforce praise its plumage! In this instance duty and inclination are identical.

The large audience had the welcome opportunity of showing its esteem for the splendid work of this body of musicians who have made this city known as a music centre here and abroad, and which has helped in no small degree to give a fine education in the classics to the thousands of students who congregate in Boston.

Dr. Muck is teaching the younger generation (and the older too) Beethoven. Thus early in the season we have already had the fifth, sixth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, and a lot of Mozart and Haydn besides.

The "Fifth Symphony" was given with fine sonority of tone and clarity of design, and the strings, wood wind and brass played with their usual distinction. The violins and 'cellos showed great beauty of tone and feeling in the "Andante;" the double basses distinguished themselves by the gusto with which they played the elephantine dance-theme of the "Scherzo;" superb spirit was shown in the finale in which the brass took a noble part.

Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," incidental music to Daudet's "Woman of Arles" (where the "woman" does not appear on the stage), is a beautiful pastoral romance. The "Overture-Prelude" is made up of three themes, opening with an old Provencal Noel attributed to Good King Rene, followed by a melancholy theme, and one of a sombre and passionate character.

The "Minuetto," at first a dance with jerky rhythm that amusingly pictures the movements of the old peasants, towards the middle becomes the tender theme of the aged lovers, beautifully "sung" by the wood wind with harp accompaniment.

In the Adagietto (or Adagio, as it was at first called), the tender love lyric was played with exquisite beauty of tone by the 'cellos, violas, and violins, while the double basses listened in silent admiration.

The Carillon, with its bell-like reiteration of the sharps G, E, and F, on the horns, was full of the holiday spirit of the peasant fete.

The programme was admirably designed to show the varied possibilities of the orchestra, every instrument having its opportunity! The virtuosity demanded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice," and the Liszt Rhapsody"; the tenderness and beauty of the Bizet Suite; the sonorous unity of ensemble, and depth of feeling in the "Fifth Symphony," could not have better shown the admirable versatility of the orchestra.

F. J. F.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 17,

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Displays Its Virtuosity

In spite of the gloomy weather, an audience of good size attended the first Pension Fund concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was no soloist save that greatest of soloists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was one well calculated to make a wide popular appeal: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; four movements from the "L'Arlesienne" music of Bizet; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice"; Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody.

It is needless to say that Dr. Muck's mastery of his orchestra and his score, and the noble sincerity that especially attends his performances of Beethoven, made the familiar symphony thrill the hearer anew. Of Bizet's inimitable music there was a brilliant performance, in which the finish of the playing of the woodwind instruments was especially noticeable. For a lesson in the singing of melodies, in phrasing, attack, dynamics, in all that pertains to the most artistic musical performance, these players again distinguished themselves.

But it was in the following number, in the scintillating caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff, that the orchestra displayed its virtuosity, singly and en masse. This score remains one of the most entertaining in the modern musical library, and under Dr. Muck's baton it fairly glowed with color. The performance of the Spanish caprice was in itself worth the attendance at the concert, and in the performance of Liszt's rhapsody, become almost banal by over-frequent performance, the conductor took as great pains as he had with the Russian music or the symphony by Beethoven. He was rewarded by the heartiest applause, and after the Beethoven symphony, while the en[illegible] was making known its [illegible] Muck signalled to [illegible] acknowledge th[illegible]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 9 - 191[illegible]

As for the true musical cognoscenti, on Monday night they found their dilettante way to the old Academy of Music, where the Boston Symphony dealt them happiness in long draughts of the most delectable harmony. The house was packed with real music lovers, whose souls reveled in the immortal Seventh Symphony and who gathered enough phonic delight to last them another month. It was truly a marvelous concert. It seems as though that orchestra had reached the very limit of human perfection. The huge audience—the line extended to Spruce street, and when I went in a man was crying "There is not a seat in the house"—was apparently as well trained to the best as were the performers. As for the latter's work, there was an exquisite finish about it that nothing in this country can approach. Indeed, I am inclined to believe that there is nothing even abroad that surpasses it. The manner in which the orchestra accompanied the "Traum," sung by Farrar, was so full of finest reserve, so poetic, so inspired, that one felt like leaving the house then, to [illegible] away the impression untouched, to [illegible] it, to dream of it, to feed on it [illegible] and one's very soul.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

THE HERR DOKTOR HUNDWURST REVIEWS IT

Vulgarity Expounded and Analyzed from the Original Sources—The Dance and Its Relation to the Mob—Beethoven, Liszt and Rimsky-Korsakoff Under His Scrutiny

THE first concert of the Pension Fund series pleased a large audience yesterday afternoon. Herr Doktor Hundwurst said it was vulgar. He traced the word vulgar from the Latin vulgus, meaning crowd. Horace hated the crowd, he said, and Horace was a patrician, and so was he, Herr Doktor Hundwurst. The vulgar he further defined as that which everyone can understand, as opposed to what he, Herr Doktor Hundwurst, could understand. And since he had spent eight years at the University of Allesundnichts, taking a doctorate in subliminal æsthetics, and the crowd had spent most of its time tending to its daily pursuits, it followed that what he could understand was much finer than what it could understand. That, said the learned Herr Doktor, was logic, so it must be true.

He pointed out first of all that the whole programme, barring the symphony, was made up of dance music. There was the suite from Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" incidental music, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice, and Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Bizet was a mere Frenchman. True, Nietzsche thought him a very great composer, and closer to der Wille than Wagner, but that was after Nietzsche had begun to go crazy. The "L'Arlésienne" music was written for the theatre and the theatre is always vulgar. As for the Spanish Caprice, the Herr Doktor had never heard a piece of music in which mere rhythm played such a large part in proportion to the melodic and harmonic factors. As for rhythm he would speak of that sufficiently later on. Concerning the Hungarian Rhapsody he observed merely that its tunes were composed by wandering singers, whose women folk were fortune-tellers, men who had never learned the difference between a primary and a secondary seventh.

If there were any further proof needed that the music was vulgar, the Herr Doktor continued, it was furnished in the fact that the whole crowd (Latin, vulgus) responded from the first note throughout. Probably not two dozen of them had ever had a score in their hands; the engraved page would bring them no more pleasure than a chorus of Æschylus. And two-thirds of them, he was willing to wager, would go to a musical comedy in the course of the coming week. There was thus an internal relationship between the Second Hungarian Rhapsody and musical comedy, which meant either that musical comedy is on the level of the Rhapsody, or that the Rhapsody is on the level of musical comedy. Since the first supposition was ipso facto absurd, ergo the second must be true.

The Herr Doktor pointed out the peculiarly vulgar way in which the Spanish Caprice was scored. No composer, he asserted, used his orchestra so much as a whole—that is, used his separate instruments so much as a vulgus. All the strings might be playing pizzicato at once, against a theme by all the winds, giving thus a peculiar sense of unity to the orchestra. The Herr Doktor felt that this was a denial of the individual qualities of the instruments themselves. He believes in an individualistic organization of society, and therefore objects to the conception of many individuals as forming merely a crowd.

But it was chiefly to the way in which all the pieces manipulated rhythm that the Herr Doktor objected. Rhythm, he explained, is the regular recurrence of beats, organized into measures, repeated with vulgar similarity one after the other. The peculiar property of rhythm is that it makes a purely physical [illegible] once in a beer hall in Leipsic how the host sat down at the piano and thumped the keys rhythmically, tum-tum, tum-tum, long short, long short—a trochaic metre, explained the Herr Doktor—and all the men and girls took to dancing on the spot. This was because the regularly recurring beats awakened an answering muscular contraction in the hearers' bodies, according to the frequently verified experiments which the Herr Doktor had made at the University of Allesundnichts. It was a purely physical response, operating directly through the nerves and not through the intelligence. Rhythm überhaupt, he said, operated through the nerves and not through the intelligence, hence rhythm is no part of music as such (die Musik-an-sich) but is only an accidental consequence of music. When it becomes the dominant factor, the music becomes vulgar. It arouses the desire to move the arms and legs, even the head, in unison with it, much as the savage dances at the beat of the tom-tom. Such rhythmic use of music will always please the crowd, and the composer who makes use of it is, ceteris paribus, a vulgar composer.

Concerning Beethoven, the Herr Doktor explained that the case was different. Beethoven, it was true, made abundant use of rhythm in the Fifth Symphony, which was undoubtedly the reason it was chosen for the Pension Fund concert. But in Beethoven's case it was not a desire to evoke an answering movement of the arms and legs but the effort of the will to achieve phenomenon, according to Schopenhauer's philosophy. Just as the flower—the ideal flower, which is the real flower—seeks expression by creating a phenomenal image of itself in matter, so Beethoven, struggling with the problem of will and idea, was forced to use mere physical rhythm as a phenomenon of the constant pressure of will under the repressing influence of the world about him. The vulgus, however, could not understand this theory, which was the peculiar property of the Allesundnichts school of metaphysics, hence the vulgus regarded Beethoven as a mere dance-writer. Schrecklich!!

The Herr Doktor considered it extremely regrettable that Dr. Muck had condescended to read the whole programme as vulgarly as his taste could possibly allow. All the rhythms were taken slowly, creating a sense of grandeur which always appeals to the imagination of the rabble. The accent was everywhere made as strong as possible. Contrasts were given the utmost sharpness. From internal evidence, the Herr Doktor said, he could, with the help of his charts, prove that the readings were vulgar. But he was spared the necessity, since the delight which an untutored rabble took in the whole programme proved its vulgarity circumstantially.

Finally, the Herr Doktor Hundwurst felt it deplorable that so many of the cultured of Boston, even those who had had the advantage of a German education, never troubled to point out these facts, but actually expressed their pleasure in vulgarity, which, even though felt, should never be made known, as it has a degrading effect upon the general Sittlichkeit—the manners and morals of the community. As he finished his fourth stein of Münchner he pointed to the uneaten ham sandwich, without which Münchner is not procurable on Sunday in Boston, and observed, with profound symbolism, that it is not like that in Germany.

H. K. M.

MONITOR, NOVEMBER 17,

MUSIC

The concert called out no unusual enthusiasm, although it had a number of spectacular points. There was appreciation for the performance of the fifth symphony sufficient to recall the conductor twice, with the customary result of his bidding his men to stand in acknowledgement. But there was nothing like the surging interest evoked by the Wagnerian program of last season. As the conductor interpreted his selection, there were two high points of interest, one toward the close of the first division of the program and the other just beyond the middle of the second division. Thus the day's work was treated as a whole rather than as a collection of detached artistic efforts. This method of presenting the four pieces may have been more subtle than was advisable at such a concert, if applause was the object in view; because an early awakening of interest is generally necessary if a popular audience is going to let itself go in loud handclapping.

It would be a strange program in which Dr. Muck did not do something unexpected. In popular numbers especially he is to be depended on for overturning any preconceived notions his listeners may have. Usually the emphasis in the fifth symphony is on the first and second movements. The last section of the work is played as a relaxation for the hearers after a mood of exaltation and one of profound contemplation. But not so on Sunday afternoon. The scherzo and its associated movement, the finale, were the fifth symphony.

The music of Bizet was made to serve the program, instead of being put forward as something of large importance in itself. It was a preparation for the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Having the same clear and open ideas as the first two movements of the fifth symphony, being almost as much a part of everybody's musical possession, the little [illegible] of which the suite is composed, did [illegible] his house already understands. He is not the interpreter to use up all the attention of his listeners on what they may know well some time, even if they do not today. He is for getting to them some message which can be delivered now and only now. That message he saw in the work of the Russian orchestral painter, and with great vigor and brilliancy he presented it.

Under such interpretation the public gets a bold picture of itself. Under it the modern city shakes itself out of its old attitude of contemplation and enters into one of world contact. The brooding music of the first half of the fifth symphony and of the Bizet suite were the exact response to the art sentiment of the community a decade or two ago. Now the barrier-breaking purpose of the finale of the symphony and the nation-jogging idea of the "Spanish Caprice" tell our story.

DR. MUCK IN POPULAR PROGRAM

Before the lightest house that has ever greeted him in Boston Dr. Karl Muck presented Beethoven's fifth symphony, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody at the first pension fund concert of the season in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon. The balconies were filled, the dollar patrons of the Sunday concerts being loyal to the managers, but the floor showed many open spaces, the payers of the higher prices not finding an orchestral program of well known works without soloist an attraction.

GLOBE—NOVEMBER 16,

Pension Fund Concert Today in Symphony Hall

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra will be the first of the two given annually in aid of the Pension Fund of that organization. These concerts are always the occasion of an outpouring of the friends of the orchestra who wish to aid the excellent cause, and also they attract a large number of the general public which does not attend the regular Symphony concerts.

The program opens with the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, the Fifth, which for more than 100 years has been the most popular work of its kind in musical literature.

The second half of the program is frankly popular. It begins with the first "L'Arlesienne Suite" of Bizet. This is in four parts, a prelude, adagio, minuetto and carillon. Bizet wrote this music to be played incidental to the performance of Daudet's "L'Arlesienne," the famous play in which the heroine does not appear but is only talked of. Some of this music is now used for the ballet in the last act of "Carmen."

The next number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant arrangement of Spanish tunes which he calls the "Spanish Caprice." The final number, the second "Hungarian Rhapsody" of Liszt, is seldom played by the full orchestra, although it frequently appears on "Pop" programs in the Spring.

Maggie Teyte's Costume Recital of Ancient Songs

Maggie Teyt, the English prima donna soprano, who will be a guest singer with the Boston Opera Company this season, will present a charming novelty in the way of a song recital at the Copley-Plaza Hotel next Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock, when, appearing in various costumes of the period, she will sing an entire program of 18th-century French songs to the accompaniment of the Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments.

Instead of the usual piano accompanimnt, the instruments used will be the harpsichord, the hautbois d'amour, the viola d'amour and the viola de gamba. Al the songs presented by Miss Teyte are from manuscript, consequently special arrangement had to be made for the instruments.

The quartet, which has lately been organized, has for members Messrs A. Gietzen, M. Belinski, P. Fosse and C. W. Adams.

Piano Recital by Mr Bachaus on Thursday

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist who played here individually and with the Symphony Orchestra last season, will give a recital Thursday afternoon at Jordan Hall. The pianist is still a young man. He was born in Leipsic in 1884. He studied nine years with Reckendorf and one year with d'Albert and at the age of 16 made his first public appearance with the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conducting. From that day Bachaus has advanced without interruption to the goal he has attained.

His program will include Brahms' rhapsodie in G minor; Scarlatti allegro in G major and Scherzo in F minor; Beethoven's sonata, op 57; a group of studies by Chopin; a serenade by Strauss (transcription by Bachaus); Soiree de Vienne by Schubert (Liszt's arrangement); prelude in F minor by Rachmaninoff; Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "I Heard a Streamlet Gushing," and Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's military march.

Boston Opera House Sunday Evening Concerts

The first decision not to give Sunday concerts at the Opera House this season proved a temporary one. The present arrangement is to offer a series of Sunday evening concerts, at which the principal singers of the company will appear.

Among them the public will hear Mary Garden and Mme Tetrazzini, Lucrezia Bori, Louise Edvina, Alice Nielsen, Mme D'Alvarez, Rienskaja, Matzenauer and Gay, and the chief tenors and baritones of the house—Martinelli, Fontana, Marcoux, Mardones, Lankow and others to be announced from time to time. There will be no orchestra.

Mahler's fifth Symphony will be the feature of the Boston Symphony programs Nov 21 and 22. Of all the works performed under Dr Muck's direction last season this symphony of Gustav Mahler left unquestionably the deepest impression on patrons of the concerts and the opportunity to hear it again within a comparatively short time undoubtedly will be warmly welcomed.

There will only be two works on the program, as the symphony is very long. The second will be Mozart's "Notturno" in D, for four small orchestras. This will be a novelty to practically everybody. It has been played but once since the orchestra organized. In its first year Mr Henschel, who was the conductor, gave it a place on a Mozart program of Jan 27 and 28, 1882.

Paderewski Next Sunday.

Paderewski will give his second recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. This will be the first time he has given a recital in Boston on a Sunday, and will enable many to hear him who are unable to attend his weekly concerts. He will not be heard again in Boston until the Spring, when he is to appear with the Symphony Orchestra.

His program is as follows: Variations and Fugue in E-flat minor, op 23, Paderewski; sonata in D minor, op 31, Beethoven; "Des Abends," "Grillen," "Warum," "Aufschwung," Schumann; "Soiree de Vienne," No. 6, and "Erl King," Schubert-Liszt; ballade, op 47, nocturne in B major, op 62, polonaise, Chopin; "Isoldensliebestod," Wagner-Liszt; mazurka in D major, Rubinstein.

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra Nov 28 and 29 and then will accompany the orchestra on its December trip, returning to Boston to give his recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec 7, at 3:30. Tickets will go on sale Friday, Nov 28.

John Chipman's Recital.

The program prepared by John Chipman, the American tenor, for his recital in Steinert Hall next Tuesday afternoon will be divided into four parts. The first group and the last will be sung in English, the second in French and the third in German.

Mr Chipman, a native of Boston, is an American singer in the full sense of the word, his training and career having been entirely in this country. While Boston is not familiar with his work, he is well and favorably known in New York and the cities of the Middle West.

GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 22,

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY REPEATED

Colossal Work in Epic Spirit Superbly Played.

Grows in Nobility and Grandeur in Spite of Some Prolix Passages.

Mahler's fifth symphony stands repetition. An interval of months preceding a repetition of a musical work is sometimes a severer test than one of weeks. Then only the broad lines of the first impression are left. Detail that may have particularly engrossed the fancy or filled the ear has paled or been obliterated, and the second hearing, while not forgetting certain convictions that followed the first, still possesses eagerness and freshness as of new tablets yet to be written upon.

When Dr Muck played this imposing work last year for the second time, or rather the third and fourth times during his regime in Boston, it made a profound impression. And that was near the close of the season, which had not lacked for musical entertainment.

Again yesterday afternoon this symphony, conceived and for the greater part wrought in the epic vein, held the audience, called forth demonstrative applause at the close of the first two divisions, according to Mahler's multiplied tabulation, and impelled continued handclapping after the last, which the conductor acknowledged with the usual tribute to the men, himself joining in the demonstration and showing his admiration and thanks for the manner of their performance. It was one beyond which it would seem that orchestral and individual virtuosity could not go.

Some Wearying Moments.

An orchestral composition even freely in the symphonic form that plays over an hour—this one ran about 70 minutes—and maintains an unfaltering level of significance would be the work of a superman. None will deny that there are passages which the composer may have heard in a more sublemated and less obvious form, but when set upon paper and reproduced by instruments appear to weigh down rather than to speed imagination.

In the last movement, the fugal theme beginning with the descending skip of the fourth is persistent and rhythmically monotonous to the point of weariness. There are portions of the development in the stormy pages of the first part wherein the composer suggests and approaches an impeding climax, only to defer it until anticipation wanes.

But these are of short duration, interludes between noble and loftily sustained passages wherein the orchestra seems the inevitable and primal medium of a great mind and spirit.

It is not impossible that certain pages of this work will increase in majesty and beauty as they increase in number of performances—the dead march, in which the thought of the grave is not crushing, overwhelming; parts of the scherzo, where Mahler could not long forsake the serious vein, and above all, the heavenly calm of the slow movement for strings. Only genius could have expressed the serene confidence of faith that Mahler expresses here by the simple use of deferred resolutions in his melody, particularly in those final measures, which seem a gigantic scroll let down from the heavens.

Work for the Trumpet.

Any record of the symphony or of the performance would be incomplete that did not note the herculean responsibility Mahler lays upon the first trumpet, and Mr Heim's heroic discharge of it. The part demands a clarion tone, an extraordinary range and a style that might have announced across the skies the birth of each new star.

Mozart's nocturne for four small orchestras (string quartet and two horns) was a foil for this titian music. The antiphonal chantings of the themes, by turns pompous, smug and airily graceful, sounded prettily, if somewhat monotonously, but cannot be said to bring forth the best in Mozart.

Mr Kreisler will be soloist next week in concertos by Mozart and Vivaldi. The orchestra will play Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" (first time in Boston), Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

HERALD, BOSTON,

NOVEMBER 23,

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seventh Symphony concert, the last to be played by the orchestra before it leaves for its December trip, will have as soloist Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos, Mozart's in D major and Viotti's in A minor No. 22. The latter concerto was played here last winter by Mr. Ysaye at one of his recitals. The program will also contain one of the important novelties of the season, Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome." Florent Schmitt is of Lorraine by birth, but thoroughly French and Parisian by inclination and education. He belongs to the younger generation of French composers and has cut quite an important figure in French music during the last several years. An orchestral piece and chamber music by him have been heard here.

"La Tragedie de Salome" is in a sense a suite of dances. It draws its inspiration from quite another source than Oscar Wilde's play. The program in full is as follows:

Florent Schmitt......"La Tragedie de Salome"
Mozart............Violin Concerto in D Major
Cherubini..................Overture "Anacreon"
Viotti..............Violin Concerto in A Minor
Lalo....................Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys"

MR. PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL

Mr. Paderewski's recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will be his last appearance here until he comes as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in March. Whether he will give another recital in the spring is doubtful, but the chances are he will not.

The program this afternoon will begin with his own Variations and Fugue in E-flat minor, which will be followed by Beethoven's Sonota in D minor, op. 31. No. 2. Four pieces from Schumann's "Fantasiestuecke" follow—Des Abends, Grillen, Warum and Aufschwung. The rest of the program includes Liszt's transcription of Schubert's Erl King, Chopin's Ballade, op. 47; Nocturne in B major, op. 62, and a polonaise; Liszt's transcription of Wagner's "Isoldensliebestod" and Rubinstein's Mazurka in D major.

ELMENDORF LECTURES

"Eastern India" is the theme of the Elmendorf travel talk to be presented at Symphony Hall next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. The lecture, a continuation of his narrative of last week, will take up his India journey from Delhi to Darjeeling, and three of the greatest wonders of the world will be vividly revealed—the Taj Mahal; and the highest of earth's mountains, Mount Everest, more than 29,000 feet high. There will also be visits to Cawnpore, Lucknow, Agra and Jaipur. The motion pictures will cover a wide range, showing the Nautch dancers, reviews of the regiments of Rajput soldiery, religious and funeral ceremonies, native potters at work and remarkable snake pictures.

THE LONGY CLUB

The Longy Club will give its first concert of the season in Jordan Hall next Thursday evening, Thanksgiving night, Nov. 27. The membership of the club remains unchanged: Messrs. Maquarre and Brooke, flutes; Longy and Lenom, oboes; Grisez and Mimart, clarinets; Haim and Lorbeer, horns; Sadony and Mosbach, bassoons, with A. de Voto, pianist. At its first concert the club will be assisted by Mr. Theodorewicz, violinist. The first program will be devoted to American composers: Quintet in E flat, op. 18, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano, by Arne Oldberg; Howard Brockway, "At Twilight," and "An Idyl of Murmuring Water," for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Mason's Pastorale for violin, clarinet and piano; Bird's Serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

The next and concluding lecture of the regular course will be on "Java."

MME. GADSKI IN RECITAL

The high artistic standard of the Sunday concerts that are being held in Symphony Hall this season will be fully maintained next week, Nov. 30, when Mme. Johanna Gadski will give a song recital. Although primarily an opera singer, and as such, chiefly identified with roles in Wagner's music dramas, Mme. Gadski in the last several years has devoted at least half her time to concert work and particularly to song recitals. She naturally clings closely to German song, but she has done much to spread the knowledge of American song writers. Her program will be as follows:

[illegible]
Nacht und Traeume }
Maedchens Klage } ....Schubert
Ungeduld }
Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen }
Liebchen ist da } ....Franz
Im Herbst }
Mainacht }
Auf dem Kirchhof } ....Brahms
Meine Liebe ist gruen }
Verborgenheit..........Hugo Wolf
Im Treibhaus..........Wagner
Serenade }
Zueignung } ....R. Strauss
Ein Schwan }
Good Morning } ....Grieg
A Slumber Song..........H. C. Gilmour
The Swan Bent Low }
Midsummer Lullaby } ....MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light..........MacDowell

KATHLEEN PARLOW

Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 24, at 3 o'clock. Her art is already known in Boston and it has been enthusiastically applauded. Her program will be as follows:

Concerto in D minor, Vieuxtemps; La Folia Variations, Corelli; Nocturne, Chopin-Auer; Bird as Prophet, Schumann-Auer; Walzer Paraphrase, Hubay; Aria, Goldmark; Vivace, Haydn-Auer; Carneval Russe, Wieniawski.

Charles Keith will accompany.

MILTON CONCERTS

These concerts will be given in the town hall of Milton under the auspices of the Milton Education Society:

On Jan. 20, a concert by Jean Gerardy, 'cellist, and Mme. Yolande Mero, pianist.

On March 26, a choral concert by a chorus of 100 voices. Goring Thomas's "Swan and Skylark"; part songs by Schumann, Rheinberger, MacFarland and others. The names of the solo singers will be announced later.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY—Symphony Hall, 3:30 P. M. Second piano recital of Mr. Paderewski. See special notice.

MONDAY—Jordan Hall, 3 PM. Violin recital by Miss Kathleen Parlow. See special notice.

TUESDAY—Steinert Hall, 8:15 P. M. Song recital by Uriah Sumter Richards, basso profundo, assisted by Wesley I. Howard, violinist, and Miss Theresa E. Stubbs, accompanist.

THURSDAY—Jordan Hall, 8:15 P. M. First concert of the Longy Club. See special notice.

Tremont Temple, 8 P. M. Second Tremont Temple concert. Violin solos Brahms-Joachim, Hungarian Dance; Rubinstein, Melody in F (Miss Ellen Keller); Thomas, Air from "Le Cadi" (Howard White); Thomas, polonaise from "Mignon" (Mme. Evelyn Scotney); old Scotch, Loch Lomond, Turn ye to me, The Laird of Cockpen (Mr. White); old Scotch, John Anderson, Skye Boat Song, Whistle and I'll Come to ye, my lad (Mme. Scotney); violin: Massenet, Meditation from "Thais"; Souvenir, Drilla; Kreisler, Old Vienna Waltz (Miss Keller); Hammond, The Pipes of Gordon's Men; Lemon, My ain folk; old Scotch, My Love is like a red, red Rose (Mr. White); Harris, The Hills o' Skye; de Koven, My hame is where the Heather blooms; Lindsay, Annie Laurie (Miss Scotney); Bemberg, Nymphes et Sylvains (Mme. Scotney, with violin and 'cello).

FRIDAY—Symphony Hall, 3:30 P. M. Seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor. See special notice.

SATURDAY—Symphony Hall, 8 P. M. Seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor. See special notice.

CONCERT NOTES

Franz Egenieff, baritone, who was to have given a recital in Jordan Hall on Nov. 3, but was obliged to postpone it on account of illness, has fully recovered and will sing on Monday, Dec. 1. His program will include songs by Hugo Wolf, Loewe, Schumann, Hubert Pataky, Hans Hermann, Jeno Kerntler, Arthur Foote and Hugo Kaun. Mr. Egenieff will sing two groups in English.

The Kneisel quartet will give its second concert this season in Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 2.

The Flonzaley quartet will give three subscription concerts this season in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Jan. 29 and March 12. Tickets are now ready for delivery and will be mailed on receipt of check.

The sale of seats for Fritz Kneisler's recital in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, at 3:30 P. M., will open at the box office Friday, Nov. 28. He will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts on the southern trip the week preceding.

Heinrich Gebhard will give a piano recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 8.

BOSTON GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 24,

PADEREWSKI IN SUPERB RECITAL

Master Pianist Thrills a Huge Audience.

Interprets Beethoven, Schumann With Recreative Art.

Mr Paderewski gave his second recital of the season yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. As at his first, the audience was limited only by the capacity of the hall. The great pianist was in brilliant form; he was more temperate in the use of thunderous tone; he was generous in the second concert, which began to thronged aisles and stage immediately at the close of the first; his first or printed program included music to be enjoyed by the laymen as well as the student; the ventilation was more conducive to comfort than at his previous appearance; altogether it was an afternoon [illegible]

Mr Paderewski [illegible] was the master interpreter who takes formulas of the composer's suggestions insofar as written symbols and unspoken [illegible] may transmit them, and causes them to flower out into thoughts of living, glowing beauty. It was as though a recreator had opened the book of Beethoven, of Schumann and Schubert and had read what they themselves may have dreamed of but could not wholly express.

The C sharp minor sonata, to which some enterprising publisher with much business acumen and no particular poetic insight long since affixed the title "moonlight," was as clear a revelation of a lofty spiritual loveliness as the group of short kaleidoscopic pieces—Des Abends, Grillen, Warnum—were blessed in their simplicity, tenderness, spontaneity, improvisational musing, as though this were the inevitable way they should sound. The communicating vitality of rhythm and salon brilliance of the highest order made the dance music electrifying in Liszt's transcription of Schubert's Soiree de Vienne, and that of his erl king was a superb piece of dramatizing virtuosity—the spectral color of the erl king's voice, the fury of his quest, the frenzied fear of the child and the final doom—these were told with graphic eloquence.

The Chopin group included the Ballad in A flat, op 47; the B major nocturne op 62, No. 1, in which there were instances of a broken melodic line not common to the usual elasticity and proportion of rubato elsewhere, and the polonaise in A flat, op 53. Liszt's transcription of Isolda's "Love's Death" might better have remained one of his unpublished works. The apotheosis transcends the unlyric limitations of the piano and demands the sustained passion of voice or orchestra. Even Mr Paderewski cannot save it from its theatricalism. A brilliant performance of Liszt's sixth Hungarian rhapsody, scintillant with dynamic and rhythmic contrasts and incisive yet elusive octaves, followed. Thus endeth the first part. The concert had begun with the pianist's own variations and fugue in E flat minor, op 23. Some of these variations are not of the greatest musical value. Some might have been written for any pulsatile instrument—as the tympani; some might be sacrificed without great loss.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

NOVEMBER 22,

MAHLER CHIEF ON PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, called the Giant, not like Mozart's Jupiter because of its gigantic genius, but because it takes so long to perform, occupied the larger part of the symphony program yesterday.

The quaint and diverting little nocturne of Mozart for four small orchestras rounded out the afternoon.

It is only two years since the death of Mahler in Vienna. Not long before he visited Boston with the Metropolitan Opera and he was a well-known figure in New York. Perhaps we will respect him more when he has been dead longer, but already he is assuming an important place among deceased composers.

This giant symphony is too long, too voluble, too garrulous, too tautological. The Teutonic longwindedness of it simply overpowers an audience. It is exhausted at the conclusion of the hour and a quarter it takes to perform.

This is a great pity, for there is marvelous music in this symphony. It has its moments of magnificence, of towering genius. The "Dead March," with which it opens, is full of grandeur, the scerzo in part two is really full of grace, while the Rondo finale has much charm. Such a work cries for sympathetic condensation.

The performance of such a work is a mighty strain upon an orchestra and conductor. If the audience was stunned just by listening, what must have been the condition of the workers. Doctor Muck conducted with exceptional brilliancy. It is interesting to realize that the youthful-appearing Muck was chief conductor twenty-six years ago at Leipsic and Mahler was his second conductor.

The Mozart nocturne, a bewitching little trifle, was charmingly performed.

POST, NOVEMBER 23,

Kreisler Recital

The sale of seats for Fritz Kreisler's recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, at 3:30, will open at the box office Friday, Nov. 28. Kreisler is the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at all of its concerts of its Southern trip the preceding week and returns directly to Boston to give his recital here. His programme will be announced shortly.

Paderewski's Recital

Paderewski's recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will be the last appearance in Boston of the great artist until he comes as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in March. Whether he will give another recital in the spring is very doubtful, but the chances are he will not, for the tour before him is long and trying, and it is not likely that he will care to add any concerts to those already scheduled.

The programme he plays this afternoon is substantially the programme he played in New York a week ago today. His performance then was the cause of an outburst of praise on the part of the New York critics. He begins the programme with his variations and Fugue in E flat Minor, which will be followed by Beethoven's Sonata in D Minor, Op. 31, No. 2. Four pieces from the Schuman "Fantasiestuck" follow—Des Abends, Grillen, Warum and Aufschwung. The rest of the programme comprises Liszt's transcription of the Erl King; a group of Chopin consisting of the Ballade, Op. 47, Nocturne in B Major, Op. 62, and a Polonaise; Liszt's transcription of Wagner's "Isoldensliebestod" and Rubinstein's Mazurka in D Major.

Madame Gadski's Recital

The artistic standards of the Sunday concerts that are being held in Symphony Hall this season will be fully maintained next week, Nov. 30, when Mme. Johanna Gadski will give a song recital. The greater part of her programme will be devoted to classical songs by Schumann, Schubert, Franz and Brahms. Of Americans H. C. Gilmour is represented by one song and MacDowell by three. The programme is as follows:

Fruhlingsnacht, Lotosblume, Waldesgesprach............Schumann
[illegible] Traume, Madchens Klage, ...Schubert
[illegible] grossen Schmerzen, Lieb- ....Franz chen ist da, Im Herbst, Meine
Mainacht, Auf dem Kirchhof, ...Brahms
Liebe ist grun..................Hugo Wolf
Verborgenheit..................Wagner
Im Treibhaus..................R. Strauss
Serenade, Zueignung..................Greig
Ein Schwan, Good Morning..................H. C. Gilmour
A Slumber Song..................
The Swan Bent Low, Midsummer Lullaby..................MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light..................MacDowell

Seventh Symphony Concert

The seventh Symphony concert, the last to be played by the orchestra before it leaves for its December trip, will have as soloist Fritz Kreisler. Mr. Kreisler will play two concertos, both of them of the classical period. His first concerto will be Mozart's in D major and his second will be Viotti's in A minor, No. 22. The latter concerto was played here last winter by Mr. Ysaye at one of his recitals.

The programme will also contain one of the important novelties of the season. This is Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome." Florent Schmitt is an Alsatian by birth, but thoroughly French and Parisian by inclination and education. He belongs to the younger generation of French composers and has cut quite an important figure in French music during the last several years. His only music that has been heard in Boston so far has been a piece played last winter by the Longy Club.

"La Tragedie de Salome" is in a sense a suite of dances. Although it happened to come out at the same time as Richard Strauss's opera it draws its inspiration from quite another source than Oscar Wilde's play. The programme in full is as follows:

Florent Schmitt...."La Tragedie de Salome"
Mozart..........Violin concerto in D major
Cherubini ....Overture, "Anacreon"
Viotti..........Violin concerto in A minor
[illegible]..........Overture, "Le roi d'Ys"

THE LONGY CLUB

The Longy Club will give its first concert of the season in Jordan Hall next Thursday evening, Thanksgiving night, Nov. 27.

The membership of the club remains unchanged: Messrs. Maquarre and Brooke, flutes; Longy and Lenom, oboes; Grisez and Mimart, clarinets; Haim and Lorbeer, horns; Sadony and Mosbach, bassoons, with Mr. A. deVoto, pianist. At its first concert the club will be assisted by Mr. J. Theodorowicz, violinist.

The first programme will be devoted entirely to American composers. It will comprise a quintet in E-flat, op. 18, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano, by Arne Oldberg. This will be followed by two pieces by Howard Brockway, "At Twilight" and "An Idyl of Murmuring Water," for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. These will be followed by a pastorale for violin, clarinet and piano, by Daniel Gregory Mason, and the final number, by Arthur Bird, is a serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 24.

PADEREWSKI IN 2D RECITAL

Doubtful if He Ever Played More Beautifully Than He Did Yesterday.

Mr. Paderewski gave his second recital yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Paderewski, variations and Fugue in E flat minor, op. 23; Beethoven, sonata, C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2; Schumann, Des Abends, Grillen, Warum, Aufschwung; Schubert-Liszt, Soiree de Vienne, No. 6, Erlking; Chopin, Ballade, op. 47, Nocturne, B major, op. 62, Polonaise, op. 53; Wagner-Liszt, Isolde's Liebestod; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody.

The pianist's Variations and Fuge were first played by him in Boston six years ago. As he was not the first to play his Concerto in this country, so he was not the first to play these Variations, for Mr. Stojowski, his pupil, anticipated him in New York. It might be said that this composition appeals more to the musician interested in the modern structure and use of the variation form than to the general public, and yet the second variation, the one in the manner of a Siciliano, and the 11th and 15th have an exterior, obvious beauty that may be at once appreciated.

It is doubtful whether Mr. Paderewski has ever played here more beautifully than he played yesterday. He took Schumann's "Aufschwung" at so fast pace that the effect was somewhat diminished, but with this exception there remain only words of thankfulness and wonder. It mattered not whether the music was by Beethoven or Liszt, Schumann or Chopin, for Mr. Paderewski is not a specialist, but one that comprehends, catches, reproduces the spirit of any composer, and, when he is wholly in the vein, glorifies the music by his interpretation.

The Ballade and Polonaise of Chopin were played superbly, as was the Wagnerian transcription. The performance of the Soiree de Vienne was delightful. Wonderful were the shimmering tonal effects in the Hungarian Rhapsody, and these Rhapsodies, which, as played by many, seem only tours de force, and incur the reproach of vulgarity, performed by Mr. Paderewski are much more than pretexts for glitter and speed.

A mechanism that, artistically controlled, has an individual significance; a fine, unerring sense of rhythm; the singing of a melody so that it floats as in air; infinite graduations of tone; gorgeous coloring that is not abused; poetic, imaginative interpretation—these are still Mr. Paderewski's distinguishing qualities. Then there is the undefinable quality; call it magnetic if you will, that draws all people unto him as by a spell; charms for the moment, and leaves an abiding memory, and persuades the hearer that thus the music should be played and in no other way.

The hall was crowded and the audience was enthusiastic. After the Rhapsody Mr. Paderewski was generous in responding to the insistent entreaty of his admirers.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 29,

SCHMIDT'S TRAGEDY OF SALOME

Lurid Fantasy Played by Symphony; Kreisler Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two violin concertos were contributed by Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, to the programme of yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they unduly lengthened the programme. Yet the audience remained after Mr. Kreisler's last concerto and recalled him so frequently that the end of the concert, which came at 4:40, was still further delayed.

The tribute was deserved by Mr. Kreisler, a violinist of violinists, but why should an orchestral concert be made the occasion for the performance of two violin concertos? There is a greater attraction than Mr. Kreisler, and that is the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

REMINISCENT OF DEBUSSY

Mr. Kreisler's concertos were those by Mozart in D Major, No. 4 (Kochel 218) and by Viotti in A Minor, op. 22. Both are compositions exceptionally adapted for the violin, and in some respects they were especially welcome, following the lurid fantasy of Florent Schmidt's "Tragedy of Salome," a strange and violent piece of music, partly original, partly consisting of passages taken with both hands from the score of Debussy. Schmidt, one of the younger men who, whether they will or no, must admit that Debussy is actually their patron saint, has not written music after the famous tragedy of Wilde. Schmidt's "Tragedie de Salome" is a "mute drama" in two acts and seven scenes, the scenes composed by Robert d'Humieres and performed with the music composed by Schmidt at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. This piece was put together for Loie Fuller, who danced to Schmidt's music. The dances of Miss Fuller were "the dance of pearls," "the dance of steel," "the dance of the peacock," "the dance of serpents," "the dance of fear." Other persons in the cast were immovable on the stage. They watched Miss Fuller, and M. Edmond Stoulig thought that they could have done no better. All this and more we are told by the programme book.

Schmidt's music, later extended into what is practically a symphonic poem for full modern orchestra, is divided into these sections: Prelude, "Dance of Pearls"; "The Enchantments of the Sea," "Dance of the Lightnings," "Dance of Fear." The scene of the prelude is a terrace of Herod's palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. The mountains of Moab, "rose-colored and russet-hued," are illuminated by the setting sun. John is seen for a moment on the terrace. Following this, torches light the stage and jewels sparkle from a coffer. Herodias plunges her hands into the scintillating mass, and Salome, a fascinated child, bends over the chest and plans her first dance.

Herod Pursuing Salome

In the next scene Herod is there, in deep thought, and the watchful Herodias. Mysterious lights flicker on the sea and the engulfed five cities are seen through the waves. In the silence, "snatches of ancient orgiastic ditties" are breathed and rhythms of dancing. Mists arise from the sea, and from them Salome seems to step as thunder rolls and she begins her dance. Herod starts to his feet. There is now total darkness on the stage, only brooken by terrible flashes of lightning which show Herod pursuing Salome. John intercepts him and Herod makes a furious gesture. Herodias signals the executioner, who soon reappears with John's head. Salome throws the head over the battlement into the sea and the waters turn the color of blood. From the sea—from everywhere—the head of John stares at Salome, and she turns to escape the vision. Now the storm breaks, the thunder roars, "the tempest rocks the sea." "The tall cypresses writhe tragically and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mt. Nebo vomits flames. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept away by an infernal frenzy."

Women's Voices Heard

In the section "Enchantments of the Sea," the composer uses women's voices, in an orchestral manner, as well as the sarrusophone and a large battery of pulsatile instruments. He has dedicated his score to Igor Strawinsky, the Russian reputed to be himself a master colorist in music.

The music of Schmidt is in the first place music for a spectacle. Gorgeous as it is, it is not essentially for the concert stage. And there pages of Debussy. Debussy has now his school, and the sea of Schmidt is so much like the sea of Debussy, as depicted in "Pelleas," in "La Mer," and a page of the "Nocturnes" for orchestra, that one is tempted to believe the younger man deliberately guilty of the sincerest form of flattery. It is said that Schmidt is above all things an eclectic, not bound by the limits of his city or country, or by any leanings in art so pronounced as to limit his sympathies with any and all forms of beauty.

Prelude Interests

Of "La Tragedie de Salome," the prelude seemed at a first hearing to contain many of the most beautiful and genuinely imaginative pages. But it is too soon to talk very much of this music. We do not believe that Schmidt can be given a place among the innovators of the day on the basis of the work heard of yesterday. Nor has other music of Schmidt, heard rarely in this city, been overwhelmingly convincing. And yet, he has in this music heard yesterday, achieved wonderful moments of color and in actually developing his ideas shows exceptional boldness and audacity. And he has written many a page truly oriental in its character, without the clap-trap imitations of the oriental style which are becoming so wearisome today. There is oriental spirit, as well as manner in this music. In fact, the chief melody, a languorous phrase with a characteristic turn, is less literally than spiritually oriental. In this music there is force, ferocity of passion, a suggestion of savage strength and of desert sands. To some of his pages there are few parallels, unless they be passages from Flaubert's "Herodias" that describe burning sands, lust-maddened beholders and the sensuality and the fury of Salome's dance.

Defies Analysis.

Here is a modern artist portraying, after his own manner, an ancient thing, and doing it with an amazing technical mastery that defies analysis, even if it confesses its origins, which are often too apparently to be found in the pages [illegible] All in all, Schmidt

---

GLOBE

NOVEMBER 29.

TRAGEDY OF SALOME AT SYMPHONY

Superb Modern Work Finely Played.

Mr Kreisler Displays His Noble Art in Two Concertos.

The seventh symphony rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon. Dr Muck conducted. Mr Kreisler was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Florent Schmitt—"The Tragedy of Salome" (first time in Boston).
Mozart
Concerto in D major for violin, No. 4
Cherubini ....overture to "Anacreon."
Viotti........Concerto in A minor, No. 22
Lalo.........Overture to "Le Roi d' Ys."

Dr Muck is to be thanked for introducing Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome." It is one of the most original, most tellingly expressed and emotionally potent compositions which these programs have known in recent years. Nor is this wholly because there are few orchestral novelties now being written that contain uncommon dignity or beauty of thought, or coherence in its treatment.

Schmitt was born at Lorraine, of Alsatian parents. His teachers in the Paris conservatory were Dubois, Lavignac, Massenet and Faure. Performances in Paris of his Forty-Sixth Psalm a year ago last Spring attracted much attention although the work had been sung before. Compositions by him in smaller forms have been heard in Boston. This was the first appearance of his name in a Symphony program.

This tragedy is styled "a mute drama" and has been performed in Paris with a cast including Loie Fuller (Salome) Herod, Herodias and John the Baptist. The poem, in two acts and seven scenes, on which it is based is by Robert d'Humieres, a poem remarkable for the pervading and spontaneous Oriental color which accompanies the now familiar narrative. Its sordidness, its cruel and lustful terror, assume certain epic proportions, even majesty in these terse but illuminative lines. Schmitt has caught that which is written between them and which lies unsaid back of them and make the modern orchestra the mouthpiece of it with a superb daring, an amazing virtuosity and a commanding wealth of ideas that stagger the senses at a first hearing.

Some may say that here is color and atmosphere in lieu of vital invention. The themes of this work have in and of themselves an unescapable character. They breathe the spirit of the Orient. How expressive that heard soon after the opening measures in the English horn. How seizing the effect of the human voice, not merely for its novel use for the purpose of color as an instrument, but for the hypnotic elusiveness of tonality, the poetic melancholy of its theme.

Out of these fecund germinal ideas the composer has built up a symphonic structure of seeming spontaneity and abandon, but of admirable coherence in design. What a tragic hight he scales by the demoniac development of the simple theme that first characterizes the material apparently associated with the thought of the wicked cities of Sodom and Gomorrah! How overpowering the suggestion here of towering, Heaven-defying depravity and iniquity.

But this is not more communicative or less to be denied as convincing than the picture of voluptuous splendor, of carnal lust, of cowardly fear, of wanton cruelty of the court of Herod, or the picture of Salome herself, tantalizing in the flesh, consumed with pride and with a vicious thirst for the Baptist's head, a vision of delirium and madness in the dance.

It is music to be heard to be understood. Schmitt has advanced an idiom of his own. In tonality, he uses the six tone scale with a discrimination that does not lessen its power; in the use of rhythm he writes as one aided by wizardry. It is as thought he plots a drama of rhythms, with a cast of them, each personified, individualized, contending with or against another in conflict.

The performance was a superb one. Dr Muck and his virtuosi deserve the warmest praise for the technical mastery and the flaming spirit with which they played this music.

Mr Kreisler followed with a concerto by Mozart and turned back the clock over a century. His playing was all that it has been and could be in appreciation of the style of his concertos and of inspired interpretation of them.

Mozart's concerto was a thing of ineffable, heaven-crowned beauty. What continence, inflamed by what poetic ardor! Two tremendous forces contend within him—that which withholds and the other which gives prodigally.

JOURNAL

NOVEMBER 29,

KREISLER CHARMS SYMPHONY CROWD

Austrian Violinist Gives an Extremely Beautiful Performance.

Fritz Kreisler's beautiful violin playing was the foremost feature of yesterday's Symphony concert. The hall was filled to the very last seat, and while there was no tremendous enthusiasm, such as Ysaye is wont to evoke, or Paderewski, there was substantial appreciation of the Austrian virtuoso's virile yet highly-polished art.

The violin numbers on the program were the Mozart concerto in D-major and the Viotti concerto in A-minor. In each the soloist displayed elegance of style and brilliancy of technic.

The novelty on the program was Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," a suite developed out of music composed by the gifted Frenchman for a ballet, written by Robert d'Humieres, and performed in Paris some years ago, with Loie Fuller in the title role. In one of the movements, "The Enchantments of the Sea," the orchestra had the assistance of several women singers from the Musical Art Club. The music describes the arrival of John the evangelist, at Herod's palace, overlooking the Dea Sea, the vision of the engulfed Five Cities, the dancing of Salome, the murder of John and the death of Salome in the convulsion of nature that follows the crime. It is realistic music, written in the most modern manner. It will impress some and puzzle others. Dr. Muck conducted a spirited performance of it. The orchestra also played Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Lalo's overture to "La Roi d'Ys."

There will be no concerts in Boston by the orchestra next week. At the concerts on Dec. 12 and 13 the soloist will be Joseph Hofmann, who will play the Schumann concerto in A-minor. Weingartner's "Lustpiel" overture and Richard Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium" will be the novelties on the program.

HERALD,

NOVEMBER 29.

REHEARSAL AT SYMPHONY HALL

Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" Played by Orchestra.

FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

Suite Elaborated from Music Written for a "Mute Drama" on Theme.

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Fritz Kreisler was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

"The Tragedy of Salome"	Florent Schmitt
Concerto in D major, No. 4, for violin	Mozart
Overture to "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Concerto in A minor, No. 22, for violin	Viotti
Overture to "Le Roi d' Ys."	Lalo

Florent Schmitt, a Frenchman of Alsatian parentage, wrote music for a "mute drama" entitled "The Tragedy of Salome," which was performed in Paris six years ago this month. The "poem" was by Robert d'Humieres and Loie Fuller took the part of Salome. The orchestra was then a small one. Schmitt elaborated certain pages and made a Suite which was performed at a Colonne concert in 1911. The Russians have performed this ballet-pantomime with this music in Paris and London I believe the performance of the Suite yesterday was the first in this country, but the name of the composer is not unknown in Boston. Mr. Longy has brought out an orchestral Rhapsody and a chamber piece, and Mr. Caplet last season put four of his Chansons for four voices on the program of an Opera Sunday concert.

In d'Humiere's poem, Salome, with childish joy at seeing jewels overflowing from a chest on the terrace of Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Sea, dances a Dance of Pearls. An orchestral Prelude of considerable length precedes this dance in the Suite. Then there are strange enchanments on the sea. The five accursed cities are dimly seen. Sounds of revelry beneath the waves are heard. Old crimes awake and call to Salome. Herod and Herodias are silent in the darkness. A voice arises from the depths. Salome appears, as if invoked, coming from a cloud of living figures, palpitating, irresistible. A thunderstorm draws near. Salome dancing is seen by flashes of lightning. Herod pursues her. For a moment she is naked, but John the Baptist enters and covers her with his mantle. Herodias beckons to the executioner. When the head of John is brought to Salome, she suddenly, as though the head had whispered to her, throws it into the sea, which turns blood red. And then the head of John haunts her. Turn where she will, she sees it; and at last the heads are everywhere. The storm breaks. The bolt strikes the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. And Salome is swept about by infernal frenzy.

Played in the theatre with the scene and the dancer in sight, Schmitt's music would no doubt be more effective. As a concert suite the greater part of it must be perplexing to any one not acquainted with the text which it illustrates. There is no sensuous dance music. There is no amorous cantilena for the 'cellos after the manner os Massenet. This music is coldly thought out; it is deliberately contrived. As music for its own sake, the Prelude and the "Enchantments on the Sea" are the most striking pages. The two are cleverly poetic. The harmonic treatment and the orchestral expression are unusual and dramatic. Whether the female voices introduced behind the scenes add to the effect of the "Enchantments" is a question. The poet says: "Then a voice arises from the abyss." The composer gives a melody, which he asserts was heard on the banks of the Dead sea, to a voice; then two take it up, then six. The melody is not one that answers the excited imagination. It would not have moved either Herod or Salome. There is neither languor nor longing. Nor is Schmitt's melodic vein a rich one. He relies more on atmospheric effects. Heard in a concert hall the music for the Dance of the Lightnings and the Dance of Fear is futile. The text calls for wilder and more terrifying strains, not for mere boisterousness; nor are there any measures to suggest the voluptuousness of the dance that maddened Herod.

Nevertheless there is much that is original and interesting in this Suite, and Dr. Muck is to be thanked for acquainting us with music by a modern composer who has not been unduly influenced by predecessors and contemporaries but has a mind and a voice of his own.

It was a pleasure to hear the overtures again. When the "Anacreon" and Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" are played we are persuaded to believe that in this manner the ancient Greeks should have written for their theatre. There is the nobility of thought, the simplicity of expression, the withdrawal from the market place, the meditation within the temple. And Lalo's overture is a fine work, with its beautiful episode for the violoncello.

[illegible] formance [illegible] old-world concertos. Neither was unfamiliar to constant concert-goers, but Mr. Kreisler, by his performance, enhanced their native charm. It would be hard to say whether this admirable artist showed his interpretative genius more fully in the tender beauty of the slow movements, in the spirit, often tricksy, of the finales, or in the brilliance of cadenzas which were in keeping with the taste of the period. The orchestral accompaniment was as from a brother soloist, and the playing of the orchestra throughout was of the highest order.

The orchestra will be away next week. The program of the concerts on Dec. 12 and 13 will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Weingartner, "Merry" overture; Schumann, Piano concerto (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Strauss, Festival Prelude (first time in Boston).

SUNDAY POST

NOVEMBER 30,

TODAY'S SYMPHONY HALL CONCERT

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be a song recital by that admired singer Madame Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Madame Gadski has made some changes in the programme which was first announced and as it is revised she will sing the following numbers:

Fruhlingsnacht, Lotisblume, Waldgesprach	Schumann
Nacht und Traume, Madchen's Klage, Ungeduld	Schubert
Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen, Liebchen ist da, Im Herbst	Franz
Mainacht, Auf dem Kirchhof, Van Ewiger Liche	Brahms
Verborgenheit	Hugi Wolf
Im Treibhaus	Wagner
Meinern Kinde, Zueignung	R Strauss
Ein Schwan, Good Morning	Grieg
A Slumber Song	H. C. Gilmour
Your Eyes	E. Schneider
The Swan Bent Low, Midsummer Lullaby	MacDowell
A Maid sings Light	MacDowell

OPERA CONCERT TONIGHT

The concert public will have a chance to judge for themselves of the phenomenal qualities of Margherita D'Alvarez, the new contralto of the Boston Opera company, for she makes her concert debut next Sunday night. Mme. D'Alvarez will be heard in two of the greatest of all contralto songs, the "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila," and the Habanera from "Carmen." Mario Ancona, the new and popular baritone of the Boston Opera company, will also appear at this concert, as will Evelyn Scotney, the popular coloratura soprano, and Vincenzo Tanlongo, the new Italian tenor. The famous quartet from "Rigoletto" will be one of the features of a remarkably interesting programme.

Evelyn Scotney will sing the bell song from "Lakme," for the first time at this concert. It will be remembered that Lydia Lipkowska made her greatest success in this song. The opera house orchestra of 75, Horace Britt, conductor, will also participate.

Overture, "The Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Orchestra.
Prologue from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavello
Mr. Ancona.
Bell Song from "Lakme"	Delibes
Miss Scotney.
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix," "Samson et Dalila"	Saint-Saens
Mme. D'Alvarez.
Prelude from "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Orchestra.
Aria from "La Boheme," first act	Puccini
Mr. Tanlongo.
"Di Provenza," from "Traviata"	Verdi
Mr. Ancona.
"Habanera," from "Carmen"	Bizet
Mme. D'Alvarez
Quartet from "Rigoletto"	Verdi
Mmes. Scotney and D'Alvarez, Messrs. Tanlongo and Ancona.

Tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall, Franz Egenieff will give his postponed song recital in this city, assisted at the piano by Dr. Jeno Kerntler. Egenieff comes to this country for his introductory concert tour from Germany, where, after serving as a cavalry officer in the Prussian army following his graduation from his university, he decided upon a musical career.

He was successively a leading baritone of the Komische Opera in Berlin and of the Royal Opera in that city.

Egenieff's programme for tomorrow afternoon is one which should appeal to those who appreciate the song in its highest form. The composers to be represented are Schumann, Hugo Wolf, Arthur Foote, Kerntler, Kaun and Pataky. The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Biterolf	Wolf
Verborgenheit	Wolf
Der Musikant	Wolf
Gesang Weyla's	Wolf
Der Nock	Loewe
Belsazar	Schumann
Provenzalisches Lied	Schumann
The Lotus Flower	Hubert Pataky
On the River	Hubert Pataky
The Three Comrades	Hans Hermann
Farewell	Jeno Kerntler
On the Way to Kew	Arthur Foote
Irish Folk Song	Arthur Foote
My Native Land	Hugo Kaun

Flonzaley Quartet

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme: Schubert's posthumous Quartet in D Minor, Emanuel Moor's "Suite" for violin and cello, to be heard in Boston for the first time, and Haydn's Quartet in D Major, No. 5, op. 64.

Kneisel Quartet

The programme prepared for the second concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Steinert Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 2, will begin with Mozart's Quartet in F Major. Then will come the posthumous Quartet in D Minor of Franz Schubert and the final number will be Cesar Franck's Quintet in F Minor for Pianoforte, two violins, viola and violoncello. In this number the quartet will be assisted by Mr. Michael von Zadore, who for several [illegible] has been an active figure [illegible] of [illegible] The

Parlow Bachaus Recital

A recital of more than ordinary interest will be that to be given in Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon, Dec. 6, at 3 o'clock by Kathleen Parlow, violinist, and Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist.

Sonata in G minor	Grieg
Miss Parlow and Mr. Bachaus.
a. Melodie	Gluck
b. Praeludium and Allegro	Pugnani-Kreisler
c. Valse	Tschaikowsky
d. Zapateado	Sarasate
Miss Parlow.
a. Ballade in A flat	Chopin
b. Nocturne in C minor	Chopin
c. Waltz, Op. 34, No. 1, in A flat	Chopin
d. Polonaise, Op. 53, in A flat	Chopin
Mr. Bachaus.
a. Nocturne	Hubay
b. Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
c. Polonaise in A minor	Wieniawski
Miss Parlow.
a. Two preludes in G major and G minor	Rachmaninoff
b. Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Mr. Bachaus.

Heinrich Gebhard

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, the admired pianist of this city, announces a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 8. The programme includes works by Bach, d'Indy, Schumann, Chopin, Richard Platt, Helen Hopekirk, Carl Engel and Schulz-Evler.

Josef Hofmann's Recital

Josef Hofmann will give his second recital in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 2. Mr. Hofmann's programme will be as follows:

Twenty-five preludes, sonate, B minor, nocturne, waltz, impromptu, polonaise, fantasie.

Other details will be announced Tuesday.

HERALD,

NOVEMBER 30, 1913.

PARLOW AND BACKHAUS

A recital of more than ordinary interest will be given in Jordan Hall next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock by Kathleen Parlow, violinist and Wilhelm Backhaus, pianist. The program will be as follows:

Sonata in C minor	Grieg
Miss Parlow and Mr. Backhaus.
Melodie	Gluck
Praeludium and Allegro	Pugnani-Kreisler
Valse	Tschaikowsky
Zapateado	Sarasate
Miss Parlow.
Ballade in A flat Nocturne in C minor Waltz, Op 34, No. 1, in A flat. Polonaise, Op. 53, in A flat	Chopin
Mr. Backhaus.
Nocturne	Hubay
Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
Polonaise in A major	Wieniawski
Miss Parlow.
Two Preludes in G major and G minor	Rachmaninoff
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Mr. Backhaus.

MR. EGENIEFF'S RECITAL

M. Franz Egenieff, baritone, will give his postponed recital in Jordan Hall tomorrow afternoon. He will be assisted by Dr. Jeno Kerntler, pianist Mr. Egenieff sang here as a member of Mr. Savage's "Parsifal" company in October, 1904, and then took the part of Amfortas, alternating with Johannes Bischoff. This concert tour is his first in America. At first a cavalry officer, after graduation from the university, Mr. Egenieff decided upon a musical career. He became a member of the Komische Opera and the Royal Opera in Berlin, but of late he has won fame as a Lieder singer. His program will be as follows:

Biterolf Verborgenheit Der Musikant Gesang Weyla's	Wolf
Der Noeck	Loewe
Belsazar	Schumann
Provenzalisches Lied	Schumann
The Lotus Flower	Hubert Pataky
On the River	Hubert Pataky
The Three Comrades	Hans Hermann
Farewell	Jeno Kerntler
On the Way to Kew	Arthur Foote
Irish Folk Song	Arthur Foote
My Native Land	Hugo Kaun

ELMENDORF IN JAVA

Dwight Elmendorf's travel talks continue their instructive and interesting course at Symphony Hall. Next Friday evening and Saturday afternoons Java will be the subject. Starting with glimpses of Batavia he will conduct his hearers to the great Botanical Gardens at Buitenzorg, and thence through the picturesque Poentjak Pass to Sindanglaya, from which point the journey is continued through the jungles and coffee estates of the fertile Praeger Regency to Garoet, which will be the starting point of delightful excursions, among them a view of the eruption of the volcanoes of Bromo and Smeroe, and views of the temple of Buddha at Boro Boedor.

Next week Mr. Elmendorf will give two extra lectures at Symphony Hall, "The Nile Journey, Cairo to Khartoum," on Friday evening, and "The Garden of Allah" on Saturday afternoon.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be away on its second southern trip. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at all the concerts. Mahler's 5th symphony will be played in Philadelphia and New York; Washington gets the "Pastoral" and Baltimore Beethoven's Seventh, while Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedia de Salome" will be played in Brooklyn. Mr. Kreisler will play Brahms's Concerto in Philadelphia and Tschaikowsky's in Washington, Baltimore, New York Thursday evening and Brooklyn. The Saturday afternoon concert in New York will be purely classical: Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs, the "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's violin concerto.

MME. GADSKI'S RECITAL

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be a song recital by Mme. Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. She has made some changes in the program first announced. Revised it is as follows:

Fruhlingsnacht Lotosblume Waldesgesprach	Schumann
Nacht und Traeume Madchens Klage Ungeduld	Schubert
Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen Liebchen ist da Im Herbst	Franz
Mainacht Auf dem Kirchhof Von Einiger Liebe	Brahms
Verborgenheit
Im Treibhaus	Hugo Wolf
Meinem Kinde	Wagner
Zueignung	Strauss
Ein Schwan	Strauss
Good Morning	Grieg
Your Eyes	Grieg
	E. Schneider
The Swan Bent Low Midsummer Lullaby A Maid Sings Light	MacDowell

KREISLER'S RECITAL

Fritz Kreisler will give a recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7. No violinist has warmer admirers than this unassuming Austrian. His tour in this country up to the present time has surpassed anything that he has hitherto accomplished. He has filled Carnegie Hall, New York, to overflowing and will give a second recital there; he has filled Orchestra Hall, Chicago, and will give a second recital there. His program will be as follows:

Suite in E major	J. S. Bach
Grave	W. F. Bach
Chanson Louis XIII et Pavane	Couperin
Prelude and Allegro	Pugnani
Sarabande et Allegretto	Corelli
La Chasse	Cartier
Variations	Tartini
Melodie in D minor	Gluck
Romance, A major	Schumann
Rondo, G major	Mozart
Caprice Viennoise	Kreisler
Three Caprices: B-flat major, B minor, A m	nini

BOSTON AMERICAN,

NOVEMBER 30,

Madam Gadski at Symphony Hall

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be a song recital by Madame Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Madame Gadski has made some changes in the program which was first announced and as it is revised she will sing the numbers by Shubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms, Wolf and Strauss.

GLOBE—NOVEMBER 30,

Mme Gadski Today At Symphony Hall

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon will be a song recital by that admired singer Mme Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme Gadski has made some changes in the program which was first announced, and as it is revised she will sing the following numbers:

Part 1
Fruhlingsnacht	Schumann
Lotosblume	Schumann
Waldesgesprach	Schumann
Waldesgesprach	Schumann
Nacht und Traume	Schubert
Madchens Klage	Schubert
Ungeduld	Schubert
Part 2
Aus meinen grossen Schmerzben	Franz
Liebchen ist da	Franz
Im Herbst	Franz
Mainacht	Brahms
Auf dem Kirchhof	Brahms
Van Emiger Liebe	Grahms
Part 3
Verborgenheit	Hugo Wolf
Im Treibhaus	Wagner
Meinem Kinde	R Strauss
Zueignung	R Strauss
Part 4
Ein Schwan	Grieg
Good Morning	Grieg
A Slumber Song	H C Gilmour
Your Eyes	E Schneider
The Swan Bent Low	MacDowell
Midsummer Lullaby	MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light	MacDowell

First Sunday Opera Concert This Evening.

The first of the popular priced concerts to be given Sunday evenings at the Boston Opera House will take place tonight. The programs indicate a policy to offer one of the chief, assisted by others of the secondary singers of the company.

Tonight Mr Marcoux will give for his numbers the Calf of Gold song from "Faust," and a scene from "The Jewels of the Madonna." Appearing with him will be Mmes Amsden and Morse, and Mr Tanlongo, a new tenor. Other numbers of the program will be Aida's air from the first act of the opera, Tosca's prayer, the "Connais tu," from "Mignon"; "La Donna e Mobile," from "Rigoletto"; the barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffman," and the trio from "Faust." The orchestra will play.

The singers next Sunday night are to be Mmes Scotney and d'Alvarez, Messrs Tanlongo and Ancona.

Josef Hofmann In All Chopin Program

Josef Hofmann will give his second recital in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Dec 2. At his recital on a Sunday recently he had quite the greatest success that he has ever had in this city, and his return will be warmly welcomed by all lovers of the best in piano music.

The recital gains particular interest in that the program will be entirely by Chopin. Mr Hofmann, a Pole by birth, is one of the great interpreters of the works of his great countryman, and aside from this fact a recital devoted entirely to Chopin is of sufficient rarity to excite unusual interest.

His program will be as follows: "Polonaise Fantaisie," impromptu, F minor nocturne, B-flat minor sonata, 25 preludes, three etudes and the ballade in A-flat major.

Kneisels Will Play Cesar Franck's Piano Quintet

The program prepared for the second concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Stein- Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec 2, most interesting one. It will be- th Mozart's Quartet in F major. come the posthumous quartet of Franz Schubert and the will be Cesar Franck's ive figure in the concert field of Europe. The concert will begin at 8:15.

Flonzaleys in Their First Concert of the Season

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Dec 4 at 8:15 o'clock. The popularity of this famous organization increases each year and a large audience will greet them Thursday.

A most delightful program has been prepared, which will begin with Schubert's Posthumous Quartet in D Minor. Then will come Emanuel Moor's "Suite" for violin and 'cello, which will be heard in Boston for the first time and the final number will be Haydn's Quartet in D Major, No. 5, Op. 64.

Franz Egenieff's Postponed Song Recital Tomorrow

Franz Egenieff, the baritone, will give his postponed recital tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall. The singer in reality is the Baron von Kleydorff, the son of Prince von Sayn-Wittgenstein-Berleburg; his mother the Polish Countess Stefanska, a renowned beauty.

Egenieff took his university degree of Master of Arts, then joined a famous cavalry regiment of the Prussian Army. While stationed at Darmstadt he cultivated painting in oils. It was here that his voice was discovered by a member of his company, it is said, while on the parade ground. An opera director gave encouragement and Egenieff began vocal study with Lilli Lehmann.

His success induced him to consider a career seriously, and he accepted an engagement at the Berlin Royal Opera. Mr Savage brought him to America for the part of Amfortas in his English production in Parsifal, a role which the baritone sang here at the Tremont Theatre Oct 18, 1904, and 134 times thereafter.

Egenieff has studied with Victor Maurel and with Alfredo Cairati. His roles in opera in which he has been particularly praised include his Don Juan, Scarpia and the triple part in the "Tales of Hoffmann." The baritone's wife was Miss Lily Busch, the daughter, some say niece, of the brewer and philanthropist of St Louis. Born in that city, Mrs Egenieff has lived in Berlin since her 10th year. The baritone is said to be 38 years old. He claims to have abandoned opera for the concert field. His program tomorrow will be as follows: Wolf, "Biterolf," "Verborgenheit," "Der Musikant," "Wesang Weyla's"; Loewe, "Der Nock"; Schumann, "Belsazar," "Provenzalisches Lied"; Hubert Pataky, "The Lotus Flower," "On the River"; Hans Hermann, "The Three Comrades"; Jeno Kerntler, "Farewell"; Arthur Foote, "On the Way to Kew," Irish folk song; Hugo Kaun, "My Native Land."

Miss Parlow and Mr Bachaus In Joint Recital on Saturday

Kathleen Parlow and Wilhelm Bachaus, familiar and admired as violinist and pianist in our concert halls, will give a joint recital next Saturday afternoon at 3 at Jordan Hall. Their program will be as follows:

Sonata in C minor	Grieg
Miss Parlow and Mr Bachaus
Melodie	Gluck
Praeludium and Allegro	Pugnani-Kreisler
Valse	Tschaikowsky
Zapateado	Sarasate
Miss Parlow.
Ballade in A flat	Chopin
Nocturne in C minor	Chopin
Waltz, opus 34, No. 1, in A flat	Chopin
Polonaise, opus 53, in A flat	Chopin
Mr Bachaus
Nocturne	Hubay
Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
Polonaise in A major	Wieniawski
Miss Parlow.
Two preludes in G major and G minor,	Rachmaninoff
Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Mr Bachaus.

Operas and Singers Announced for the Week

The program at the opera house for the week is announced as follows:

Tomorrow night, "Tristan and Isolde," with Mmes Matzenauer, Niessen-Stone, Messrs Ferrari-Fontana, Amato and Ludikar.

Wednesday, "The Jewels of the Madonna," with Mmes Edvina Dalvarez, Messrs Ferrari-Fontana, Ancona.

Friday, "Monna Vanna," see notice above.

Saturday matinee, "Faust," with Mmes Edvina, Morse, Leveroni, Messrs Laffitte, Ancona, Ludikar.

Saturday evening, at popular prices, "Traviata" with Miss Evelyn Parnell, Messrs Tanlongo and Blanchart.

Miss Parnell was a student at the Boston Opera School preparatory to the opening of the house. There she made her debut as Aida, Nov 13, 1909. March of the same season she took the part of Valentine in "The Huguenots" at short notice. She has since appeared in opera in Genoa, in Venice and Dublin.

Mr Hubbard's Opera Talks for the Week

During the course of the coming week, Havrah Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver eight of his popular opera talks. The musical illustrations will be furnished by Floyd M. Baxter, pianist. The talk on "Monna Vanna" to be given in Brookline on Tuesday evening will be open to the public, admission free.

"Madama Butterfly" will be given on Monday afternoon before the Brighthelmstone Club, Allston; and again on Wednesday evening before the Girl's Club of Portsmouth, N H; "Tales of Hoffmann" Tuesday morning before the ladies of Dedham; and Friday afternoon before the Wollaston Women's Club; "Monna Vanna" on Tuesday evening in Brookline; and again on Thursday afternoon before the Dorchester Women's Club; "The Jewels of the Madonna" on Tuesday afternoon before the Tuesday Class of Cambridge; and on Thursday evening in the Y. M. C. A., on Huntington av.

Symphony Orchestra's Tour.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be away on its second Southern trip. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at all the concerts. The Mahler Symphony will be played in Philadelphia and New York; Washington gets the "Pastoral" and Baltimore the seventh of Beethoven, while Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie [illegible] will be played in Brooklyn.

Mr Kreisler will play the Brahms Concerto in Philadelphia and the Tschaikowsky Concerto in Washington, Baltimore, New York Thursday evening and Brooklyn. The Saturday afternoon concert in New York will comprise Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the Handel Concerto for two wind choirs, the "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's violin concerto.

Fritz Kreisler's Return.

The famous violinist, Fritz Kreisler, who has recently appeared here with the New York Philharmonic and Boston Symphony Orchestras, will return for a recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. No violinist today has more warm admirers than this unassuming Austrian, whose tour in this country up to the present time has surpassed anything that he has accomplished in the past.

His program here will open with J. S. Bach's E major suite and include selections by Friedmann Bach, Couperin, Pugnani, Cartier, Tartini, Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere

Heinrich Gebhard, the brilliant pianist of this city, announces a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, Dec 8. It comprises works by Bach, d'Indy, Schumann, Chopin, Richard Platt, Helen Hopekirk, Carl Engel and Schulz-Evler.

◆

An exchange remarks that some one with an eye to figures has estimated that at the present rate of progress—"if it is progress"—mere men will soon be crowded out of the musical profession. In Berlin during the last season of the 328 vocal recitals given, women contributed 232 and men only 96. In the departments of the piano and violin men still held their own. The total number of concerts given in Berlin during the Winter season of 1912-13 was 1210. In all German cities vocal recitals predominate over instrumental, and everywhere more of the vocal recitals are given by women than by men.

◆

Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, who has many friends and admirers in Boston, will make his first appearance in several years at a concert in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec 14.

◆

Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" has taken some time to find its way to the opera houses of Germany and Austria. Only recently was the work of the universally popular maestro heard in Berlin and Hamburg, and now it has reached Vienna, where, thanks to an unusually careful performance, it seems likely to establish itself as an accepted favorite by the side of his "Boheme," "Tosca" and "Butterfly." Weeks of careful preparation, under the supervision of Director Gregor himself, a past master in the subtle art of putting an operatic work on the stage, were devoted to the study of the intricate music drama, the smallest parts were entrusted to accredited soloists, and the result has been so carefully balanced and satisfactory a performance that even without the star cast which New York was able to furnish when "The Girl" was first produced a triumph has been achieved with which Puccini himself expressed complete satisfaction.—New York Evening Post.

◆

Beatrice Harrison, an accomplished 'cellist, who has recently met with much success in New York, is to give a re-

---

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 29,

FLORENT SCHMITT AND MR. KREISLER

French Composer's Work Is Played for First Time by Symphony Orchestra.

By JOHN BROOKS

The seventh Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon offered a program unusually interesting and strong in contrast. It consisted of Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humeres; Mozart's concerto for violin in D major, No. 4; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon"; Viotti's concerto for violin in A minor, No. 22, and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

This was the first time that any of Schmitt's works have been played by the Symphony Orchestra, though four of his songs for four voices were heard at the Sunday concerts at the Opera House last year and a piece for double quintet of wind instruments has been played by the Longy Club. The composer is generally classed with the younger French school. At least he speaks the new orchestral language, and after this first hearing of one of his more important works, one might almost say he speaks with unusual authority. Without the aid of the program one could not understand what it is all about, but with the key thus furnished the first impression is one of interest, to be quickly followed by admiration and a desire for a repetition.

Master of dynamic effects in the orchestra Schmitt undoubtedly is. His phrases are insistent, they seem to break right through the ear into the consciousness, and the most indifferent auditor must listen whether he will or no. Guided by knowledge of the subject, one might say that the music expressed fear, lust, cruelty, jealousy, joy, etc., etc., but this would be reading into it what one had been induced to look for, and would certainly be unfair on a first hearing. It is safe to say, however, that Schmitt is one of the more able of modern composers in the expression of emotion in music, and that whatever one's final judgment on his work may be, his skill in handling his orchestration must bring unrestricted praise.

To this stormy, tempestuous opening, Mozart's joyous, care-free concerto was in striking contrast. Mr. Kreisler was in a particularly happy mood. He seemed full of sunshine himself and it came out through his violin in a perfection of execution that made the occasion memorable. Both this number and the Viotti concerto were played exquisitely. Particularly in the sustained melody of the second movements, the soloist's violin sang with almost the smoothness of an ethereal human voice.

For these pieces, the two overtures were but a setting, but as played under Dr. Muck, most satisfactory.

MONITOR,

, NOVEMBER 29,

Producing Florent Schmitt's orchestra suite based on the ballet, "Tragedy o Salome," Karl Muck directed the Bosto Symphony orchestra in its seventh pub lic rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Fo the third time this season he enriche his program with solo numbers, presenting Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, in two short works. The program was as follows: Schmitt, "Tragedy of Salome" (first time in Boston); Mozart, concerto for violin in D major, No. 4 (K 218); Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon"; Viotti, concerto for volin in A minor, No. 22; Lalo, overture to "King of Ys."

The Boston Symphony orchestra playing theatrical music is like an accomplished reader interpreting a drama. The hearer is delighted with the stimulating effect on his imagination. He is pleased with the opportunity to be his own stage manager and scene painter. He takes satisfaction in ruling the pageant according to his own fancy. In the case of music for a pantomine ballot, such as was presented on Friday, listeners have one of their best occasions. They are even in a better situation than when a pictorial tone poem is played, for they know that actual scenery has been painted for the music and that mimes have really stepped and posed to its episodes. They can therefore locate the picture in a frame, as they cannot always do when the composer writes his description after the manner of a novelist.

A little indication of the plot of the ballet is, of course, necessary; and this was provided for the Schmitt music by the program book. If we do not try to make the program notes serve us as a line guide, but take their general idea and adapt it in our own way, we can make them serve us well. We can contrive our own arrangement of the figures of the drama in the times when the music is contemplative and preparatory and in the moments when it bursts out with a surprise.

The Schmitt suite is entertaining for its orchestration and for its contrasts of tone power and color. It commands the listener's attention more fixedly than many a work which is contrived on standard architectural formulas.

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1912

LAST night's audience at the New York Philharmonic concert was perceptibly larger than the average of past years, but there was still a lot of room for improvement. Upstairs and downstairs whole rows of seats were vacant. Let every music-lover hope that this excellent orchestra will hang on a while longer, and not retire from the field in despair, as the Philadelphia orchestra did, two or three years ago. Soon or late it will draw good houses. And meanwhile it gives very good concerts.

THE Hon. Josef Stransky, indeed, is a far more skillful showman than his distinguished rival, Prof. Dr. Karl Muck, of Boston. I employ the word "showman" in its most honorable sense. Dr. Muck, without a doubt, has a better orchestra, particularly in the matter of first violins, but Mr. Stransky gives better concerts. That is to say, they are more interesting, more varied, more discreet in their appeal. It is impossible to imagine any person with ears being bored by the program of last night. But Dr. Muck, playing good music superbly, has often managed to convey a sense of monotony. I don't attempt to analyze it or account for it: I merely state it as a fact.

ALL the criticisms I heard of last night's performance of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony were purely academic and hyperesthetic—the intelligent, but by no means important objections of specialists in tone and tempo. To the unprofessional hearer the thing was done magnificently. And what a splendid composition it is! The gamboling of a god! A masterpiece of good humor, waggish ingenuity, sublime gemüthlichkeit, and always with that undercurrent of sadness, that dim suggestion of the tragic—now in the cellos (Prosit, Herr Schulz!), now in the horns (Oh, rare Xavier Reiter!). Critical cant is against the Eighth Symphony: perhaps it is too close to the Ninth to be judged fairly. But how it tickleth the ear! How it soothes and caresses!

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.

Patriotism Astray.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

An interesting suggestion has been the outgrowth of the astounding patriotic display which concluded the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening.

It has been cast as a reproach on the citizens of this republic, by fellow travellers of other nationalities crossing the ocean, that while Englishmen and Germans sing their national hymns with fervor and knowledge, Americans mostly blunder through "The Star-Spangled Banner" any old way, with a pathetic reliance on the other fellow to do the work, that has resulted in a lamentable lack of volume, save that supplied by the band.

Can it be that our ignorance lies even deeper and we do not know enough to distinguish between our national anthem and the tune of "America" that was brazenly stolen from our conquered foes, a generation or more ago, as they had appropriated it from the Vaterland?

That seems to be the only explanation for the astonishing spectacle of an immense audience rising en masse to stand through the performance of "Heil der am Siegerkranz," blindly following a few who rose from a mistaken sense of patriotism, or perhaps because they really were Britons or Saxons, who had a good reason to rise as a tribute to what belonged to them.

This is the thought suggestion that is thrust upon us. If our musical knowledge is so meagre, do we really appreciate the symphony concerts in their entirety? How many patronize them for sheer enjoyment or for a sincere desire to increase their musical knowledge, and how many follow the lead of fashion blindly, as they rose on Tuesday evening, because "everybody's doing it" and it seems to be the thing?

MUSIC LOVER.

Providence, Nov. 21.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.

FOR A "SYMPHONY" PROGRAMME.

One Subscriber Who Would Like a Little Simple Music.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I have no doubt that if I knew anything about music I should know better than to write this letter. However, ignorance lends boldness, and my venture into the realms of the (comparatively) unknown is less intrepid than it may appear to youthful music teachers and the rest of the cognoscenti. For I am supported by the knowledge that numerous of my fellow subscribers to the Boston Symphony series feel much as I do. Mostly, as a measure of precaution, they keep any expression of their sentiment from their wives and neighbors. But in moments of unusual candor with congenial spirits whom they feel to be sympathetic they unburden themselves much as I am now about to unburden myself.

Briefly, my plea is for the rendition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, at some time during the season, of a full orchestral version of "Juanita." Not that I love "Juanita" more, but that I understand Mr. Somebody's Fifth Symphony in X-flat, op. 23, less. Nor do I insist on the choice of the particular ditty here mentioned. I am willing to compromise on "Shepherd Boy," or "Old Black Joe," or "Nancy Lee," or "Kathleen Mavourneen," or even "Banks of the Wabash."

What I really want, Mr. Editor, is to hear something by a good orchestra which appeals in some slight degree to my simple, untutored musical taste. I am willing to pay my money and incase myself in evening garb and suffocate in the infernal lack of ventilation which accompanies our Providence climax of "musical culture," though the willingness makes little difference with the lady of the house, who declares that not to attend the Symphonies—and to be seen there—is a "perfectly impossible (sic) idea."

I do this more or less willingly, as I say, not only to preserve at least the forms of peace in the family, but because I do sincerely hope that maybe, at some far distant future day, I shall learn to know the difference between an "allegro non tanto" and an "andante con moto." (At the present time, I frankly confess, I suspect them of being new brands of imported cheese which the composers are subsidized to work into their programmes.)

And, indeed, while I do not wish to boast, there have been symphony concerts some parts of which I did really, though moderately, enjoy. Though this did not include the horrific display of concatenated discord which was thrust from the stage of Infantry Hall last evening.

Having thus described my personal attitude toward attendance at these concerts, the force of my plea for something simple and melodic should be apparent: something within the range of the comprehension of the unmusical barbarians ive figure in the concert field of urope. The concert will begin at 8:15.

Flonzaleys in Their First Concert of the Season

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Dec 4 at 8:15 o'clock. The popularity of this famous organization increases each year and a large audience will greet them Thursday.

A most delightful program has been prepared, which will begin with Schubert's Posthumous Quartet in D Minor. Then will come Emanuel Moor's "Suite" for violin and 'cello, which will be heard in Boston for the first time and the final number will be Haydn's Quartet in D Major, No. 5, Op. 64.

Franz Egenieff's Postponed Song Recital Tomorrow

Franz Egenieff, the baritone, will give his postponed recital tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall. The singer in reality is the Baron von Kleydorff, the son of Prince von Sayn-Wittgenstein-Berleburg; his mother the Polish Countess Stefanska, a renowned beauty.

Egenieff took his university degree of Master of Arts, then joined a famous cavalry regiment of the Prussian Army. While stationed at Darmstadt he cultivated painting in oils. It was here that his voice was discovered by a member of his company, it is said, while on the parade ground. An opera director gave encouragement and Egenieff began vocal study with Lilli Lehmann.

His success induced him to consider a career seriously, and he accepted an engagement at the Berlin Royal Opera. Mr Savage brought him to America for the part of Amfortas in his English production in Parsifal, a role which the baritone sang here at the Tremont Theatre Oct 18, 1904, and 134 times thereafter.

Egenieff has studied with Victor Maurel and with Alfredo Cairati. His roles in opera in which he has been particularly praised include his Don Juan, Scarpia and the triple part in the "Tales of Hoffmann." The baritone's wife was Miss Lily Busch, the daughter, some say niece, of the brewer and philanthropist of St Louis. Born in that city, Mrs Egenieff has lived in Berlin since her 10th year. The baritone is said to be 38 years old. He claims to have abandoned opera for the concert field. His program tomorrow will be as follows: Wolf, "Biterolf," "Verborgenheit," "Der Musikant," "Wesang Weyla's"; Loewe, "Der Nock"; Schumann, "Belsazar," "Provenzalisches Lied"; Hubert Pataky, "The Lotus Flower," "On the River"; Hans Hermann, "The Three Comrades"; Jeno Kerntler, "Farewell"; Arthur Foote, "On the Way to Kew," Irish folk song; Hugo Kaun, "My Native Land."

Miss Parlow and Mr Bachaus In Joint Recital on Saturday

Kathleen Parlow and Wilhelm Bachaus, familiar and admired as violinist and pianist in our concert halls, will give a joint recital next Saturday afternoon at 3 at Jordan Hall. Their program will be as follows:

Sonata in C minor	Grieg
Miss Parlow and Mr Bachaus
Melodie	Gluck
Praeludium and Allegro	Pugnani-Kreisler
Valse	Tschaikowsky
Zapateado	Sarasate
Miss Parlow.
Ballade in A flat	Chopin
Nocturne in C minor	Chopin
Waltz, opus 34, No. 1, in A flat	Chopin
Polonaise, opus 53, in A flat	Chopin
Mr Bachaus
Nocturne	Hubay
Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
Polonaise in A major	Wieniawski
Miss Parlow.
Two preludes in G major and G minor,	Rachmaninoff
Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Mr Bachaus.

Operas and Singers Announced for the Week

The program at the opera house for the week is announced as follows:

Tomorrow night, "Tristan and Isolde," with Mmes Matzenauer, Niessen-Stone, Messrs Ferrari-Fontana, Amato and Ludikar.

Wednesday, "The Jewels of the Madonna," with Mmes Edvina Dalvarez, Messrs Ferrari-Fontana, Ancona.

Friday, "Monna Vanna," see notice above.

Saturday matinee, "Faust," with Mmes Edvina, Morse, Leveroni, Messrs Laffitte, Ancona, Ludikar.

Saturday evening, at popular prices, "Traviata" with Miss Evelyn Parnell, Messrs Tanlongo and Blanchart.

Miss Parnell was a student at the Boston Opera School preparatory to the opening of the house. There she made her debut as Aida, Nov 13, 1909. March of the same season she took the part of Valentine in "The Huguenots" at short notice. She has since appeared in opera in Genoa, in Venice and Dublin.

Mr Hubbard's Opera Talks for the Week

During the course of the coming week, Havrah Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver eight of his popular opera talks. The musical illustrations will be furnished by Floyd M. Baxter, pianist. The talk on "Monna Vanna" to be given in Brookline on Tuesday evening will be open to the public, admission free.

"Madama Butterfly" will be given on Monday afternoon before the Brighthelmstone Club, Allston; and again on Wednesday evening before the Girl's Club of Portsmouth, N H; "Tales of Hoffmann" Tuesday morning before the ladies of Dedham; and Friday afternoon before the Wollaston Women's Club; "Monna Vanna" on Tuesday evening in Brookline; and again on Thursday afternoon before the Dorchester Women's Club; "The Jewels of the Madonna" on Tuesday afternoon before the Tuesday Class of Cambridge; and on Thursday evening in the Y. M. C. A., on Huntington av.

Symphony Orchestra's Tour.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be away on its second Southern trip. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at all the concerts. The Mahler Symphony will be played in Philadelphia and New York; Washington gets the "Pastoral" and Baltimore the seventh of Beethoven, while Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie" will be played in Brooklyn.

Mr Kreisler will play the Brahms Concerto in Philadelphia and the Tschaikowsky Concerto in Washington, Baltimore, New York Thursday evening and Brooklyn. The Saturday afternoon concert in New York will comprise Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the Handel Concerto for two wind choirs, the "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's violin concerto.

Fritz Kreisler's Return.

The famous violinist, Fritz Kreisler, who has recently appeared here with the New York Philharmonic and Boston Symphony Orchestras, will return for a recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. No violinist today has more warm admirers than this unassuming Austrian, whose tour in this country up to the present time has surpassed anything that he has accomplished in the past.

His program here will open with J. S. Bach's E major suite and include selections by Friedmann Bach, Couperin, Pugnani, Cartier, Tartini, Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

Paragraphs About Musical Matters Here and Elsewhere

Heinrich Gebhard, the brilliant pianist of this city, announces a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, Dec 8. It comprises works by Bach, d'Indy, Schumann, Chopin, Richard Platt, Helen Hopekirk, Carl Engel and Schulz-Evler.

◆

An exchange remarks that some one with an eye to figures has estimated that at the present rate of progress—"if it is progress"—mere men will soon be crowded out of the musical profession. In Berlin during the last season of the 328 vocal recitals given, women contributed 232 and men only 96. In the departments of the piano and violin men still held their own. The total number of concerts given in Berlin during the Winter season of 1912-13 was 1210. In all German cities vocal recitals predominate over instrumental, and everywhere more of the vocal recitals are given by women than by men.

◆

Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, who has many friends and admirers in Boston, will make his first appearance in several years at a concert in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Dec 14.

◆

Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" has taken some time to find its way to the opera houses of Germany and Austria. Only recently was the work of the universally popular maestro heard in Berlin and Hamburg, and now it has reached Vienna, where, thanks to an unusually careful performance, it seems likely to establish itself as an accepted favorite by the side of his "Boheme," "Tosca" and "Butterfly." Weeks of careful preparation, under the supervision of Director Gregor himself, a past master in the subtle art of putting an operatic work on the stage, were devoted to the study of the intricate music drama, the smallest parts were entrusted to accredited soloists, and the result has been so carefully balanced and satisfactory a performance that even without the star cast which New York was able to furnish when "The Girl" was first produced a triumph has been achieved with which Puccini himself expressed complete satisfaction.—New York Evening Post.

◆

Beatrice Harrison, an accomplished 'cellist, who has recently met with much success in New York, is to give a re-

---

MONITOR,

, NOVEMBER 29,

Producing Florent Schmitt's orchestral suite based on the ballet, "Tragedy of Salome," Karl Muck directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in its seventh public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. For the third time this season he enriched his program with solo numbers, presenting Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, in two short works. The program was as follows: Schmitt, "Tragedy of Salome" (first time in Boston); Mozart, concerto for violin in D major, No. 4 (K 218); Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon"; Viotti, concerto for volin in A minor, No. 22; Lalo, overture to "King of Ys."

The Boston Symphony orchestra playing theatrical music is like an accomplished reader interpreting a drama. The hearer is delighted with the stimulating effect on his imagination. He is pleased with the opportunity to be his own stage manager and scene painter. He takes satisfaction in ruling the pageant according to his own fancy. In the case of music for a pantomine ballot, such as was presented on Friday, listeners have one of their best occasions. They are even in a better situation than when a pictorial tone poem is played, for they know that actual scenery has been painted for the music and that mimes have really stepped and posed to its episodes. They can therefore locate the picture in a frame, as they cannot always do when the composer writes his description after the manner of a novelist.

A little indication of the plot of the ballet is, of course, necessary; and this was provided for the Schmitt music by the program book. If we do not try to make the program notes serve us as a line guide, but take their general idea and adapt it in our own way, we can make them serve us well. We can contrive our own arrangement of the figures of the drama in the times when the music is contemplative and preparatory and in the moments when it bursts out with a surprise.

The Schmitt suite is entertaining for its orchestration and for its contrasts of tone power and color. Ii commands the listener's attention more fixedly than many a work which is contrived on standard architectural formulas.

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 29,

FLORENT SCHMITT AND MR. KREISLER

French Composer's Work Is Played for First Time by Symphony Orchestra.

By JOHN BROOKS

The seventh Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon offered a program unusually interesting and strong in contrast. It consisted of Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humeres; Mozart's concerto for violin in D major, No. 4; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon"; Viotti's concerto for violin in A minor, No. 22, and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

This was the first time that any of Schmitt's works have been played by the Symphony Orchestra, though four of his songs for four voices were heard at the Sunday concerts at the Opera House last year and a piece for double quintet of wind instruments has been played by the Longy Club. The composer is generally classed with the younger French school. At least he speaks the new orchestral language, and after this first hearing of one of his more important works, one might almost say he speaks with unusual authority. Without the aid of the program one could not understand what it is all about, but with the key thus furnished the first impression is one of interest, to be quickly followed by admiration and a desire for a repetition.

Master of dynamic effects in the orchestra Schmitt undoubtedly is. His phrases are insistent, they seem to break right through the ear into the consciousness, and the most indifferent auditor must listen whether he will or no. Guided by knowledge of the subject, one might say that the music expressed fear, lust, cruelty, jealousy, joy, etc., etc., but this would be reading into it what one had been induced to look for, and would certainly be unfair on a first hearing. It is safe to say, however, that Schmitt is one of the more able of modern composers in the expression of emotion in music, and that whatever one's final judgment on his work may be, his skill in handling his orchestration must bring unrestricted praise.

To this stormy, tempestuous opening, Mozart's joyous, care-free concerto was in striking contrast. Mr. Kreisler was in a particularly happy mood. He seemed full of sunshine himself and it came out through his violin in a perfection of execution that made the occa[illegible]ion memorable. Both this number and [illegible] Viotti concerto were played exquis[illegible]. Particularly in the sustained [illegible]y of the second movements, the [illegible]'s violin sang with almost the [illegible]ness of an ethereal human voice. [illegible]ese pieces, the two overtures [illegible] setting, but as played under [illegible]k, most satisfactory.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Patriotism Astray.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

An interesting suggestion has been the outgrowth of the astounding patriotic display which concluded the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening.

It has been cast as a reproach on the citizens of this republic, by fellow travellers of other nationalities crossing the ocean, that while Englishmen and Germans sing their national hymns with fervor and knowledge, Americans mostly blunder through "The Star-Spangled Banner" any old way, with a pathetic reliance on the other fellow to do the work, that has resulted in a lamentable lack of volume, save that supplied by the band.

Can it be that our ignorance lies even deeper and we do not know enough to distinguish between our national anthem and the tune of "America" that was brazenly stolen from our conquered foes, a generation or more ago, as they had appropriated it from the Vaterland?

That seems to be the only explanation for the astonishing spectacle of an immense audience rising en masse to stand through the performance of "Heil der am Siegerkranz," blindly following a few who rose from a mistaken sense of patriotism, or perhaps because they really were Britons or Saxons, who had a good reason to rise as a tribute to what belonged to them.

This is the thought suggestion that is thrust upon us. If our musical knowledge is so meagre, do we really appreciate the symphony concerts in their entirety? How many patronize them for sheer enjoyment or for a sincere desire to increase their musical knowledge, and how many follow the lead of fashion blindly, as they rose on Tuesday evening, because "everybody's doing it" and it seems to be the thing?

MUSIC LOVER.

Providence, Nov. 21.

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 1913

LAST night's audience at the New York Philharmonic concert was perceptibly larger than the average of past years, but there was still a lot of room for improvement. Upstairs and downstairs whole rows of seats were vacant. Let every music-lover hope that this excellent orchestra will hang on a while longer, and not retire from the field in despair, as the Philadelphia orchestra did two or three years ago. Soon or late it will draw good houses. And meanwhile it gives very good concerts.

THE Hon. Josef Stransky, indeed, is a far more skillful showman than his distinguished rival, Prof. Dr. Karl Muck, of Boston. I employ the word "showman" in its most honorable sense. Dr. Muck, without a doubt, has a better orchestra, particularly in the matter of first violins, but Mr. Stransky gives better concerts. That is to say, they are more interesting, more varied, more discreet in their appeal. It is impossible to imagine any person with ears being bored by the program of last night. But Dr. Muck, playing good music superbly, has often managed to convey a sense of monotony. I don't attempt to analyze it or account for it: I merely state it as a fact.

ALL the criticisms I heard of last night's performance of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony were purely academic and hyperesthetic—the intelligent, but by no means important objections of specialists in tone and tempo. To the unprofessional hearer the thing was done magnificently. And what a splendid composition it is! The gamboling of a god! A masterpiece of good humor, waggish ingenuity, sublime gemüthlichkeit, and always with that undercurrent of sadness, that dim suggestion of the tragic—now in the cellos (Prosit, Herr Schulz!), now in the horns (Oh, rare Xavier Reiter!). Critical cant is against the Eighth Symphony: perhaps it is too close to the Ninth to be judged fairly. But how it tickleth the ear! How it soothes and caresses!

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

FOR A "SYMPHONY" PROGRAMME.

One Subscriber Who Would Like a Little Simple Music.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I have no doubt that if I knew anything about music I should know better than to write this letter. However, ignorance lends boldness, and my venture into the realms of the (comparatively) unknown is less intrepid than it may appear to youthful music teachers and the rest of the cognoscenti. For I am supported by the knowledge that numerous of my fellow subscribers to the Boston Symphony series feel much as I do. Mostly, as a measure of precaution, they keep any expression of their sentiment from their wives and neighbors. But in moments of unusual candor with congenial spirits whom they feel to be sympathetic they unburden themselves much as I am now about to unburden myself.

Briefly, my plea is for the rendition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, at some time during the season, of a full orchestral version of "Juanita." Not that I love "Juanita" more, but that I understand Mr. Somebody's Fifth Symphony in X-flat, op. 23, less. Nor do I insist on the choice of the particular ditty here mentioned. I am willing to compromise on "Shepherd Boy," or "Old Black Joe," or "Nancy Lee," or "Kathleen Mavourneen," or even "Banks of the Wabash."

What I really want, Mr. Editor, is to hear something by a good orchestra which appeals in some slight degree to my simple, untutored musical taste. I am willing to pay my money and incase myself in evening garb and suffocate in the infernal lack of ventilation which accompanies our Providence climax of "musical culture," though the willingness makes little difference with the lady of the house, who declares that not to attend the Symphonies—and to be seen there—is a "perfectly impossible (sic) idea."

I do this more or less willingly, as I say, not only to preserve at least the forms of peace in the family, but because I do sincerely hope that at some far distant future day, I shall learn to know the difference between an "allegro non tanto" and an "andante con moto." (At the present time, I frankly confess, I suspect them of being new brands of imported cheese which the composers are subsidized to work into their programmes.)

And, indeed, while I do not wish to boast, there have been symphony concerts some parts of which I did really, though moderately, enjoy. Though this did not include the horrific display of concatenated discord which was thrust from the stage of Infantry Hall last evening.

Having thus described my personal attitude toward attendance at these concerts, the force of my plea for something simple and melodic should be apparent: something within the range of the comprehension of the unmusical barbarians of whom I am one, that fully 75 per cent of the a composed of people who go as I to keep peace in the family or appearances among the neighb the hope that sometime the Bos phony Orchestra will forget schedule and play a bit of music" for an encore, the reaso of my plea should seem valid management of the orchestra.

Your musical editor quoted in issue the pathetically truthful a by Abe Martin that lots of peo plaud a Wagnerian selection so get a piece of ragtime for an But woe upon us! The Boston or tion gives us not even that conso For encores are barred, as I understand it, by the railroad timetable.

Without this opportunity for varying the nature of the programmes, would it be so "impossible" a thing for Dr. Muck to put on his list, if not at each concert, at least once or twice during the season, an orchestral version of some favorite folk-song or Southern melody? The worthiness of some of these airs is sufficiently attested by their too infrequent use in substantial orchestral works. Was it Dvorak who wrote a symphony based on "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot?" Have not real, guaranteed grand operas been written which reproduce some of our negro and Indian music?

I do not believe Dr. Muck would need to hang his head in shame forever or blush to look other musicians in the face should he be caught at least once playing "Annie Laurie" or "Tara's Halls." And if he will make the experiment once, just once, here in Providence I will venture to pledge a box of the best selected Rhode Island greenings that the applause for it will be heartier and a tumultuously lot more sincere than that which greeted the rendition last night of Mr. Glazounoff's alleged music.

I trust this suggestion is not too "impossible"—I wish you could hear the lady of the house put the harmonics into her pronunciation of that word when discussing the idea of not attending the Symphony concerts—to find a place in your columns.

MUSIKER NON TROPPO.

Providence, Nov. 19.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date

NOW that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken up the works of Mahler, the most famous man except Toscanini who ever conducted in recent years in New York, there is going to be a sharp division of this musical community over a clash of big events next week.

The feature of the second visit of the Boston men on Dec. 4, will be the first performance, under Karl Muck's direction, at least, of Gustav Mahler's stupendous symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5. Owing to the length of the symphony, there will be but one other number, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler.

As the same evening brings the season's first "Siegfried," it is going to be hard choosing for those who have the option whether to hear Wagner at the opera or the Mahler revival in Carnegie Hall.

FOR his second popular orchestra concert at the Hippodrome on Sunday, Nov. 30, Nahan Franko announces three soloists. They are Cordelia Lee, violin; Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, and Alfred Ilma, baritone. The last named is said to be an Arabian.

Establ 4

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Symphony Concert.

The second in the series of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a very large and brilliant audience to Infantry Hall Tuesday night.

In the gathering were Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Miss Helen Campbell, Miss Hope Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William W. White, Jr., Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriet M. Smith, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Prof. and Mrs. William Macdonald, Prof. and Mrs. William [illegible] land, Miss I. Harris Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Dr. and Mrs. Seth K. Gifford, Mrs. Charles W. North, Mrs. A. Curtis Tingley, Mrs. Leonard C. Tingley, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mrs. William H. Peters, Miss Isabel Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Lacey-Baker, Miss Lacey-Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Steinert, the Misses Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Carr, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Helen Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. J. P. Campbell, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. George A. Freeman, Miss Lyra B. Nickerson, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Miss Caroline D. Kelly, Mrs. Stephen J. Briggs, Mrs. Florence Tillinghast, Mrs. George T. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Harold P. Waterman.

884

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—I was rejoiced to see in today's PUBLIC LEDGER that you had taken up the question of encores at the symphony concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Conceding for a moment that there are three symphonic orchestras of standing in this country, the Boston Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, is the fact borne in mind that of these three, the Philadelphia Orchestra is the only one that permits encores? If we are building up a truly good orchestra in this city that stands for the highest musical ideals and proportions, why should we not do as have the other two orchestras mentioned—considered it to their advantage not to have their harmonious symphonic programs disturbed by the interjection of encores?

S.

Philadelphia, November 25, 1913.

Establ

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Two American Girls, Myrtle Elvyn, pianist, and Vera Barstow, violinist, will make their first appearance in Baltimore Thursday night, November 20, when they will give a joint recital at Albaugh's Theater. Both these artists have played as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Estab 884

From

Address News Providence, R. I.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts will be given in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, Nov. 18. The soloist at this concert will be Miss Ruth Deyo, one of the most brilliant of American pianists, who will be heard in Providence for the first time. Miss Deyo was announced as soloist in Providence several years ago, but a severe illness necessitated her temporary retirement from public life. Now she has resumed her work and is playing more effectively than ever. She will play Brahms'. Concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra.

1884

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Nov. 18. The soloist at this concert will be Miss Ruth Deyo, one of the most brilliant of American pianists, who will be heard in Providence for the first time. Miss Deyo was announced as soloist in Providence several years ago, but a severe illness necessitated her temporary retirement from public life. Now she has resumed her work and is playing more effectively then ever. She will play Brahm's concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra.

Es 884

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date NOV 30 1913

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor (No. 5), and Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major. The Mahler symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Changes have been made at the request of subscribers in the programme for Saturday afternoon. The Beethoven concerto will be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti concertos.

Establi

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE SOLOIST AT CONCERT

Novelty Dedicated to Russian Composer Stravinski Will Also Be Feature of Programme.

Establi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn next Friday evening, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the admired violinist, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

The orchestral feature of the evening will be a novelty, "La Tragédie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt. Schmitt is an Alsatian by birth, but French by inclination and training, and he belongs to the younger school of composers. His "Salome" is not an offspring, as it were, of Oscar Wilde's tragedy, but was inspired by the poem of Robert d'Humieres. The work is in two parts, the first being in two sections and the second, three.

The first section is a prelude and a Dance des Perles. The sections of the second part are respectively entitled "Les Enchantements sur la Mer," "Dance des Eclaire" and "Dance de L'Effroi.' The work was written in 1907, and is dedicated to the Russian composer, Igor Stavinski. The programme in its proper order is as follows: Florent Schmitt, "La Tragedie de Salome"; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin in D Major, No. 2; Dvorak, overture, "Husitska."

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony.

Establ

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given the coming week in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5, and Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin in D major. The Mahler Symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Dr. Muck revived it in Boston last spring with extraordinary success, and it has just been played again in that city. The symphony comes first on the programme.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will not be the one printed in the newspapers a week ago, as Dr. Muck has made a considerable change in it. A large number of the Saturday afternoon subscribers have written both to Dr. Muck and to Mr. Kreisler asking that the Beethoven concerto be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti concertos. Both of them have consented to make the change, and the programme for Saturday afternoon, strictly classical, as first announced, is as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 6	Haydn
Concerto for two wind choirs	Handel
Overture to "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Concerto for violin in D major	Beethoven

of whom I am one [illegible] we contend that fully 75 per cent. of the audiences composed of people who go as I do, either to keep peace in the family or to keep up appearances among the neighbors or in the hope that sometime the Boston Symphony Orchestra will forget its train schedule and play a bit of "lowbrow music" for an encore, the reasonableness of my plea should seem valid to the management of the orchestra.

Your musical editor quoted in a recent issue the pathetically truthful aphorism by Abe Martin that lots of people applaud a Wagnerian selection so as to get a piece of ragtime for an encore. But woe upon us! The Boston organization gives us not even that consolation. For encores are barred, as I understand it, by the railroad timetable.

Without this opportunity for varying the nature of the programmes, would it be so "impossible" a thing for Dr. Muck to put on his list, if not at each concert, at least once or twice during the season, an orchestral version of some favorite folk-song or Southern melody? The worthiness of some of these airs is sufficiently attested by their too infrequent use in substantial orchestral works. Was it Dvorak who wrote a symphony based on "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot?" Have not real, guaranteed grand operas been written which reproduce some of our negro and Indian music?

I do not believe Dr. Muck would need to hang his head in shame forever or blush to look other musicians in the face should he be caught at least once playing "Annie Laurie" or "Tara's Halls." And if he will make the experiment once, just once, here in Providence I will venture to pledge a box of the best selected Rhode Island greenings that the applause for it will be heartier and a tumultuously lot more sincere than that which greeted the rendition last night of Mr. Glazounoff's alleged music.

I trust this suggestion is not too "impossible"—I wish you could hear the lady of the house put the harmonics into her pronunciation of that word when discussing the idea of not attending the Symphony concerts—to find a place in your columns.

MUSIKER NON TROPPO.
Providence, Nov. 19.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date NO[illegible]

Estab

NOW that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken up the works of Mahler, the most famous man except Toscanini who ever conducted in recent years in New York, there is going to be a sharp division of this musical community over a clash of big events next week.

The feature of the second visit of the Boston men on Dec. 4, will be the first performance, under Karl Muck's direction, at least, of Gustav Mahler's stupendous symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5. Owing to the length of the symphony, there will be but one other number, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler.

As the same evening brings the season's first "Siegfried," it is going to be hard choosing for those who have the option whether to hear Wagner at the opera or the Mahler revival in Carnegie Hall.

FOR his second popular orchestra concert at the Hippodrome on Sunday, Nov. 30, Nahan Franko announces three soloists. They are Cordelia Lee, violin; Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, and Alfred Ilma, baritone. The last named is said to be an Arabian.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Symphony Concert.

The second in the series of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a very large and brilliant audience to Infantry Hall Tuesday night.

In the gathering were Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Miss Helen Campbell, Miss Hope Smith, Mr. and Mrs. William W. White, Jr., Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriet M. Smith, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Prof. and Mrs. William Macdonald, Prof. and Mrs. William [illegible]land, Miss I. Harris Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Dr. and Mrs. Seth K. Gifford, Mrs. Charles W. North, Mrs. A. Curtis Tingley, Mrs. Leonard C. Tingley, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mrs. William H. Peters, Miss Isabel Peters, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Lacey-Baker, Miss Lacey-Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Steinert, the Misses Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Carr, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Helen Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. J. P. Campbell, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. George A. Freeman, Miss Lyra B. Nickerson, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Miss Caroline D. Kelly, Mrs. Stephen J. Briggs, Mrs. Florence Tillinghast, Mrs. George T. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. Harold P. Waterman.

E 884

[illegible]C LEDGER
Phi[illegible]delphia

[illegible] Editor of the Public Ledger:

[illegible] was rejoiced to see in today's PUBLIC [illegible] that you had taken up the question of [illegible] at the symphony concerts of the [illegible]delphia Orchestra. Conceding for a moment that there are three symphonic orchestras of standing in this country, the Boston [illegible], the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestra, is the fact borne [illegible] that of these three, the Philadel[illegible] Orchestra is the only one that permits encores? If we are building up a truly good orchestra in this city that stands for the highest musical ideals and proportions, why should we not do as have the other two orchestras mentioned—considered it to their advantage not to have their harmonious symphonic programs disturbed by the interjection of encores?

S.
Philadelphia, November 25, 1913.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible] 2 1913

Two American Girls, Myrtle Elvyn, pianist, and Vera Barstow, violinist, will make their first appearance in Baltimore Thursday night, November 20, when they will give a joint recital at Albaugh's Theater. Both these artists have played as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Estab 884

From
Address News Providence, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts will be given in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, Nov. 18. The soloist at this concert will be Miss Ruth Deyo, one of the most brilliant of American pianists, who will be heard in Providence for the first time. Miss Deyo was announced as soloist in Providence several years ago, but a severe illness necessitated her temporary retirement from public life. Now she has resumed her work and is playing more effectively than ever. She will play Brahms'. Concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra.

1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Nov. 18. The soloist at this concert will be Miss Ruth Deyo, one of the most brilliant of American pianists, who will be heard in Providence for the first time. Miss Deyo was announced as soloist in Providence several years ago, but a severe illness necessitated her temporary retirement from public life. Now she has resumed her work and is playing more effectively then ever. She will play Brahm's concerto in B-flat for pianoforte and orchestra.

Es 884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 30 1913

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor (No. 5), and Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major. The Mahler symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Changes have been made at the request of subscribers in the programme for Saturday afternoon. The Beethoven concerto will be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti concertos.

Establi

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

FRITZ KREISLER TO BE SOLOIST AT CONCERT

Novelty Dedicated to Russian Composer Stravinski Will Also Be Feature of Programme.

Establi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn next Friday evening, in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the admired violinist, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

The orchestral feature of the evening will be a novelty, "La Trage'die de Salome," by Florent Schmitt. Schmitt is an Alsatian by birth, but French by inclination and training, and he belongs to the younger school of composers. His "Salome" is not an offspring, as it were, of Oscar Wilde's tragedy, but was inspired by the poem of Robert d'Humieres. The work is in two parts, the first being in two sections and the second, three.

The first section is a prelude and a Dance des Perles. The sections of the second part are respectively entitled "Les Enchantements sur la Mer," "Dance des Eclaire" and "Dance de L'Effroi.' The work was written in 1907, and is dedicated to the Russian composer, Igor Stavinski. The programme in its proper order is as follows: Florent Schmitt, "La Tragedie de Salome"; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin in D Major, No. 2; Dvorak, overture, "Husitska."

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date NOV [illegible]

The Boston Symphony.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given the coming week in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5, and Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin in D major. The Mahler Symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Dr. Muck revived it in Boston last spring with extraordinary success, and it has just been played again in that city. The symphony comes first on the programme.

Establ

The programme for Saturday afternoon will not be the one printed in the newspapers a week ago, as Dr. Muck has made a considerable change in it. A large number of the Saturday afternoon subscribers have written both to Dr. Muck and to Mr. Kreisler asking that the Beethoven concerto be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti concertos. Both of them have consented to make the change, and the programme for Saturday afternoon, strictly classical, as first announced, is as follows:

Symphony in G major, No. 6	Haydn
Concerto for two wind choirs	Handel
Overture to "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Concerto for violin in D major	Beethoven

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

The second part of Boston Symphony concerts will be given the coming week in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor No. 5 and Tchaikovsky's Concerto for Violin in D major. The Mahler Symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Dr. Muck revived it in Boston last spring with extraordinary success, and it has just been played again in that city. The symphony comes first on the programme. The programme for Saturday afternoon will not be the one printed in the papers a week ago, as Dr. Muck has made a considerable change in it. A large number of the Saturday afternoon subscribers have written both to Dr. Muck and to Mr. Kreisler, asking that the Beethoven Concerto be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti Concertos. Both of them have consented to make the change, and the programme for Saturday afternoon, strictly classical as first announced, is as follows: Haydn Symphony in G major, No. 6; Handel Concerto for two wind choirs; Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven Concerto for Violin in B major.

884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto. The orchestral feature of the evening will be a novelty, "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt. Schmitt is an Alsatian by birth but French by inclination and training, and he belongs to the younger school of composers. His "Salome" is not an offspring, as it were, of Oscar Wilde's tragedy, but was inspired by the poem of Robert d'Humieres. The work is in two parts, the first being in two sections and the second three. The first section is a prelude and a "Dance des Perles"; the sections of the second part are respectively entitled, "Les enchantements sur la Mer," "Dance des Eclairs," and "Dance de L'Effroi." The work was written in 1907 and is dedicated to the Russian composer, Igor Stravinski.

Estal 884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 28 1913

Discussion of encores in the PUBLIC LEDGER has aroused much interest in the musical world and Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, telegraphed to this newspaper his views and told why he opposed encores. Opposition also was expressed by Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and his wife, the well-known pianist, who is known on the concert stage as Olga Samaroff. (12)

Estal 84

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

Melodic Jottings

Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Monday evening, December 1. He will play the Brahms Concerto. The Symphony will be the stupendous work in C sharp minor by Gustav Mahler. This work was first performed in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke. It was later played in New York under the direction of the composer. Last spring Doctor Muck played it in Boston and its performance was one of the events of the season.

* * *

Est 884

From EVE. JOURNAL
Address New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will take place next Thursday evening and the following Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. At the first concert Dr. Muck has chosen a programme consisting only of Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony and the Tschaikowsky Concerto for violin and orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. At the second concert there is to be the G major symphony of Haydn, a concerto for two wind choirs by Haendel, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and the Beethoven violin concerto, with Mr. Kreisler again the soloist.

Esta 1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 28 1913

ORCHESTRA LEADERS OPPOSED TO ENCORES

1884

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony, Telegraphs to Public Ledger His Opinion.

VIEW OF THE STOKOWSKIS

Discussion of encores in the PUBLIC LEDGER has aroused much interest in the musical world. An important contribution on the subject came to the PUBLIC LEDGER yesterday in the form of a telegram from Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The message read:

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

There is no place for an encore in a symphony program, because, in the first place, it is inartistic. A conductor builds a program in order to play certain styles and schools of music within a certain time and an encore spoils the combinations and increases unduly the length of the concert. In the second place, to demand an encore is cruelty to the soloist. An artist having given all his best efforts in his solo number cannot again rise to the same pitch, mental, emotional, or physical. It is unfair to ask him to attempt it.

KARL MUCK.

Boston, November 27.

STOKOWSKI OPPOSES ENCORES

The interest among patrons of the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts is very great, and it developed yesterday that Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and his wife, the well-known pianist—known on the concert stage as Olga Samaroff—are opposed to encores being given by artists appearing with symphony orchestras. Mr. Stokowski said that he did not wish to take an arbitrary stand in the matter, but hoped the encores eventually would be abolished at Philadelphia Orchestra concerts.

Spending Thanksgiving Day at their home, 2014 Pine street, the conductor and Mrs. Stokowski consented to be interviewed on the subject. Mr. Stokowski was hurrying from the house when seen and only could touch upon the salient points of the present controversy. Both the conductor and his wife, however, discussed the attitude taken by Josef Hofmann in refusing to play encores at the two orchestra concerts last week and unequivocally upheld the artist.

INDORSES HOFMANN'S VIEWS

"I indorse Mr. Hofmann's views on the matter," said Mr. Stokowski, "and, personally, I am absolutely opposed to encores. I admire Mr. Hofmann not only as a superlatively great artist, but as a man who has courage to carry out his artistic principles at the expense of a certain kind of popularity.

"I am opposed to encores from artistic as well as practical reasons. Perhaps the public does not know how extremely difficult it is to make a program for a symphony concert. Not only quality must be considered, but quantity—that is to say, the program must end at a certain time or approximately. Symphony programs must have a perfect unity, and from the standpoint of quantity should not be too long or too short. In building a program the conductor must know his audience. This is true particularly in Philadelphia, where there is such a large suburban life, and the patrons must know how long the concert will last in order to make their arrangements.

"It often happens when an artist is appearing with an orchestra that some selection might be given which would be a fitting and satisfactory end to the concert in question, and yet the conductor is unable to put this particular work on the program, as he has to allow ten or fifteen minutes for the encore and, therefore, has to substitute a shorter and much less satisfactory work. This happens repeatedly. It is impossible for the conductor to make suggestion or influence the choice of the encore to be played by the soloist, and it often happens that inappropriate pieces are played which completely destroy the mood for the rest of the concert.

"The addition to the length of the program also makes a more or less general exodus from the house and creates a restless atmosphere.

"These purely practical reasons surely can be realized by those who are unable to agree to the artistic ones. I have not and shall not take any arbitrary stand in the matter, but I surely hope the people who have accepted the no-encore rule of the Boston Symphony Orchestra eventually will accept it at the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra."

VIEWS OF MRS. STOKOWSKI.

Mrs. Stokowski, sitting in the music room of her home, the walls of which are lined with the scores of the world's greatest symphonies, operas and piano compositions, likewise gave an illuminating interview on the question. She heartily voiced the sentiments of her husband and gave a delightful glance from the viewpoint of the artist appearing with a great symphony orchestra.

"This quetsion has been much debated," she said, "but I believe the majority of soloists are opposed to encores. The soloist is a unit as compared to the orchestra. The orchestra is a great oil painting—you never would put a delicate etching in the frame of a great painting, nor would you place Chippendale furniture in a Renaissance room. The piano virtually is put in a big frame at a symphony concert. When the instrument is played alone the whole tone of the concert is changed.

"The mere repetition of a movement in the concerto is not satisfactory because an audience does not like repetition. Of course, many persons are desirous that encores be played, but if the audience once becomes accustomed to the fitness and proportion of a concert they will not miss the encores and will not feel as though they have lost anything without them.

"It has been said that the abolition of the encore will dispel enthusiasm. That is not the case. There is a marked difference in applause from the standpoint of the artist—there is the applause for more, and there is the applause of appreciation for the work accomplished. When an artist appears before one of the orchestras where encores are not permitted, it means more to be recalled by the applause of the audience than it does 10 or 12 times to an audience where encores are permitted. It is inspiring to the artist.

"In music, which is so subtle and intangible, it is difficult to bring proof in a tangible form regarding the encore. The most tangible form, however, to the question is the fact that virtually every orchestra in the world has adopted the no-encore rule."

The orchestras which have forbidden encores are the following: Boston Symphony, Philharmonic of New York city, Vienna Philharmonic, Berlin Philarmonic, Royal Subscription Orchestra of Berlin, the Munich Konzert Verein, Colonne of Paris, Lamoreux of Paris and the majority of the orchestras in the German Empire.

In contrast to this list, Mrs. Stokowski gave the orchestras which permit encores. They follow: Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Cincinnati.

"I think," added the artist, "Philadelphia would rather be in the first list."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Establ

Kreisler and Boston Orchestra Friday.

PARLOW AND BACHAUS RECITAL TO-MORROW

Two Symphony Concerts in Manhattan—Kneisel and Flonzaley Quartets—Numerous Concerts and Recitals Are Scheduled.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto.

The orchestral feature of the evening will be a novelty, "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, who is an Alsatian by birth, but French by inclination and training, and belongs to the younger schools of composers. His Salome is not an offspring, as it were, of Oscar Wilde's tragedy, but was inspired by the poem of Robert d'Humieres.

The work is in two parts, the first being in two sections and the second, three. The first section is a prelude and a danse des perles; the sections of the second part are, respectively, entitled "Les enchantements sur la Mer," "Dance des Elairs" and "Dance de L'Effroi." The work was written in 1907 and is dedicated to the Russian composer, Igor Stravinski. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Florent Schmitt, "La Tragedie de Salome;" Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin in D major, No. 2; Dvorak, overture, "Husitska."

Newspaper Cutt

From ~~TRIBUNE~~
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 1913

"SYMPHONY" PROGRAMMES.

Commiserations for a Benighted Intelligence on Parade.

Estal

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal.

May I have a little space in which to answer "Musiker non Troppo"? Poor man! Doomed to hear one of the finest orchestras in the world, and unable to enjoy it because it will not play "Annie Laurie" or "Old Black Joe"! Musiker is honest, and his remarks about the cheese were really funny; but if to his dutifulness as a husband, his honesty, and his sense of humor he would add a little intellectual humility, his sufferings at the Symphony concerts might be greatly alleviated.

What does he think that orchestra represents? A money-making scheme? No. It could not exist a year in its present perfection without heavy financial backing. The fad of a few millionaires? No. They could provide the orchestra, but not the audience. Something for society to go to? No. In a neighboring city thousands of working people attend at reduced prices. Such an orchestra, composed of individual artists and headed by a master-musician, really represents the highest point of musical intelligence reached by a nation. The fact that "Musiker" and hundreds of oth honestly enjoy it

The Symphony Orchestra does not play popular music for the same reason that "Musiker" does not select a dandelion when he can pick a superb rose; nor buy a rhinestone when he can as easily have a diamond, nor expect a cup of water from Niagara when he can have it from the home faucet. The simple melodies he refers to have their rightful place, but why not try to understand a more colossal music structure?

Yes, it is true that Dvorak founded a symphony on American negro melodies, but, unless "Musiker" brushes up a little, he would better stay at home on the night it is played. If he were the least bit musical (which I am afraid he is not), he would hear dozens of little melodies as charming as his favorites, woven into the grander compositions like golden threads in a great tapestry.

If he really wanted to find out what there was in this seeming "horrific display of concatenated discord," he would talk seriously with musicians, read up a bit, or even go to a preparatory lecture, if there are any this year. Then, having obtained a little understanding of the subject matter of big compositions, if he honestly dislikes the programme, he can still say so—but intelligently.

This much "Musiker" can do. Try to enjoy the orchestra simply, a sound (he has admitted that it is rather pleasing at times). Listen for the heavenly sweetness of the violins, the richness of the 'cellos, the deep boom of the great bass viols, the plaintive piping of the oboes, the brilliance of the clarinets and the glorious crash of the brass. Melody is all right, and it is no crime to love it, but there is something more to music than melody.

If he cannot do even this, let him stay at home, play "Nancy Lee" with one finger and send his Symphony ticket to me.

HIGHBROW.

Providence, Nov. 24.

Audiences Are Sincere.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I think it is a slander on many hundreds of people to say that three-quarters of the audiences at the symphony concerts go because they think it is the "proper thing," and not because they enjoy good music, as one of your correspondents did last Sunday. Of course there are some, and there always will be. Some people go to church for the same reason. But I believe, judging by the appreciation which is shown, that the number is very small. Certainly it is not 75 per cent., and such wholesale slurs should not be allowed.

H. F. W.

Providence, Nov. 27.

A Chance for "Musiker."

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

May one suggest to your correspondent who complains because the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not play ragtime or plantation folk songs that blacksmith shops do not manufacture watches, nor do woolen factories weave fancy silks. A symphony orchestra is one kind of musical organization: a German street band is another. Your correspondent is at perfect liberty to choose the kind he prefers, but having chosen, let him not expect figs to grow from thistles or roses from skunk cabbage.

May one further suggest that a street piano, easily to be engaged by the hour or day, might furnish the kind of "music" your correspondent so earnestly desires.

"A PIACERE."

Providence, Nov. 25.

Invitation Has Been Transmitted.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Will you kindly transmit to "Musiker non troppo," who writes concerning symphony concert programmes in to-day's issue, my invitation to meet at —— restaurant after the next Boston Symphony. I should like to meet and congratulate him and ask him to "have one." If a few more would admit their real preferences, fewer would have to "throw the bluff" that they go because they like symphonies, when as a matter of fact they go because they think they have to keep up appearances.

Accompanying this you will find my business card, name and address as a guarantee to "Musiker" that the invitation goes.

FELLOW SUFFERER.

Providence, Nov. 23.

ERICAN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
Date 1913

Boston Symphony's Fine Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, director, gave its second concert of this season last evening at the Lyric, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist. The house was crowded, in spite of the recent advance in prices, and the concert was one of the greatest artistic successes the now famous orchestra has ever had.

The following superb program was given.

Es 1884

[69]

FOR A “SYMPHONY” PROGRAMME.

One Subscriber Who Would Like a Little Simple Music.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I have no doubt that if I knew anything about music I should know better than to write this letter. However ignorance lends boldness, and my venture into the realms of the (comparatively) unknown is less intrepid than it may appear to youthful music teachers and the rest of the cognoscenti. For I am supported by the knowledge that numerous of my fellow subscribers to the Boston Symphony series feel much as I do. Mostly, as a measure of precaution, they keep any expression of their sentiment from their wives and neighbors. But in moments of unusual candor with congenial spirits whom they feel to be sympathetic they unburden themselves much as I am now about to unburden myself.

Briefly, my plea is for the rendition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, at some time during the season, of a full orchestral version of “Juanita.” Not that I love “Juanita” more, but that I understand Mr. Somebody's Fifth Symphony in X-flat, op. 23, less. Nor do I insist on the choice of the particular ditty here mentioned. I am willing to compromise on “Shepherd Boy,” or “Old Black Joe,” or “Nancy Lee,” or “Kathleen Mavourneen,” or even “Banks of the Wabash.”

What I really want, Mr. Editor, is to hear something by a good orchestra which appeals in some slight degree to my simple, untutored musical taste. I am willing to pay my money and incase myself in evening garb and suffocate in the infernal lack of ventilation which accompanies our Providence climax of “musical culture,” though the willingness makes little difference with the lady of the house, who declares that not to attend the Symphonies—and to be seen there—is a “perfectly impossible (sic) idea.”

I do this more or less willingly, as I say, not only to preserve at least the forms of peace in the family, but because I do sincerely hope that maybe, at some far distant future day, I shall learn to know the difference between an “allegro non tanto” and an “andante con moto.” (At the present time, I frankly confess, I suspect them of being new brands of imported cheese which the composers are subsidized to work into their programmes.)

And, indeed, while I do not wish to boast, there have been symphony concerts some parts of which I did really, though moderately, enjoy. Though this did not include the horrific display of concatenated discord which was thrust from the stage of Infantry Hall last evening.

Having thus described my personal attitude toward attendance at these concerts, the force of my plea for something simple and melodic should be apparent: something within the range of the comprehension of the unmusical barbarians of whom I am one. When we consider that fully 75 per cent. of the audiences is composed of people who go as I do, either to keep peace in the family or to keep up appearances among the neighbors or in the hope that sometime the Boston Symphony Orchestra will forget its train schedule and play a bit of “lowbrow music” for an encore, the reasonableness of my plea should seem valid to the management of the orchestra.

Your musical editor quoted in a recent issue the pathetically truthful aphorism by Abe Martin that lots of people applaud a Wagnerian selection so as to get a piece of ragtime for an encore. But woe upon us! The Boston organization gives us not even that consolation. For encores are barred, as I understand it, by the railroad timetable.

Without this opportunity for varying the nature of the programmes, would it be so “impossible” a thing for Dr. Muck to put on his list, if not at each concert, at least once or twice during the season, an orchestral version of some favorite folk-song or Southern melody? The worthiness of some of these airs is sufficiently attested by their too infrequent use in substantial orchestral works. Was it Dvorak who wrote a symphony based on “Swing Low, Sweet Chariot?” Have not real, guaranteed grand operas been written which reproduce some of our negro and Indian music?

I do not believe Dr. Muck would need to hang his head in shame forever or blush to look other musicians in the face should he be caught at least once playing “Annie Laurie” or “Tara's Halls.” And if he will make the experiment once, just once, here in Providence, I will venture to pledge a box of the best selected Rhode Island greenings that the applause for it will be heartier and a tumultuously lot more sincere than that which greeted the rendition last night of Mr. Glazounoff's alleged music.

I trust this suggestion is not too “impossible”—I wish you could hear the lady of the house put the harmonics into her pronunciation of that word when discussing the idea of not attending the Symphony concerts—to find a place in your columns.

MUSIKER NON TROPPO.

Providence, Nov. 19.

OUR NATIONAL AIR.

Even a Symphony Concert Audience Isn't Sure of It.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

Isn't it remarkable how few American people know their own national air? Invariably when an orchestra or band plays “God Save the King,” better known to us as “My Country 'Tis of Thee,” the audience present will stand. No matter whether the playing of a national air that does not belong to us occurs in a theatre, a restaurant or a concert hall, the same thing occurs; the entire audience rises.

The national air of the United States is the “Star Spangled Banner,” and we have no other recognized national air. The music of “My Country 'Tis of Thee,” wherever it may have originated, belongs by recognition to England.

It would have been amusing at last night's Symphony concert had not the entire finale of Weber's magnificent “Jubel” overture been spoiled by the noise of the uprising, to see the entire audience composed of Providence “lead- [illegible] and education” [illegible] ody was “God Save the King” and belonged either to Denmark, Germany or England.

CHARLES LOVENBERG.

Providence, Nov. 19.

Patriotism Astray.

o the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

An interesting suggestion has been the outgrowth of the astounding patriotic display which concluded the concert of he Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesay evening.

It has been cast as a reproach on the itizens of this republic, by fellow travllers of other nationalities crossing the ocean, that while Englishmen and Germans sing their national hymns with ervor and knowledge, Americans mostly lunder through “The Star-Spangled Banner” any old way, with a pathetic reliance on the other fellow to do the work, that has resulted in a lamentable lack of volume, save that supplied by the band.

Can it be that our ignorance lies even deeper and we do not know enough to distinguish between our national anthem and the tune of “America” that was brazenly stolen from our conquered foes, a generation or more ago, as they had appropriated it from the Vaterland?

That seems to be the only explanation for the astonishing spectacle of an immense audience rising en masse to stand through the performance of “Heil der am Siegerkranz,” blindly following a few who rose from a mistaken sense of patriotism, or perhaps because they really were Britons or Saxons, who had a good reason to rise as a tribute to what belonged to them.

This is the thought suggestion that is thrust upon us. If our musical knowledge is so meagre, do we really appreciate the symphony concerts in their entirety? How many patronize them for sheer enjoyment or for a sincere desire to increase their musical knowledge, and how many follow the lead of fashion blindly, as they rose on Tuesday evening, because “everybody's doing it” and t seems to be the thing?

MUSIC LOVER.

Providence, Nov. 21.

From EVENING POST

Address: New York City

Date DEC 5 191

rk, 1

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

It must have been as great a pleasure for Fritz Kreisler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play for a crowded and demonstrative audience like that which filled Carnegie Hall last night as it was for that audience to listen to the superlative art of that violinist and orchestra. Mr. Kreisler played the difficult but effective concerto by Tchaikovsky, a work which, unlike so many concertos, is melodious and inspired as well as brilliant. A more vibrant, luscious, seething tone than he evoked from his instrument in the Canzonetta has never been heard in a concert hall. That demonstrated the melodic side of Mr. Kreisler's artistry. The rhythmic was revealed in the allegro, which he played with a dash and vigor and with incisive, transporting accents such as perhaps no other violinist has had at his command; indeed, Kreisler is rhythm incarnate. His command of the third element of music—harmony—was shown in the wonderful cadenza—his own, of course—a cadenza in which he summed up for violin alone the quintessence of the whole concerto and presented it with an idiomatic art of expression which the composer himself, naturally enough, never reached. This cadenza is as superb as the one which Mr. Kreisler will play at the Boston Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon. When Kriesler plays these cadenzas of his, one does not miss the orchestra, so rich and varied is his tone, so intricate the weaving of melodies into thrilling harmonies. Reader, if you did not hear this performance last night, go and hear it in Brooklyn to-night—if you can get a seat. The applause for Kreisler, both before and after the performance, was overwhelming.

The Tchaikovsky concerto followed a performance of Mahler's fifth symphony, which has been called the “Giant Symphony,” partly because it lasts an hour and twenty minutes, partly because it enlists an exceptionally large orchestra. The work was not a novelty, having been performed here in 1906 by the same orchestra, with some cuts. Its foolish, suicidal length would prevent it from ever coming much into vogue, even if were a greater work than it is. To a virtuoso orchestra like the Boston Symphony, and a great conductor like Dr. Muck it offers glorious opportunities which were fully realized last night; more wonderful playing has never been heard in Carnegie Hall, and again there was much applause.

Mahler is as ingenious as Berlioz in the invention of tricks of orchestration, and he lays on the colors as thick as Richard Strauss, with whom he has much kinship otherwise, especially in the aimless spinning out of unimportant material in the vain effort to make it seem important. Were this symphony cut down from eighty minutes to forty it could be made into a masterwork. The adagietto is lovely as music and compels the audience to share the composer's mood, and there is much that is striking in the opening funeral march. There is a curious quotation from Bach; there are allusions to Wagner and other composers almost amounting to quotations, and the Danube repeatedly makes its appearance, musically speaking.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City.

Date DEC 5 1913

Esta 1884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Gustav Mahler's symphony No. 5, C sharp minor, was played last night at Carnegie Hall for the first time in its entirety. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it before Mr. Gericke had made cuts and even revised certain passages. But Dr. Muck, the austere, the inexorable, made us listen to every page, every bar, every note.

The result vindicated Mr. Gericke's judgment. Of course the symphony is unquestionably a great work and an inspired. Of course there are passages of transcendent beauty, touched with the fire of human emotion expressed in a literally breath-bereaving fashion. There is true elegiac magnificence in that mighty dirge with which the symphony opens. The waltz melody in the scherzo is a piece of exquisitely sustained writing. Moreover, were every moment of the work dull and banal until the last three minutes it would be worth sitting through it all for the sake of those last three minutes. And needless to say the symphony is never for a moment banal, whatever its faults.

But Mr. Gericke was right. The thing is simply of inhuman length. Although it is a thousand times more than worth sitting through it it would be idle to pretend that it could not be improved by cutting. There are many superfluous passages, repetitions, places that sound as if the composer wanted to stop, but could not.

The orchestra gave an impeccable performance of the work. Dr. Muck's reading of the score was on the whole a brilliant piece of sympathetic and illuminative interpretation. Then again there were dry moments when an austere scholasticism emphasized the tediousness of the superfluous passages. At the supreme moments, however, he was simply electrifying.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Tschaikowsky violin concerto No. 2 contained all the dazzling qualities that make this man the premier violinist of his day. It is an empty work at best, once the first movement is over, but Mr. Kreisler carried his audience away by the sheer magnetism of his luscious tone in that banal andante and the galvanic bravura with which he dashed through the specious, jingling finale. His virtuosity in the exhausting cadenza in the first movement was nothing short of masterly.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City.

Date

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave a programme at Carnegie Hall last night which consisted of two numbers, in one of which Fritz Kreisler was soloist. The number, which occupied seventy minutes, was the late Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, which Dr. Muck had prepared with infinitude of care and which he read with a deep touch of sympathy and reverence.

It was played with a virtuosity and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse the utmost admiration for this great organization of artists. Never was the outcry of a tortured soul more deftly, more piteously penned or conceived, never was the whirl of life more grimly indicated than in the second movement, with its attempt at a waltz rhythm, by the side of which is the steady, destructive and discordant note of suffering.

Not until the slow movement did one feel that there was a love motive, but in this “adagietto” for one short period there was surcease of struggle, peace and unspeakable joy. The volleys of applause attested that the audience felt the message.

Fritz Kreisler's superb reading of the Tschaikowsy concerto was a great and welcome anti-climax.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date DEC 5 1913

Estabi 4

WHY doesn't the Boston Orchestra give the New York public a chance to hear it on Saturday nights? The men are here. Some of them will be playing to-morrow at the second Longy Club concert in Æolian Hall. Let the whole hundred appear, and they could fill Carnegie Hall a third time, just as to-night they sell out at the Brooklyn Academy.

“The Tragedy of Salome,” by Florent Schmitt, is a Parisian novelty in Brooklyn this evening. Kreisler plays the Tschaikowsky concerto and Dr. Muck ends with the Dvorak overture, “Husitska.”

---

in the World

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

Established:

BOSTON BAND PLAYS “GIANT” SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has all the courage that is necessary to the possession of convictions. Last evening, at Carnegie Hall, he brought forward the C-sharp minor symphony of Gustav Mahler, whose very name has been taboo in New York since this composer left the city, now two years ago, to die in Vienna. The muddy depths of some part of New York's musical life were frothed into a petty, shameless fury at that time and after they had subsided, Mahler had become a poignant memory to some and his name a tremulous negation to others.

So it has happened that Mahler's symphonies and his songs have sedulously been omitted from concert programmes hereabouts. While he was directing the Philharmonic Orchestra for two seasons, he played only his Fourth and his Second symphonies. New York never heard him interpret his Fifth, which has come to be known abroad as the “Giant” symphony. Yet it would be hard to believe that Mahler would not himself have been thrilled by Dr. Muck's revelation of this work last evening. And, until last night, it had lain mute to New York for seven years.

This symphony is the inner spirit of Mahler. His mental sinew and emotional fibre are palpitant within its boating force, its branding thought, its bitterly chastened and yet mockingly vital feeling. Dr. Muck knows the musician, Mahler, and he knows the man Mahler. And he evoked both in his playing of this symphony last night.

The work speaks not only of Mahler, but of his day and generation, of our own time. Beside its battering derision of the things that are, the pessimism of Tschaikowsky's “Pathetique” is the plaint of a petulant child. It begins with a trumpet call that ushers forth a funeral march containing no accent of grief and interpenetrated with themes caustically and deliberately commonplace. And the trumpet becomes a veritable nemesis, blaring and bleating on and on through its harpy role. It leads its brazen fellows through discordant shrieks of fell design, and the second division of the first part of the symphony becomes the ultimate hell that Hegel would have understood and that Mahler knew how to conceive.

The scherzo is a unique treatment of the waltz theme and is pregnant with meaning. The trio already foreshadows the peculiarly introspective revelation of the adagietto, a revelation of the essential self shaken but unbowed, calm with the quiet of the most profound emotion. The rondo-finale, fugally developed, is a strange mixture of feeling, with derision still sounding the last chord of the coda.

Fritz Kreisler finished the evening with a performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto, notable for its manly vigor in interpretation and ravishing beauties in execution.

Mahler has shown that in this symphony, written ten years ago, he not only stood in the forefront as a master of orchestration, but that he was actually beyond his contemporaries. His originality in both instrumentation and orchestration are patent, but he does not use his powers for their own sake. His orchestral combinations are logical methods of expressing what he has to say.

The “Giant” symphony, so named because of its stupendous proportions, perhaps—it takes an hour and forty minutes in performance—may not have to wait another seven years for a rehearing. Last night's audience did not seem to find it too taxing as to length and was warm in applause at its end. Dr. Muck caused his men to rise and take the applause with him and they deserved all they received, for the Mahler work is extremely difficult and it was played with a devotion, comprehension and musicianship not often equalled even by the Boston Orchestra.

Address: New York City.

Date DEC 5 1913

GIVES MAHLER SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Causes Wonder by Size of Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited us again last night, whereat we were glad again in unlimited [illegible]. Even if our gladness was tempered a trifle by the extraordinary programme offered by Dr. [illegible], what other orchestra could have survived the test? Truly the Bostonians are wizards to fill the house with an evening devoted solely to a Mahler symphony an hour and twenty minutes long and the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major.

The symphony was Gustav Mahler's [illegible] fore in New York, when [illegible] Boston Orchestra [illegible] the baton of Herr Gericke. Its colossal length was then freely commented on. It lasted last night exactly an hour and twenty minutes.

It seems strange indeed that the composer should not have shown more continence in the work, as there are many portions of it containing charming melodies and haunting rhythms, but the ideas are far too few for the length of the work, with the result that there are many stretches of weariness or mere tumultuous confusion. The great band, however, gave of the symphony a performance that was truly superb, and at times, as toward the end of the first movement, Dr. Muck brought out of the confusion something that was wonderfully eloquent. All true [illegible]lerites owe a tribute of the deepest [illegible] to Karl Muck for the labor of [illegible] he gave last night.

Probably a larger section of the audience, however, were made happy by Fritz Kreisler's playing of the Tschaikowsky concerto, a reading perhaps more suave in style than is generally heard in this work, but one of great brilliance. The large audience showed plentiful enthusiasm, even after the symphony, calling Dr. Muck many times to bow his acknowledgments.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date DEC 5 1913

Established

WHEN those who carry coals t Newcastle are careful to set thei coals on fire, there is at least mor light in a dark world. The Bosto Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall las night, bringing gifts of golden tone tc the production of a symphony by Gustav Mahler, who spent the last four winters of his life in New York. Walter Damrosch once produced the naive Fourth symphony, with its folksong of the "heavenly fiddles." Mahler's own successor with another band is not one of those who find inspiration in the "Titan" First symphony, the "Giant" Fifth, played last night, or the autobiographic Tenth, composed at the "top of the world" in a New York skyscraper. So Karl Muck performed a labor of love for the man he once succeeded at Prague, just as Mahler had succeeded Seidl.

Mahler's Fifth symphony is an hour and a quarter long, and its opening "Funeral March" kept late comers standing nearly half that time. Frankly Mendelssohnian, it rent the brazen heavens at a hero's passing. The scherzo was a Corelli-like memory of waltzes, sardonic, cynical; there were others before Strauss. But in the brief twelve-minute "adagietto," a wonderful bit of playing was heard. It was as if, "beyond the dim unknown," stood a loosened spirit, exploring the realm of pure sound; here was no tone poet, but a great "improvisatore," listening as he evoked echo upon echo in all the blind sonorities of an unseen world. The rondo-finale had its gleam of humor in the fugal treatment of Mahler's song, "Lob des Hohen Verstands," relating to the trial of skill between cuckoo and nightingale with the ass as judge. So the composer came to earth to haunt his critics at the last.

There was huge applause, and Muck on his sixth recall brought the orchestra up-standing. More applause greeted Fritz Kreisler, after an intermission, but the Tschaikowsky concerto seemed a little thing by its very conciseness of form. After Mahler's vast, chaotic vision, you saw other men as ants through a telescope reversed. Compared with one bit of orchestra work unlike anything heard in years, Kreisler's most daring solo cadenza was tame. The canzonetta, however, ending in ventriloquial voices of oboe and violin, brought down the house.

Kreisler played another concerto on a Thursday night last year, and the fame of his Beethoven cadenza then has gone abroad until the Saturday matinee subscribers have made universal demand to hear it in turn. They have their reward to-morrow.

From EVENING WORLD

Address: New York

Date DEC 5 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHON

Dr. Karl Muck faithfully mainta the traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in presenting unfamiliar works. At the concert in Carnegie Hall last night given by the famous visiting aggregation of players from the Hub, he presented Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony. It is a colossal work, in length at least. It takes one hour and seventeen minutes to unfold. The late Mr. Mahler, as a conductor, left a deep impression upon us when he led our own Philharmonic. We also know something of him as a composer, but this fifth symphony of his, at a first hearing, scarcely evokes anything but amazement. It is unusual and it is bizarre. In instrumentation it is marvellous. There are such things as solos for kettledrums and various unusual combinations of choirs. The orchestration is that of a thorough musician, but, clever as it may be, it serves in the main only to make one wonder why?

Mr. Mahler hated programme books, and neither he nor any of his commentators has left analytical notes of the work. The trombones proclaim a dead march at the very beginning, and the whole of the first movement is a funeral march, solemn and measured, built upon a death theme that commands respect; but the development is bewildering and becomes wearisome. There was only perfunctory applause when it ended last night. The scherzo has little more attraction, but the adagietto is very beautiful, full of melody and captivating not merely by contrast, but because of intrinsic loveliness. The end comes in a fugue that, at least, commands respect. The orchestra did all that might be hoped for in clarity of exposition and masterly playing.

There was only one other number on the programme, the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Mr. Kreisler was at his very best, and supported as he was by this splendid aggregation of players, the work of the Russian composer probably never got a better exposition.

There was the usual crowded and fashionable house that the Boston Orchestra always attracts.

EGON PUTZ

From HERALD

Address: New York City.

Date

MAHLER SYMPHONY A COLOSSAL WORK

Boston Orchestra Gives Most Impressive Concert—Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, Recalled Several Times.

Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor No. 5, which was not received with great enthusiasm when played here in 1906 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke, had a most impressive performance by the same organization last night in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Parts of this colossal work are almost overpowering in their forcefulness. There may be a lack of worth while musical material to start with, but it cannot be denied that the work as played last night made a powerful appeal on those who heard it. This Symphony has been called extravagant, but at all events it is marvellous in its workmanship, and all the more so when consideration is taken of the fact that the thematic material is meagre.

Not a small part of the success was due to the masterly way in which Dr. Muck brought out every detail. There was something of a demonstration after the performance, and the conductor was recalled several times. This symphony of Mahler is very exacting on many players, particularly the horns, trumpets and some of the wood winds, and a great deal of credit is due to these individual performers for the virtuosity with which their parts were played.

No less brilliant than the playing of Dr. Muck and his men in the first number of the programme, was the work of Mr. Fritz Kreisler in the last, for there were only two numbers during the evening. It is a matter of conjecture whether Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major ever has received a better interpretation in New York than it received last night at the hands of Mr. Kreisler. There is little new to record about the art of this great violinist. Tonally, technically and temperamentally there was little more that could have been asked for, and the support of the orchestra was excellent. The whole concert was on the highest possible plane and the audience seemed to appreciate that it was hearing something out of the ordinary.

SUN

Address: New York City.

Date

A MAHLER SYMPHONY BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Dr. Carl Muck Gives the Long Composition Without Cuts of Gericke.

EIGHTY MINUTES LONG

A Production With Few Ideas, but a Vast Amount of Sound.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town again yesterday, bowed this time under the awful responsibility of a Viennese evangel in music. The programme for the second evening concert, given last night in Carnegie Hall, comprised just two numbers, to wit, the fifth symphony of the late Gustav Mahler and the violin concerto of Peter I. Tschaikowsky. The former of these two compositions occupied the first hour and twenty minutes of the concert, not to mention as many instruments as could be conveniently crowded on the stage. The latter required less time, demanded chiefly the violin of Fritz Kreisler, and on the whole left its hearers in a more comfortable frame of mind.

Mr. Mahler's fifth symphony came down upon this city like a wolf on the fold on February 15, 1906, when the Boston musicians performed it under the discreet and continent direction of Wilhelm Gericke. This conductor made some interesting cuts in the score, but Dr. Carl Muck, stern Cato of the baton that he is, restored the full outpour of the composer's fancy. The work was first heard in Cologne in 1904 and after the first movement the audience was silent. After the last one there was much applause and some hissing.

Salvo of Applause.

People do not hiss symphonies in this country. Furthermore it would have to be something more fearfully and wonderfully made than this work of Mr. Mahler's to evoke an expression of dissatisfaction when played so magnificently as this symphony was last evening. There was a long salvo of applause at the end and Dr. Muck caused his players to rise and bow. They nobly earned the honor, and the first trumpeter in particular ought to have received extra pay.

A vast deal of pother has been made about the symphonies of Mr. Mahler, and we confess to a real sympathy for this composer, who labored so patiently, so painfully, and so long at a time to construct something important. Some people call the fifth the "Giant Symphony," but the proud commentators who fancy this refers to its content must be mistaken; the name surely refers to its size.

The work is divided into three parts and five movements—we had almost said three acts and five scenes. It begins with a funeral march in C sharp minor, than which no music lover could possibly recall a more hollow and tenuous piece of symphonic pomposity. The first allegro follows immediately, thus placing the funeral march in an appropriate position as its introduction.

This first movement has no theme which rises above the level of the commonplace Nor is there in the working out section that part of a sonata form movement to which a composer is supposed to bring the highest flights of his skill in musical development, anything but pretentious conglomerations of discords and fanciful instrumentation.

With mutes on all the brasses and pizzicati in all the strings, with minor seconds hurled from top to bottom of the page and Fafnerian utterances for the tuba, a power of sound is produced. But of that species of artistic structure awkwardly described by musical writers (for want of a more suitable term) as architectonic there is nothing that should be pronounced anything better than baroque at its worst.

A Reminder of Sisyphus.

The second part consists of one movement, the scherzo, which in this case is written as a slow waltz. Tschaikowsky having set this fashion. Mr. Mahler conceived the promising plan of idealizing the Viennese waltz in his scherzo. But again we are confronted with the futile labors of Sisyphus. At times one can fancy a Prater waltz that had fallen asleep and had disturbing dreams.

The third and last part has two movements, an adagietto in F major and a finale in rondo shape in D major. The adagietto is the most engaging part of the symphony. It has no large inspiration; indeed at times it slips into reminiscences of Italian opera style; but it is fluent, melodious and straightforward. It has a superbly planned instrumental climax in the lower scale, and as it is written for the strings throughout it affords a lovely point of repose in the midst of the general turmoil of instrumentation.

The finale has a fugued section, which is the work of a well schooled musician, and the coda is at least effective. But again the hearer is confronted with a paucity of ideas only half disguised in an embarrassment of instrumental riches. To sum up it is the plain truth that Mr. Mahler had not much to say in this work and occupied a wondrous time in saying it. His manner is ponderous, his matter imponderable.

The soloist in the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, as already noted, was that truly great artist, Fritz Kreisler, who was heard with pleasure by the large audience and warmly applauded. But discussion of his performance is not necessary at this time.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date 1913

Boston Symphony Concert Is Treat

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season, at Carnegie Hall, last night. The programme was remarkable, for it contained but two numbers—Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, and Tshaikowsky's Concerto in D major.

A personal interest was manifested in the symphony because of the composer's local association. He was for several years conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, and for a time occupied the position of director of the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra.

A few months after Mahler's death the first movement of the symphony played last evening was given at a memorial concert in this city. It bears the appropriate title, "Dead March," and contains a number of profound and touching episodes.

The work, as a whole, suggests that of a composer in a transitionary period. It contains measures so full of "effects" as to be quite incomprehensible. The themes are frequent and fragmentary. But the suggestion of Wagner is observed, for the riot of notes usually ends in a few bars of fluent, suave melody.

From PRESS

Address: New York City.

Date 1913

MAHLER'S SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Played in Full Under Direction of Dr. Muck—Triumph for Fritz Kreisler.

If any one dreaded the performance last night in Carnegie Hall of Gustav Mahler's one hour and a half symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5, which was heard in its entirety for the first time since Wilhelm Gericke introduced the work to New Yorkers on February 15, 1906, there was enough pleasure in the anticipation of listening to Fritz Kreisler play late in the evening Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major, the only number on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to act as a counter-irritant.

Few of us realized when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, almost eight years ago, produced Mahler's symphony with the funereal introduction, that Gericke had edited the orchestration, reflecting synically the while, as we may imagine, on how often the composer-conductor himself had treated in similar fashion the scores of other masters.

Dr. Karl Muck did not approve the methods of his predecessor, and restored to the score what the former leader of the Boston orchestra had eliminated. Moreover, he gave it a far more dramatic, interesting and vital interpretation, and if he did not convince his listeners that this gigantic composition in five movements, though it probably represents the author at his best, will be likely to withstand the gnawing tooth of time, it was not his fault, for evidently he conducted it "con amore."

The music is melodious, despite the daring harmonic modulations, contrapuntal bravura, rhythmical gymnastics and instrumental sensations with which it bristles. Indeed, Mahler succeeded in making his technical cleverness subservient to the principal purpose of putting melody in the foreground.

The scintillant mass of cleverly wrought details, with its shifting, merging and blending tonalities, never overshadows entirely his long-breathing, if not always distinguished, melodic lines, and the effect in these days of tonal experiments is singularly lucid and euphonious. The composer has accomplished the task he had set himself of embodying comparatively simple thoughts in a highly wrought, highly colored orchestral idiom. Yet one can never quite lose the feeling of intention, of purpose. True inspiration, the irresistible need of finding expression for pent-up feelings, is wanting.

The symphony was superbly played and served to reveal the virtuosic accomplishments of the Boston orchestra and its masterly conductor in the most brilliant light. Again the first two movements and the Rondo created the most striking effect, whereas the Adagietto, largely because of Dr. Muck's exceedingly slow tempo and the poetic refinements of his reading, made a far deeper impression. Again, too, the essential triviality of the extraordinary scherzo was not concealed by the imposing polyphonic armor with which Mahler has buckled so whimsically his folk-lore themes and rhythms.

The applause that followed the symphony was genuinely enthusiastic, and Dr. Muck invited the orchestra to respond to the demonstration by rising.

The greatest triumph of the evening, however, fell to Kreisler, whose performance of the concerto combined the characteristics of a great virtuoso

From TRI
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 5 1913

Estab

GIVES MAHLER SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Causes Wonder by Size of Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited us again last night, whereat we were glad again in unlimited measure. Even if our gladness was tempered a trifle by the extraordinary programme offered by Dr. [illegible], what other orchestra could have survived the test? Truly the Bostonians are wizards to fill the house with an evening devoted solely to a Mahler symphony an hour and twenty minutes long and the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major.

The symphony was Gustav Mahler's [illegible] fore in New York, when [illegible] Boston Orchestra [illegible] baton of Herr Gericke. Its colossal length was then freely commented on. It lasted last night exactly an hour and twenty minutes.

It seems strange indeed that the composer should not have shown more continence in the work, as there are many portions of it containing charming melodies and haunting rhythms, but the ideas are far too few for the length of the work, with the result that there are many stretches of weariness or mere tumultuous confusion. The great band, however, gave of the symphony a performance that was truly superb, and at times, as toward the end of the first movement, Dr. Muck brought out of the confusion something that was wonderfully eloquent. All true [illegible]lerites owe a tribute of the deepest [illegible] to Karl Muck for the labor of [illegible] gave last night.

Probably a larger section of the audience, however, were made happy by Fritz Kreisler's playing of the Tschaikowsky concerto, a reading perhaps more suave in style than is generally heard in this work, but one of great brilliance. The large audience showed plentiful enthusiasm, even after the symphony, calling Dr. Muck many times to bow his acknowledgments.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 1913

Established

WHEN those who carry coals to Newcastle are careful to set their coals on fire, there is at least more light in a dark world. The Boston Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night, bringing gifts of golden tone to the production of a symphony by Gustav Mahler, who spent the last four winters of his life in New York. Walter Damrosch once produced the naive Fourth symphony, with its folksong of the "heavenly fiddles." Mahler's own successor with another band is not one of those who find inspiration in the "Titan" First symphony, the "Giant" Fifth, played last night, or the autobiographic Tenth, composed at the "top of the world" in a New York skyscraper. So Karl Muck performed a labor of love for the man he once succeeded at Prague, just as Mahler had succeeded Seidl.

Mahler's Fifth symphony is an hour and a quarter long, and its opening "Funeral March" kept late comers standing nearly half that time. Frankly Mendelssohnian, it rent the brazen heavens at a hero's passing. The scherzo was a Corelli-like memory of waltzes, sardonic, cynical; there were others before Strauss. But in the brief twelve-minute "adagietto," a wonderful bit of playing was heard. It was as if, "beyond the dim unknown," stood a loosened spirit, exploring the realm of pure sound; here was no tone poet, but a great "improvisatore," listening as he evoked echo upon echo in all the blind sonorities of an unseen world. The rondo-finale had its gleam of humor in the fugal treatment of Mahler's song, "Lob des Hohen Verstands," relating to the trial of skill between cuckoo and nightingale with the ass as judge. So the composer came to earth to haunt his critics at the last.

There was huge applause, and Muck on his sixth recall brought the orchestra up-standing. More applause greeted Fritz Kreisler, after an intermission, but the Tschaikowsky concerto seemed a little thing by its very conciseness of form. After Mahler's vast, chaotic vision, you saw other men as ants through a telescope reversed. Compared with one bit of orchestra work unlike anything heard in years, Kreisler's most daring solo cadenza was tame. The canzonetta, however, ending in ventriloquial voices of oboe and violin, brought down the house.

Kreisler played another concerto on a Thursday night last year, and the fame of his Beethoven cadenza then has gone abroad until the Saturday matinee subscribers have made universal demand to hear it in turn. They have their reward to-morrow.

---

the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 5 1913

Establis

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY.

Dr. Karl Muck faithfully maintains the traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in presenting unfamiliar works. At the concert in Carnegie Hall last night given by the famous visiting aggregation of players from the Hub, he presented Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony. It is a colossal work, in length at least. It takes one hour and seventeen minutes to unfold. The late Mr. Mahler, as a conductor, left a deep impression upon us when he led our own Philharmonic. We also know something of him as a composer, but this fifth symphony of his, at a first hearing, scarcely evokes anything but amazement. It is unusual and it is bizarre. In instrumentation it is marvellous. There are such things as solos for kettledrums and various unusual combinations of choirs. The orchestration is that of a thorough musician, but, clever as it may be, it serves in the main only to make one wonder why?

Mr. Mahler hated programme books, and neither he nor any of his commentators has left analytical notes of the work. The trombones proclaim a dead march at the very beginning, and the whole of the first movement is a funeral march, solemn and measured, built upon a death theme that commands respect; but the development is bewildering and becomes wearisome. There was only perfunctory applause when it ended last night. The scherzo has little more attraction, but the adagietto is very beautiful, full of melody and captivating not merely by contrast, but because of intrinsic loveliness. The end comes in a fugue that, at least, commands respect. The orchestra did all that might be hoped for in clarity of exposition and masterly playing.

There was only one other number on the programme, the Tschaikowsky concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Mr. Kreisler was at his very best, and supported as he was by this splendid aggregation of players, the work of the Russian composer probably never got a better exposition.

There was the usual crowded and fashionable house that the Boston Orchestra always attracts.

EGON [illegible]

---

m HERALD
lress: New York City.
te

MAHLER SYMPHONY A COLOSSAL WORK

on Orchestra Gives Most Impres- ve Concert—Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, Recalled Several Times.

Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor No. 5, which was not received with great enthusiasm when played here in 1906 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke, had a most impressive performance by the same organization last night in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Parts of this colossal work are almost overpowering in their forcefulness. There may be a lack of worth while musical material to start with, but it cannot be denied that the work as played last night made a powerful appeal on those who heard it. This Symphony has been called extravagant, but at all events it is marvellous in its workmanship, and all the more so when consideration is taken of the fact that the thematic material is meagre.

Not a small part of the success was due to the masterly way in which Dr. Muck brought out every detail. There was something of a demonstration after the performance, and the conductor was recalled several times. This symphony of Mahler is very exacting on many players, particularly the horns, trumpets and some of the wood winds, and a great deal of credit is due to these individual performers for the virtuosity with which their parts were played.

No less brilliant than the playing of Dr. Muck and his men in the first number of the programme, was the work of Mr. Fritz Kreisler in the last, for there were only two numbers during the evening. It is a matter of conjecture whether Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major ever has received a better interpretation in New York than it received last night at the hands of Mr. Kreisler. There is little new to record about the art of this great violinist. Tonally, technically and temperamentally there was little more that could have been asked for, and the support of the orchestra was excellent. The whole concert was on the highest possible plane and the audience seemed to appreciate that it was hearing something out of the ordinary.

SUN
New York City.

AHLER SYMPHONY Y BOSTON PLAYERS

Carl Muck Gives the Long Composition Without Cuts of Gericke.

EIGHTY MINUTES LONG

A Production With Few Ideas, but a Vast Amount of Sound.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town again yesterday, bowed this time under the awful responsibility of a Viennese evangel in music. The programme for the second evening concert, given last night in Carnegie Hall, comprised just two numbers, to wit, the fifth symphony of the late Gustav Mahler and the violin concerto of Peter I. Tschaikowsky. The former of these two compositions occupied the first hour and twenty minutes of the concert, not to mention as many instruments as could be conveniently crowded on the stage. The latter required less time, demanded chiefly the violin of Fritz Kreisler, and on the whole left its hearers in a more comfortable frame of mind.

Mr. Mahler's fifth symphony came down upon this city like a wolf on the fold on February 15, 1906, when the Boston musicians performed it under the discreet and continent direction of Wilhelm Gericke. This conductor made some interesting cuts in the score, but Dr. Carl Muck, stern Cato of the baton that he is, restored the full outpour of the composer's fancy. The work was first heard in Cologne in 1904 and after the first movement the audience was silent. After the last one there was much applause and some hissing.

Salvo of Applause.

People do not hiss symphonies in this country. Furthermore it would have to be something more fearfully and wonderfully made than this work of Mr. Mahler's to evoke an expression of dissatisfaction when played so magnificently as this symphony was last evening. There was a long salvo of applause at the end and Dr. Muck caused his players to rise and bow. They nobly earned the honor, and the first trumpeter in particular ought to have received extra pay.

A vast deal of pother has been made about the symphonies of Mr. Mahler, and we confess to a real sympathy for this composer, who labored so patiently, so painfully, and so long at a time to construct something important. Some people call the fifth the "Giant Symphony," but the proud commentators who fancy this refers to its content must be mistaken; the name surely refers to its size.

The work is divided into three parts and five movements—we had almost said three acts and five scenes. It begins with a funeral march in C sharp minor, than which no music lover could possibly recall a more hollow and tenuous piece of symphonic pomposity. The first allegro follows immediately, thus placing the funeral march in an appropriate position as its introduction.

This first movement has no theme which rises above the level of the commonplace. Nor is there in the working out section that part of a sonata form movement to which a composer is supposed to bring the highest flights of his skill in musical development, anything but pretentious conglomerations of discords and fanciful instrumentation.

With mutes on all the brasses and pizzicati in all the strings, with minor seconds hurled from top to bottom of the page and Fafnerian utterances for the tuba, a power of sound is produced. But of that species of artistic structure awkwardly described by musical writers (for want of a more suitable term) as architectonic there is nothing that should be pronounced anything better than baroque at its worst.

A Reminder of Sisyphus.

The second part consists of one movement, the scherzo, which in this case is written as a slow waltz, Tschaikowsky having set this fashion. Mr. Mahler conceived the promising plan of idealizing the Viennese waltz in his scherzo. But again we are confronted with the futile labors of Sisyphus. At times one can fancy a Prater waltz that had fallen asleep and had disturbing dreams.

The third and last part has two movements, an adagietto in F major and a finale in rondo-shape in D major. The adagietto is the most engaging part of the symphony. It has no large inspiration; indeed at times it slips into reminiscences of Italian opera style; but it is fluent, melodious and straightforward. It has a superbly planned instrumental climax in the lower scale, and as it is written for the strings throughout it affords a lovely point of repose in the midst of the general turmoil of instrumentation.

The finale has a fugued section, which is the work of a well schooled musician, and the coda is at least effective. But again the hearer is confronted with a paucity of ideas only half disguised in an embarrassment of instrumental riches. To sum up it is the plain truth that Mr. Mahler had not much to say in this work and occupied a wondrous time in saying it. His manner is ponderous, his matter imponderable.

The soloist in the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, as already noted, was that truly great artist, Fritz Kreisler, who was heard with pleasure by the large audience and warmly applauded. But discussion of his performance is not necessary at this time.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date 1913

rk, 1884

Boston Symphony Concert Is Treat

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season, at Carnegie Hall, last night. The programme was remarkable, for it contained but two numbers—Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, and Tshaikowsky's Concerto in D major.

A personal interest was manifested in the symphony because of the composer's local association. He was for several years conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, and for a time occupied the position of director of the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra.

A few months after Mahler's death the first movement of the symphony played last evening was given at a memorial concert in this city. It bears the appropriate title, "Dead March," and contains a number of profound and touching episodes.

The work, as a whole, suggests that of a composer in a transitionary period. It contains measures so full of "effects" as to be quite incomprehensible. The themes are frequent and fragmentary. But the suggestion of Wagner is observed, for the riot of notes usually ends in a few bars of fluent, suave melody.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date 5 1913

Es 1884

MAHLER'S SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Played in Full Under Direction of Dr. Muck—Triumph for Fritz Kreisler.

If any one dreaded the performance last night in Carnegie Hall of Gustav Mahler's one hour and a half symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5, which was heard in its entirety for the first time since Wilhelm Gericke introduced the work to New Yorkers on February 15, 1906, there was enough pleasure in the anticipation of listening to Fritz Kreisler play late in the evening Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major, the only number on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to act as a counter-irritant.

Few of us realized when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, almost eight years ago, produced Mahler's symphony with the funereal introduction, that Gericke had edited the orchestration, reflecting synically the while, as we may imagine, on how often the composer-conductor himself had treated in similar fashion the scores of other masters.

Dr. Karl Muck did not approve the methods of his predecessor, and restored to the score what the former leader of the Boston orchestra had eliminated. Moreover, he gave it a far more dramatic, interesting and vital interpretation, and if he did not convince his listeners that this gigantic composition in five movements, though it probably represents the author at his best, will be likely to withstand the gnawing tooth of time, it was not his fault, for evidently he conducted it "con amore."

The music is melodious, despite the daring harmonic modulations, contrapuntal bravura, rhythmical gymnastics and instrumental sensations with which it bristles. Indeed, Mahler succeeded in making his technical cleverness subservient to the principal purpose of putting melody in the foreground.

The scintillant mass of cleverly wrought details, with its shifting, merging and blending tonalities, never overshadows entirely his long-breathing, if not always distinguished, melodic lines, and the effect in these days of tonal experiments is singularly lucid and euphonious. The composer has accomplished the task he had set himself of embodying comparatively simple thoughts in a highly wrought, highly colored orchestral idiom. Yet one can never quite lose the feeling of intention, of purpose. True inspiration, the irresistible need of finding expression for pent-up feelings, is wanting.

The symphony was superbly played [illegible]d served to reveal the virtuosic ac[illegible]plishments of the Boston orchestra [illegible] its masterly conductor in the most [illegible]ant light. Again the first two [illegible]ments and the Rondo created the [illegible] striking effect, whereas the [illegible]tto, largely because of Dr. [illegible] exceedingly slow tempo and the [illegible]efinements of his reading, made [illegible]eeper impression. Again, too, [illegible]tial triviality of the extraordi[illegible]rzo was not concealed by the [illegible]polyphonic armor with which [illegible] buckled so whimsically his [illegible]mes and rhythms.

[illegible]se that followed the sym[illegible] genuinely enthusiastic, and [illegible]vited the orchestra to re[illegible] demonstration by rising. [illegible] triumph of the evening, [illegible] Kreisler, whose perform[illegible] concerto combined the char[illegible] of a great virtuo[illegible]

[71]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat geſtern an der Spitze ſeiner Boſtoner Mahler's Fünfte Symphonie, die mir bisher unbekannt war, mit einem Ausſichheraustreten und warmem Einſetzen der ganzen Perſönlichkeit und der ganzen Kunſt dirigirt, wie man ſie bei dieſem mehr einem erleuchteten Objektivismus huldigenden, hervorragenden Dirigenten nicht allzu häufig beobachten kann. Das Mahler'ſche Werk machte einen tiefen Eindruck auf mich, wie ich es denn unbedingt für die inſpirirteſte und emotionellſte der mir bekannten Symphonien Mahler's halte, wobei ich die letzten, hier gänzlich unbekannten Werke, vor allem des vielbeklagten Meiſters Achte und Neunte Symphonie, ausnehmen muß. Leider iſt es angeſichts der in den Morgen vorgerückten Stunde zu ſpät, um das Werk genauer Revue paſſiren zu laſſen, doch ſoll dies im morgigen Blatt geſchehen.

Heute nur ſo viel, daß die Meiſterſpieler, durch das treibende Moment in der Leitung ihres Führers angefeuert, ihr Beſtes einſetzten, und was das bei den Boſtoner Gäſten heißen will, weiß man ja aus Erfahrung. Das Publikum ſpendete nach allen Sätzen warmen Beifall, der ſich nach dem rauſchenden Freudenjubel des Finales bis zur Ovation verdichtete. Nachdem beim dritten Erſcheinen uck's auch das Orcheſter aufgeſtanden nd ſeinen Dank ausgeſprochen hatte, erfolgte noch ein Hervorruf, wohl, um zu zeigen, daß der donnernde Beifall nicht der glänzenden Leiſtung des Dirigenten und ſeines Orcheſters allein gegolten habe.

Als Soliſt ſpielte Herr Fritz Kreisler, der Meiſtergeiger, dem gedrängt vollen Saale Tſchaikowsky's effektvolles Violinonzert vor, womit er geradezu überchwänglichen Beifall erntete. Ich kann icht ſagen, daß mir ſeine Wiedergabe des erſten prunkvollen Satzes beſonders gefallen hat. Für derlei robuſte Aufgaben erſcheint mir Kreisler's Ton ſtets zu fein, nd auch an animaliſcher Wärme hat ſein nehr feinnerviges Temperament nicht das öthige Quantum einzuſchießen. Daß ieles, wenn auch abſolute Toneinheit icht immer in Evidenz war, wundervoll elang, daß er in der virtuoſen Kadenz e gehäuften techniſchen Schwierigkeiten ielend bewältigte, braucht bei einem reisler nicht erſt beſonders betont zu rden. Des gleichzeitigen „Siegfried's" alber konnte ich die beiden anderen Sätze icht hören, doch erfahre ich von zuverläſer Seite, daß Kreisler den langſamen tz mit wundervollem Legato und ſinner Schönheit ſpielte, während er im ale die reichen Schätze ſeiner reifen ſtlerſchaft verſchwenderiſch ausſtreute.

H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mahler's Long Fifth Symphony Played—Fritz Kreisler Soloist.

If Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony is put on a programme, there is not much room left for other music, as it takes an hour and twenty minutes in performance. Consequently, as Dr. Muck determined to play it at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony last evening, he presented a programme that comprised beside the symphony only Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. This was played by Mr. Fritz Kreisler, whose appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an incident of the first importance in the musical season.

Mahler's symphony was played in New York in February, 1906, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The funeral march, which forms the opening movement, was played by the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 24, 1912, after Mahler's death, in memory of him. The work made no decided and indubitable impression when it was performed here before. It is said that Mahler had sent Mr. Gericke some revisions of the orchestration; also that Mr. Gericke had made numerous excisions in the score, and that Dr. Muck has had these all restored.

The symphony imposes by its length and breadth, the vast number and extent of its themes, the skillful handicraft with which they are put together, the bigness of the orchestral apparatus, the extraordinary skill with which its instrumental timbres are managed. It seemed when it was heard here before harsh, diffuse, lacking in distinction of theme, logical development, and definiteness of purpose. It seemed so still at last evening's repetition. That Mr. Mahler was very serious and wholly in earnest when he wrote it is continually borne in upon the listener, but that it is not the product of a strong and vigorour creative genius, an original force in music, is also manifest. It seems that the composer is most strenuously seeking for self expression; but though he is equipped with all that modern musical skill can give him in methods of treatment and resources of orchestration, his achievement continually pants behind his ambition, rarely overtaking it.

There are highly effective passages in the funeral march with which the symphony begins; but there are many commonplace passages in juxtaposition that let down the "high erected thoughts" with jarring suddenness. The episode of wild and passionate outburst in the midst of this march seizes upon the imagination until its length wearies. In his sherzo Mahler sought for a contrast of mood that he did not try to secure in the second movement. Here is a "Ländler," an Austrian country dance theme of naif tunefulness; but its naiveté appears only to be tossed about and tormented with strange development and strained harmonies that leave little of the pretty and somewhat commonplace lustre of the tune. This sort of playing with the naif is a prominent characteristic of Mahler's symphonic writing. There is here and elsewhere in the symphony that uncompromising use of various themes at once, in combination, in that crass kind of forced union that does duty in these days as "counterpoint," formerly meaning the union of themes with euphonious results.

The adagiett has more ingratiating traits than any of the other movements. There is poetical suggestiveness in it that the others have not; yet even here there is lack of cogency and point. The movement seems to have little definite issue. The last movement, a rondo, still shows the lack of coherent purpose, of cohesive thought. There is a fugato of considerable extent and considerable ingenuity; there is a long climax in a sustained melody of a chorale-like character. But in this movement, as there is in every one of the five that make up the symphony, there is much that is dry and harsh, and there is interminable torturing and reiteration of desultory thematic material. Of specific musical inspiration it seems, after an hour and twenty minutes of demonstration, that the composer had little. He gives in this work, as he has in others, the impression of an eclectic anxiously seizing and industriously utilizing everything that he thinks can contribute to his effect. It is not easy to see in it the product of a strong creative impulse that must express itself so and would not be denied.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra carried through their task with intense conviction and superlative skill. The performance, considered as such, was little short of marvelous. There was much applause after it was finished, whether it denoted admiration of the music or of the achievement of conductor and players. Dr. Muck was recalled several times and finally made the orchestra rise to take its share in the applause.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT

Carl Fique Gives the Preliminary Lecture Recital.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fritzy Kneisler, violinist, are to present in the opera house of that building this evening.

Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmidt "La Tragedie de Salome" from a score arranged for two pianos, the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major for violin, from the score as arranged for that instrument, and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska" he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America last Friday. He gave enough of it for his hearers to receive a comprehensive idea of the whole, saying that he judged it would take about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it, also that in orchestral form "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable." He spoke of the composition as being "an ultra modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees.

Mr. Fique found "a great deal of Russian dialect in Tschaikowsky's musical speech and called that composer "the Beethoven of Russian music." Three movements of the concerto were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of the peasant in the canzonetta, and the Cossack in his wild ride across the steppes in the finale. When describing the "Husitska" he said that to call a Bohemian a Huss means about the same as to call an American a Yankee. He called attention to the frequent dissonances which are characteristic of Bohemian music and described the musical construction of this symphonic poem before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in the playing of it. Much applause was bestowed upon the two pianists.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

PILING DISCORDS ON MORE DISCORDS

Not So Bad as It Sounds, Carl Fique Assures Boston Symphony Subscribers.

THREE-NUMBER PROGRAMME.

"Salome" Tone-Painting a Real Novelty in America.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, director, is present in the opera house of that building this evening. To "get up" the programme was a matter of some difficulty, though it has but three numbers. Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmitt "La Tragedie de Salome," from a score arranged for two pianos; the Tschaikowsky "Concerto in D major, for Violin," from the score as arranged for that instrument; and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America last Friday. He gave enough of it for his hearers to receive a comprehensive idea of the whole, saying he judged it would take about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it, also that in orchestral form, "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable." He spoke of the composition as being "an ultra-modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees. It presents a thought reflection, a mood, the music showing both the mental and the physical condition, the latter in its quality of musical setting and characterization of the surrounding scene."

There have been many versions of the "Salome" story. This differs from that of the Bible or of Strauss' opera, although it contains the features of the dancing and of the bringing in of the head of John the Baptist on a charger. Loie Fuller was the Salome at its first presentation. It is far more weird than the Strauss production. In music illustrative of enchantments of the Dead Sea, there is a "creepy" place when women's voices sing a plaintive chant, scarcely articulate, and then comes a bold dash of music introducing the dance of the lightnings, whose eerie melody—if melody it can be called—is derived from the plaintive chant. This "Salome" is a mute drama, the music interpreting the action.

Mr. Fique found "a great deal of Russian dialect in Tschaikowsky's musical speech," and called that composer "The Beethoven of Russian music." Three movements of the concerto were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of the peasant, in the canzonetta, and the Cossack in his wild ride across the steppes, in the final. When describing the "Husitska," he said that to call a Bohemian a Huss means about the same as to call an American an Yankee. He called attention to the frequent dissonances, which are characteristic of Bohemian music, and described the musical construction of this symphonic poem, before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in th playing of it. Much applause wa bestowed upon th

---

"Salome" [illegible] action.

Mr. [illegible] found "a great deal of Russian [illegible] in Tschaikowsky's musical speech," and called that composer "the Beethoven of Russian music." The three movements of the "Concerto" were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of [illegible] in the canzonetta, and the Cossack in his wild ride across the steppes in the finale. When describing the "Husitska," he said that to call a Bohemian a "Huss" means about the same as to call an American a "Yankee." He called attention to the frequent dissonances, which are characteristic of Bohemian music, and described the musical construction of this symphonic poem before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in the playing of it. Much applause was bestowed upon the two pianists.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY REVIEW.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, director, is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. To "get up" the programme was a matter of some difficulty, though it has but three numbers. Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmidt "La Tragedie de Salome," from a score arranged for two pianos; the Tschaikowsky "Concerto in D Major, for Violin," from the score as arranged for that instrument, and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America on Friday last. He gave enough of it, however, for his hearers to get a comprehensive idea of it, saying that he judged it would require about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it; also that, in orchestral form, "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable."

Mr. Fique spoke of the composition as being "an ultra modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees. It presents a thought reflection, a mood, the music showing both the mental and the physical condition, the latter in its quality of musical setting and characterization of the surrounding scene." There have been many versions of the "Salome" story. This differs from that of the Bible or of Strauss' opera, although it contains the features of the dancing and of the bringing in of the head of John the Baptist on a charger. Loie Fuller was the Salome at its first presentation. It is far more weird than the Strauss production In music illustrative of enchantments the Dead Sea, there is a "creepy" plac when women's voices sing a plaintiv chant, scarcely articulate, and the comes a bold dash of music introducin the dance of the lightnings, whose eeri melody—if melody it can be called—is d rived from the plaintive chant. Th

---

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

VIOLIN VIRTUOSO AT THE LYRIC TONIGHT

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violin virtuoso, will make his first appearance in Baltimore this season tonight, when he will be the soloist at the second of the year's concerts in the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Kreisler's number will be the great Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major, No. 2, a piece that he plays quite inimitably.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has selected two favorite numbers for the orchestral part of the program, the first being Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7. which many consider the master's noblest work, although others claim that the Fifth possesses equal claims for consideration as his chef-d'oeuvre.

The other number is a work of the modern school, the Overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." This opera had its prmiere performance several had its premiere performance several Opera Company, and made a very considerable success. The Overture has been especially praised, being rich in color and full of charming melody.

The Boston Symphony's concerts are more popular than ever this year. The Lyric is practically sold out for the season, and standing room is generally at a premium. The audiences, besides including so many musicians, are as fashionable as any to be seen in Baltimore during the society season.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, will in several respects be the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms concerto. There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work, which is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony, is of massive proportions and in three parts. The first part has two sections, and the third part two, making five in all, and the performance consumes one hour and ten minutes.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat geſtern an der Spitze ſeiner Boſtoner Mahler's Fünfte Symphonie, die mir bisher unbekannt war, mit einem Ausſichheraustreten und warmem Einſetzen der ganzen Perſönlichkeit und der ganzen Kunſt dirigirt, wie man ſie bei dieſem mehr einem erleuchteten Objektivismus huldigenden, hervorragenden Dirigenten nicht allzu häufig beobachten kann. Das Mahler'ſche Werk machte einen tiefen Eindruck auf mich, wie ich es denn unbedingt für die inſpirirteſte und emotionellſte der mir bekannten Symphonien Mahler's halte, wobei ich die letzten, hier gänzlich unbekannten Werke, vor allem des vielbeklagten Meiſters Achte und Neunte Symphonie, ausnehmen muß. Leider iſt es angeſichts der in den Morgen vorgerückten Stunde zu ſpät, um das Werk genauer Revue paſſiren zu laſſen, doch ſoll dies im morgigen Blatt geſchehen.

Heute nur ſo viel, daß die Meiſterſpieler, durch das treibende Moment in der Leitung ihres Führers angefeuert, ihr Beſtes einſetzten, und was das bei den Boſtoner Gäſten heißen will, weiß man ja aus Erfahrung. Das Publikum ſpendete nach allen Sätzen warmen Beifall, der ſich nach dem rauſchenden Freudenjubel des Finales bis zur Ovation verdichtete. Nachdem beim dritten Erſcheinen Muck's auch das Orcheſter aufgeſtanden und ſeinen Dank ausgeſprochen hatte, erfolgte noch ein Hervorruf, wohl, um zu zeigen, daß der donnernde Beifall nicht der glänzenden Leiſtung des Dirigenten und ſeines Orcheſters allein gegolten habe.

Als Soliſt ſpielte Herr Fritz Kreisler, der Meiſtergeiger, dem gedrängt vollen Saale Tſchaikowsky's effektvolles Violinkonzert vor, womit er geradezu überſchwänglichen Beifall erntete. Ich kann nicht ſagen, daß mir ſeine Wiedergabe des erſten prunkvollen Satzes beſonders gefallen hat. Für derlei robuſte Aufgaben erſcheint mir Kreisler's Ton ſtets zu fein, und auch an animaliſcher Wärme hat ſein mehr feinnerviges Temperament nicht das nöthige Quantum einzuſchießen. Daß pieles, wenn auch abſolute Tonreinheit icht immer in Evidenz war, wundervoll elang, daß er in der virtuoſen Kadenz e gehäuften techniſchen Schwierigkeiten ielend bewältigte, braucht bei einem reisler nicht erſt beſonders betont zu rden. Des gleichzeitigen „Siegfried's" alber konnte ich die beiden anderen Sätze icht hören, doch erfahre ich von zuverläſ er Seite, daß Kreisler den langſamen tz mit wundervollem Legato und finn er Schönheit ſpielte, während er im ale die reichen Schätze ſeiner reifen ſtlerſchaft verſchwenderiſch ausſtreute.

H.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT

Carl Fique Gives the Preliminary Lecture Recital.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Fritzy Kneisler, violinist, are to present in the opera house of that building this evening.

Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmidt "La Tragedie de Salome" from a score arranged for two pianos, the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major for violin, from the score as arranged for that instrument, and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska" he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America last Friday. He gave enough of it for his hearers to receive a comprehensive idea of the whole, saying that he judged it would take about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it, also that in orchestral form "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable." He spoke of the composition as being "an ultra modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees.

Mr. Fique found "a great deal of Russian dialect in Tschaikowsky's musical speech and called that composer "the Beethoven of Russian music." Three movements of the concerto were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of the peasant in the canzonetta, and the Cossack in his wild ride across the steppes in the finale.

When describing the "Husitska" he said that to call a Bohemian a Huss means about the same as to call an American a Yankee. He called attention to the frequent dissonances which are characteristic of Bohemian music and described the musical construction of this symphonic poem before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in the playing of it. Much applause was bestowed upon the two pianists.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mahler's Long Fifth Symphony Played—Fritz Kreisler Soloist.

If Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony is put on a programme, there is not much room left for other music, as it takes an hour and twenty minutes in performance. Consequently, as Dr. Muck determined to play it at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony last evening, he presented a programme that comprised beside the symphony only Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. This was played by Mr. Fritz Kreisler, whose appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an incident of the first importance in the musical season.

Mahler's symphony was played in New York in February, 1906, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The funeral march, which forms the opening movement, was played by the Philharmonic Society on Nov. 24, 1912, after Mahler's death, in memory of him. The work made no decided and indubitable impression when it was performed here before. It is said that Mahler had sent Mr. Gericke some revisions of the orchestration; also that Mr. Gericke had made numerous excisions in the score, and that Dr. Muck has had these all restored.

The symphony imposes by its length and breadth, the vast number and extent of its themes, the skillful handicraft with which they are put together, the bigness of the orchestral apparatus, the extraordinary skill with which its instrumental timbres are managed. It seemed when it was heard here before harsh, diffuse, lacking in distinction of theme, logical development, and definiteness of purpose. It seemed so still at last evening's repetition. That Mr. Mahler was very serious and wholly in earnest when he wrote it is continually borne in upon the listener, but that it is not the product of a strong and vigorour creative genius, an original force in music, is also manifest. It seems that the composer is most strenuously seeking for self expression; but though he is equipped with all that modern musical skill can give him in methods of treatment and resources of orchestration, his achievement continually pants behind his ambition, rarely overtaking it.

There are highly effective passages in the funeral march with which the symphony begins; but there are many commonplace passages in juxtaposition that let down the "high erected thoughts" with jarring suddenness. The episode of wild and passionate outburst in the midst of this march seizes upon the imagination until its length wearies. In his sherzo Mahler sought for a contrast of mood that he did not try to secure in the second movement. Here is a "Ländler," an Austrian country dance theme of naif tunefulness; but its naiveté appears only to be tossed about and tormented with strange development and strained harmonies that leave little of the pretty and somewhat commonplace lustre of the tune. This sort of playing with the naif is a prominent characteristic of Mahler's symphonic writing. There is here and elsewhere in the symphony that uncompromising use of various themes at once, in combination, in that crass kind of forced union that does duty in these days as "counterpoint," formerly meaning the union of themes with euphonious results.

The adagiett has more ingratiating traits than any of the other movements. There is poetical suggestiveness in it that the others have not; yet even here there is lack of cogency and point. The movement seems to have little definite issue. The last movement, a rondo, still shows the lack of coherent purpose, of cohesive thought. There is a fugato of considerable extent and considerable ingenuity; there is a long climax in a sustained melody of a chorale-like character. But in this movement, as there is in every one of the five that make up the symphony, there is much that is dry and harsh, and there is interminable torturing and reiteration of desultory thematic material. Of specific musical inspiration it seems, after an hour and twenty minutes of demonstration, that the composer had little. He gives in this work, as he has in others, the impression of an eclectic anxiously seizing and industriously utilizing everything that he thinks can contribute to his effect. It is not easy to see in it the product of a strong creative impulse that must express itself so and would not be denied.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra carried through their task with intense conviction and superlative skill. The performance, considered as such, was little short of marvelous. There was much applause after it was finished, whether it denoted admiration of the music or of the achievement of conductor and players. Dr. Muck was recalled several times and finally made the orchestra rise to take its share in the applause.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

PILING DISCORDS ON MORE DISCORDS

Not So Bad as It Sounds, Carl Fique Assures Boston Symphony Subscribers.

THREE-NUMBER PROGRAMME.

"Salome" Tone-Painting a Real Novelty in America.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, director, is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. To "get up" the programme was a matter of some difficulty, though it has but three numbers. Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmitt "La Tragedie de Salome," from a score arranged for two pianos; the Tschaikowsky "Concerto in D major, for Violin," from the score as arranged for that instrument; and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America last Friday. He gave enough of it for his hearers to receive a comprehensive idea of the whole, saying he judged it would take about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it, also that in orchestral form, "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable." He spoke of the composition as being "an ultra-modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees. It presents a thought reflection, a mood, the music showing both the mental and the physical condition, the latter in its quality of musical setting and characterization of the surrounding scene."

There have been many versions of the "Salome" story. This differs from that of the Bible or of Strauss' opera, although it contains the features of the dancing and of the bringing in of the head of John the Baptist on a charger. Loie Fuller was the Salome at its first presentation. It is far more weird than the Strauss production. In music illustrative of enchantments of the Dead Sea, there is a "creepy" place when women's voices sing a plaintive chant, scarcely articulate, and then comes a bold dash of music introducing the dance of the lightnings, whose eerie melody —if melody it can be called—is derived from the plaintive chant. This "Salome" is a mute drama, the music interpreting the action.

Mr. Fique found "a great deal of Russian dialect in Tschaikowsky's musical speech," and called that composer "The Beethoven of Russian music." Three movements of the concerto were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of the peasant, in the canzonetta, and the Cossack in his wild ride across the steppes, in the final. When describing the "Husitska," he said that to call a Bohemian a Huss means about the same as to call an American an Yankee. He called attention to the frequent dissonances, which are characteristic of Bohemian music, and described the musical construction of this symphonic poem, before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in th playing of it. Much applause wa bestowed upon the two pianists.

EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date BOSTON SYMPHONY REVIEW.

In the lecture hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. Carl Fique gave the lecture recital preliminary to the philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, director, is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. To "get up" the programme was a matter of some difficulty, though it has but three numbers. Mr. Fique played the Florent Schmidt "La Tragedie de Salome," from a score arranged for two pianos; the Tschaikowsky "Concerto in D Major, for Violin," from the score as arranged for that instrument, and for Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," he could obtain a four-hand copy only, so had the very able assistance of one of his pupils, Miss Orah Trull.

Mr. Fique had never heard the "Tragedie de Salome," which had its first performance in America on Friday last. He gave enough of it, however, for his hearers to get a comprehensive idea of it, saying that he judged it would require about three-quarters of an hour for the orchestra to play it; also that, in orchestral form, "the discords piled upon discords, instruments playing on different keys at the same time, producing an effect on the piano that is almost excruciating, would sound characteristic and not disagreeable."

Mr. Fique spoke of the composition as being "an ultra modern tone picture, somewhat like an impressionist painting, which, at a proper distance, shows what the artist sees, or thinks he sees. It presents a thought reflection, a mood, the music showing both the mental and the physical condition, the latter in its quality of musical setting and characterization of the surrounding scene." There have been many versions of the "Salome" story. This differs from that of the Bible or of Strauss' opera, although it contains the features of the dancing and of the bringing in of the head of John the Baptist on a charger. Loie Fuller was the Salome at its first presentation. It is far more weird than the Strauss production. In music illustrative of enchantments c the Dead Sea, there is a "creepy" plac when women's voices sing a plaintiv chant, scarcely articulate, and the comes a bold dash of music introducin the dance of the lightnings, whose eeri melody—if melody it can be called—is d rived from the plaintive chant. Th

[72]

"Salome" [illegible] action.

Mr. Fique found "a great deal of Russian dialect in Tschaikowsky's musical speech," and called that composer "the Beethoven of Russian music." The three movements of the "Concerto" were said to show the cultured Russian gentleman, the cavalier, in the first, the allegro moderato; the love song of [illegible] in the canzonetta, and the [illegible] in his wild ride across the steppes in the finale. When describing the "Husitska," he said that to call a Bohemian a "Huss" means about the same as to call an American a "Yankee." He called attention to the requent dissonances, which are characeristic of Bohemian music, and described he musical construction of this symphonic poem before calling upon Miss Trull to assist in the playing of it. Much applause was bestowed upon the two pianists.

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

VIOLIN VIRTUOSO AT THE LYRIC TONIGHT

FRITZ KREISLER

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violin virtuoso, will make his first appearance in Baltimore this season tonight, when he will be the soloist at the second of the year's concerts in the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Kreisler's number will be the great Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major, No. 2, a piece that he plays quite inimitably.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, has selected two favorite numbers for the orchestral part of the program, the first being Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, which many consider the master's noblest work, although others claim that the Fifth possesses equal claims for consideration as his chef-d'oeuvre.

The other number is a work of the modern school, the Overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." This opera had its prmiere performance several had its premiere performance several Opera Company, and made a very considerable success. The Overture has been especially praised, being rich in color and full of charming melody.

The Boston Symphony's concerts are more popular than ever this year. The Lyric is practically sold out for the season, and standing room is generally at a premium. The audiences, besides including so many musicians, are as fashionable as any to be seen in Baltimore during the society season.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, will in several respects be the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work, which is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony, is of massive proportions and in three parts. The first part has two sections, and the third part two, making five in all, and the performance consumes one hour and ten minutes.

[...]and Most Com[...]
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W[...]

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 4
[Esta]blished:

KREISLER IN SUPERB

Violinist Makes Boston Orchestra Concert Memorable.

DR. MUCK WIELDS THE BATON

Musicians Themselvesc Even Enjoy Beauty Of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

[The] second concert to be given this season by the Boston Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric before one of the largest, most fashionable and undoubtedly one of the most enthusiastic audiences that has gathered in the Music Hall this winter.

Fritz Kreisler, the mastter violinist, was the solist. The program, which was of exceptional intterest, consisted of but three numbers, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and the overture to Smetana's "Barter Bride," which came as a kind of delightful "bonne bouche' 'at the close of the concert.

Beethoven's seventh symphony is a most refreshing work, conceived in a spirit of wonderful inherent joyousness, a flight into the realm of pure music, without "program" or troublous "meanings" — a veritable delight. Last evening, under Dr. Muck's baton, it sang its way along with that melodic insistence which is always so characteristic of Beethoven in this mood, and was given such a happy rendition that the very pleasure of the performance seemed to infect the musicians, who smiled to themselves as they played. The reading was colorful and strongly stressed, often marked by striking accent sand special valuations of individual phrases and episodes, so that it proved one of the most interesting symphonies that this orchestra has yet given us.

The fascinating allegro with which the work closes and which was designated by Wagner himself as the very "apotheosis of joy," received an ovation. There was much poetry also in the reading of the allegretto, often a colorless number, and in this symphony, too, one noticed the peculiar brilliance of the brass choir, so that this classic work became almost a tone poem.

The chief inerest of the evening, naturally, lay in Mr. Kreisler's supreme performance of the well-night "impossible" concerto. This work, which is so difficult that few players even attempt it and which, when Tschaikowsky had written it, actually remained unplayed for years because of the temerity of even the greatest violinists of the day, Kreisler presents with a perfect ease, a surprising facility and with an insuperable brilliance that is entirely arresting. His performance, after all, is merely an exhibition of the art which conceals art. His work last evening seemed so simple.

One has so many memories of this concerto as a great battle horse—as a matter of fact, it does exploit all the tricks of the violin—that it was a fresh surprise last evening to find how vital is the lyric beauty [of] so many of its episodes as interpreted by this masterful and extremely temperamental artist whose splendid authority and brilliant tone made an impression that will not easily be effaced.

Kreisler plays with great breadth of feeling, but with a remarkable tenderness too. He is essentially a poet of the violin and is indeed one of the most moving players of the day.

J. O. L.

The First
Ne

Cattle Breeders To Meet.

The Holstein-Friesian Breeders' Association of the State of Maryland, an organization devoted to the improvement o[...]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia
Date NOV 3
Establish

At the second Boston Sympho cert, to be given in the Aca
Music tomorrow evening, th will be Fritz Kreisler, who success a few weeks ago with —Copyright by Aime Dupont.

FRITZ KREISLER.

adelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms Concerto. There will be but two numbers on the program. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke. It made a deep impression, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Dr. Muck performed the symphony in Boston, restoring the "cuts" and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-8 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said he hoped Dr. Muck would be able to play one of the Mahler symphonies with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and asked that if he played one that it should be the Fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise in the first season of his return to Boston.

The performance of this symphony last spring was the sensation of the musical season in Boston, and the general request was that the work be performed again as early in the fall as possible. It was played a week ago with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-2, and was completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra, March 25, 1905. A year later Gericke played the work twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a work of massive proportions in three parts. The first part has two sections, and the third part has two, making five in all. The symphony begins with an impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony requires one hour and ten minutes.

RECO[...]
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established

MAHLER SYMPHONIES NOT WIDELY KNOWN

Playing of the C Sharp Minor Work by Boston Orchestra to Engage Attention.

CHARPENTIER'S "JULIEN"

Lack of French Opera in the Early Season of Philadelphia-Chicago Company.

Philadelphia musicians await with a great deal of interest the Mahler C Sharp Minor Symphony, which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. Although the Mahler symphonies have awakened lively discussion in Germany, they are practically unknown in this country. Some of the Mahler songs have been introduced by singers of distinction. Like the Strauss songs, they are intended only for the mature and capable artist, and can be properly presented only when interpreted by a fine musician.

Mahler's untimely end, so peculiarly associated with his efforts in the United States, brought him more conspicuously before the American public generally than did any of his achievements as a conductor of opera or symphony. His association with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York as conductor was epoch-making, particularly in regard to the Wagnerian music-dramas. Mahler's conception of the German opera was one that quickly distinguished him from all predecessors. It consisted, in addition to marked artistic features, in allowing the auditors an opportunity of hearing the entire opera vocally. His ability to produce a volume of orchestration without drowning the singers' voices was so rare that even the musical novice was impressed, while to those who go to the opera with a desire to follow the text, it was one uninterrupted delight. Under Mahler the dramas were really sung—not shrieked. He led these master-works moreover with such certainty and authority that there was at no time a diminution of their powerful dramatic appeal. He demonstrated the possibility of accentuating the lyrical side without detracting from either the orchestral or dramatic.

Mahler's association with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and his ceaseless labor to perfect that organization, together with nerve-racking annoyances, to which he was said to be subjected, were claimed by his friends to have contributed to his early death. While this may be an exaggeration, it is doubtless true that Mahler's position in New York was widely different from that held by him in Vienna, where as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra and director of the Court Opera he was a supreme master.

The symphonic works of Mahler are said to be an effort to broaden the symphonic form. He had a marked predilection for the contralto voice, and has introduced soli for contralto in two of his symphonies. In the socalled "Titian" symphony the alto voice is used, as well as in "Ein Sommermorgentraum." The choral idea used by Mahler, while not new to symphonic writers, has never been carried to such an extreme as when employed by him.

As in the case of most famous composers, Mahler's life was stormy, beginning in poverty and ending in disillusionment and sadness. He was born in Bohemia and he obtained his education partly in Prague and partly in Vienna. Compelled to work for his livelihood, he began his career as a musician by conducting small orchestras in the theatres of Vienna, Leipzig, Prague, etc. His first recognition came when he was invited to direct the Opera in Hamburg. He soon made the Hamburg Opera the talk of Europe, and from there to director of the Vienna Opera was a logical step.

Whether the Mahler symphonies, when familiar to Americans, will be enjoyed remains to be seen. There can be no question, however, of the extent of Mahler's musical endowment or of what his unique talent enabled him to accomplish as a conductor.

* * *

[Tho]ugh the Metropolitan Opera [...] of New Y[ork] has ne[...]
[...]h avid[...]

Newspaper Cutt[...]

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1913
Est

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening will in several respects be the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms Concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphonuy Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Mr. Gerickemade many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Dr. Muck performed the Symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form.

When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Dr. Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and asked that if he played any it would be this one in C sharp Minor, the fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The Symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Establish

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening will in several respects be the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms Concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the Concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Mr. Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last Spring Dr. Muck performed the Symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague, and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Dr. Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and asked that if he played any it would be this in C sharp Minor, the fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The performance of this symphony last Spring was without doubt the sensation of the season in Boston, and the general request was that it be performed again as early in the Fall as possible. It was played a week ago with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a work of massive proportions of three parts. The first part has two sections and the third part two, making five in all. It begins with an extremely impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony consumes one hour and ten minutes.

• • •

[EV]ENING NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 4

[B]OSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

[I]f the average standard of concerts
[could] be kept up to that reached by
[the B]oston Symphoney Orchestra last [nigh]t, the position of the musical [critic] in the ordinary acceptance of [the w]ord, would soon become a sine-
[cure].

[Not] only was the performance prac-
[tical]ly without reproach, but Dr.
[Muck] has, so far this season, seemed [more] in touch with the taste of the [audi]ence here in the selection of his
[prog]rams than ever before. The con[cert o]pened with Beethoven's Seventh
[Symph]ony, which is generally ac-
[cepte]d as the first specimen of the [trul]y romantic school, just as is its [imme]diate predecessor, the Pastoral [Symp]hony, the first consistent sym-
[phoni]c work in the nature of program
[music].

[The] introduction to the first move-
[ment] is the most extended and ma[jestic] in symphonic literature; but
[the p]ace which follows is curiously
[...] uncertain for Beethoven,
[...]s it were, to be always
[...]nd never reaching a definite
[...]e most characteristic move-
[...] the last, one of the most
[...] ever written. It is strange
[...] night, as on every other oc[casion w]hen one has heard this move[ment, t]he first violin part seemed to [be sub]merged at the most intense
[...]n effect, possibly due to the

It is difficult to say why this particular symphony, more than the C minor, for instance, should be designated as essentially romantic, but nobody has yet satisfactorily defined the word "romantic" as applied to music, though nearly everyone subjectively understands it.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist in Tschaikowsky's celebrated Violin Concerto in D, is undoubtedly the most thoroughly satisfying violinist of the present day. His playing of the Concerto last night was ardent and inspired all through, and he once more entranced the audience with that peculiarly thrilling tone which marked his never - to - be-forgotten performance of the Brahms Concerto last year.

This all too short concert closed with Smetana's Overture to "The Sold Bride," a work which, while of no special thematic interest, is full of life and character, and supplied just the right element for a successful finish to the evening's performance.

Dr. Muck's conducting last night, as always, was marked by that perfect balance of the intellectual and emotional which gives him his peculiar distinction among conductors of the present day. In a word, he succeeds in bringing out all the light and shade of a composition, while never allowing this for a moment to interfere with [...]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date
Establi

Praise for a Music Criticism

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—After having read your criticism of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening I feel that I must write and thank you publicly for your splendid and keen review of all of the great music, so eloquently expressed and so just toward the program as a whole, toward the conductor, the soloist, each individual member of the great orchestra and lastly the audience.

The music lovers of Philadelphia should feel grateful to the PUBLIC LEDGER for their selection of so sensitive and excellent a critic.

A subscriber and a grateful listener to both the great orchestras of Philadelphia and Boston.

A. H. R.

Philadelphia, December 2, 1913.

...and Most Complete
...ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 4 191

...blished:

KREISLER IN SUPERB

Violinist Makes Boston Orchestra Concert Memorable.

DR. MUCK WIELDS THE BATON

Musicians Themselvese Even Enjoy Beauty Of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

...second concert to be given this season by the Boston Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric before one of the largest, most fashionable and undoubtedly one of the most enthusiastic audiences that has gathered in the Music Hall this winter.

Fritz Kreisler, the mastter violinist, was the solist. The program, which was of exceptional intterest, consisted of but three numbers, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and the overture to Smetana's "Barter Bride," which came as a kind of delightful "bonne bouche' 'at the close of the concert.

Beethoven's seventh symphony is a most refreshing work, conceived in a spirit of wonderful inherent joyousness, a flight into the realm of pure music, without "program" or troublous "meanings"—a veritable delight. Last evening, under Dr. Muck's baton, it sang its way along with that melodic insistence which is always so characteristic of Beethoven in this mood, and was given such a happy rendition that the very pleasure of the performance seemed to infect the musicians, who smiled to themselves as they played. The reading was colorful and strongly stressed, often marked by striking accent sand special valuations of individual phrases and episodes, so that it proved one of the most interesting symphonies that this orchestra has yet given us.

The fascinating allegro with which the work closes and which was designated by Wagner himself as the very "apotheosis of joy," received an ovation. There was much poetry also in the reading of the allegretto, often a colorless number, and in this symphony, too, one noticed the peculiar brilliance of the brass choir, so that this classic work became almost a tone poem.

The chief inerest of the evening, naturally, lay in Mr. Kreisler's supreme performance of the well-night "impossible" concerto. This work, which is so difficult that few players even attempt it and which, when Tschaikowsky had written it, actually remained unplayed for years because of the temerity of even the greatest violinists of the day, Kreisler presents with a perfect ease, a surprising facility and with an insuperable brilliance that is entirely arresting. His performance, after all, is merely an exhibition of the art which conceals art. His work last evening seemed so simple.

One has so many memories of this concerto as a great battle horse—as a matter of fact, it does exploit all the tricks of the violin—that it was a fresh surprise last evening to find how vital is the lyric beauty

The First
Ne...

...of so many of its episodes as interprete... by this masterful and extremely tempera...mental artist whose splendid authority an... brilliant tone made an impression that wil... not easily be effaced.

Kreisler plays with great breadth o... feeling, but with a remarkable tenderness too. He is essentially a poet of the violin and is indeed one of the most moving play...ers of the day.

J. O. L.

Cattle Breeders To Meet.

The Holstein-Friesian Breeders' Association of the State of Maryland, an organi... devoted to the improvement o...

...ENING NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 4

...OSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

...the average standard of concerts ...be kept up to that reached by ...oston Symphoney Orchestra last ...t, the position of the musical ...in the ordinary acceptance of ...ord, would soon become a sine-...

...only was the performance prac-...ly without reproach, but Dr. ...k has, so far this season, seemed ...in touch with the taste of the ...ence here in the selection of his ...ams than ever before. The con-...pened with Beethoven's Seventh ...hony, which is generally ac-...d as the first specimen of the ...y romantic school, just as is its ...diate predecessor, the Pastoral ...hony, the first consistent sym-...c work in the nature of program ...

...introduction to the first move-... is the most extended and ma-...in symphonic literature, but ...ace which follows is curiously ...uncertain for Beethoven, ...as it were, to be always ...and never reaching a definite ...he most characteristic move-...s the last, one of the most ...ever written. It is strange ...st night, as on every other oc-...hen one has heard this move-...the first violin part seemed to ...merged at the most intense ...effect possibly due to the...

It is difficult to say why this particular symphony, more than the C minor, for instance, should be designated as essentially romantic, but nobody has yet satisfactorily defined the word "romantic" as applied to music, though nearly everyone subjectively understands it.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist in Tschaikowsky's celebrated Violin Concerto in D, is undoubtedly the most thoroughly satisfying violinist of the present day. His playing of the Concerto last night was ardent and inspired all through, and he once more entranced the audience with that peculiarly thrilling tone which marked his never-to-be-forgotten performance of the Brahms Concerto last year.

This all too short concert closed with Smetana's Overture to "The Sold Bride," a work which, while of no special thematic interest, is full of life and character, and supplied just the right element for a successful finish to the evening's performance.

Dr. Muck's conducting last night, as always, was marked by that perfect balance of the intellectual and emotional which gives him his peculiar distinction among conductors of the present day. In a word, he succeeds in bringing out all the light and shade of a composition, while never allowing this for a moment to interfere with...

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia,
NOV

...At the second Boston Symphony con-...ert, to be given in the Academy of ...usic tomorrow evening, the soloist ...ill be Fritz Kreisler, whose great ...uccess a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms Concerto. There will be but two numbers on the program. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke. It made a deep impression, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Dr. Muck performed the symphony in Boston, restoring the "cuts" and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-8 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said he hoped Dr. Muck would be able to play one of the Mahler symphonies with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and asked that if he played one that it should be the Fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise in the first season of his return to Boston.

—Copyright by Aime Dupont.
FRITZ KREISLER.

The performance of this symphony last spring was the sensation of the musical season in Boston, and the general request was that the work be performed again as early in the fall as possible. It was played a week ago with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-2, and was completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra, March 25, 1905. A year later Gericke played the work twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a work of massive proportions in three parts. The first part has two sections, and the third part has two, making five in all. The symphony begins with an impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony requires one hour and ten minutes.

...hiladelphia, Pa.

...HLER SYMPHONIES NOT WIDELY KNOWN

Playing of the C Sharp Mino... Work by Boston Orchestra to Engage Attention.

CHARPENTIER'S "JULIEN"

Lack of French Opera in the Early Season of Philadelphia-Chicago Company.

Philadelphia musicians await with a great deal of interest the Mahler C Sharp Minor Symphony, which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. Although the Mahler symphonies have awakened lively discussion in Germany, they are practically unknown in this country. Some of the Mahler songs have been introduced by singers of distinction. Like the Strauss songs, they are intended only for the mature and capable artist, and can be properly presented only when interpreted by a fine musician.

Mahler's untimely end, so peculiarly associated with his efforts in the United States, brought him more conspicuously before the American public generally than did any of his achievements as a conductor of opera or symphony. His association with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York as conductor was epoch-making, particularly in regard to the Wagnerian music-dramas. Mahler's conception of the German opera was one that quickly distinguished him from all predecessors. It consisted, in addition to marked artistic features, in allowing the auditors an opportunity of hearing the entire opera vocally. His ability to produce a volume of orchestration without drowning the singers' voices was so rare that even the musical novice was impressed, while to those who go to the opera with a desire to follow the text, it was one uninterrupted delight. Under Mahler the dramas were really sung—not shrieked. He led these master-works moreover with such certainty and authority that there was at no time a diminution of their powerful dramatic appeal. He demonstrated the possibility of accentuating the lyrical side without detracting from either the orchestral or dramatic.

Mahler's association with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and his ceaseless labor to perfect that organization, together with nerve-racking annoyances, to which he was said to be subjected, were claimed by his friends to have contributed to his early death. While this may be an exaggeration, it is doubtless true that Mahler's position in New York was widely different from that held by him in Vienna, where as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra and director of the Court Opera he was a supreme master.

The symphonic works of Mahler are said to be an effort to broaden the symphonic form. He had a marked predilection for the contralto voice, and has introduced soli for contralto in two of his symphonies. In the so-called "Titian" symphony the alto voice is used, as well as in "Ein Sommermorgentraum." The choral idea used by Mahler, while not new to symphonic writers, has never been carried to such an extreme as when employed by him.

As in the case of most famous composers, Mahler's life was stormy, beginning in poverty and ending in disillusionment and sadness. He was born in Bohemia and he obtained his education partly in Prague and partly in Vienna. Compelled to work for his livelihood, he began his career as a musician by conducting small orchestras in the theatres of Vienna, Leipzig, Prague, etc. His first recognition came when he was invited to direct the Opera in Hamburg. He soon made the Hamburg Opera the talk of Europe, and from there to director of the Vienna Opera was a logical step.

Whether the Mahler symphonies, when familiar to Americans, will be enjoyed remains to be seen. There can be no question, however, of the extent of Mahler's musical endowment or of what his unique talent enabled him to accomplish as a conductor.

* * *

...ough the Metropolitan Opera ...of New Y... has ne... ...h avid...

...delphia, Pa.
NOV [illegible] 913

...ton Symphony Orchestra

...second Boston Symphony concert, ...will be given in the Academy of ...tomorrow evening will in several ...cts be the most important of the ...n. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, ...se great success a few weeks ago with ...Philadelphia Orchestra was one of ...e pleasurable incidents of the season. ...e will play the Brahms Concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphonuy Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Mr. Gerickemade many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Dr. Muck performed the Symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form.

When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Dr. Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and asked that if he played any it would be this one in C sharp Minor, the fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The Symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establish...

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening will in several respects be the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra was one of the pleasurable incidents of the season. He will play the Brahms Concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the Concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's Symphony, for Mr. Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last Spring Dr. Muck performed the Symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Dr. Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague, and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Dr. Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and asked that if he played any it would be this in C sharp Minor, the fifth. Dr. Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The performance of this symphony last Spring was without doubt the sensation of the season in Boston, and the general request was that it be performed again as early in the Fall as possible. It was played a week ago with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a massive proportions of three parts. The first part has two sections and the third part two, making five in all. It begins with an extremely impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony consumes one hour and ten minutes.

• • •

Miss ...

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

Establi...

Praise for a Music Criticism

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—After having read your criticism of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening I feel that I must write and thank you publicly for your splendid and keen review of all of the great music, so eloquently expressed and so just toward the program as a whole, toward the conductor, the soloist, each individual member of the great orchestra and lastly the audience.

The music lovers of Philadelphia should feel grateful to the PUBLIC LEDGER for their selection of so sensitive and excellent a critic.

A subscriber and a grateful listener to both the great orchestras of Philadelphia and Boston.

Philadelphia, December 2, 1913. A. B. R.

[73]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 30 191
Establ

The Boston Sympho

The second Boston Symphony co which will be given in the Acade Music tomorrow evening, will be a the most important of the season. soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, great success a few weeks ago wit Philadelphia Orchestra has been c icled. He will play the Brahms Conc

There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was [illegible] altogether Mahler's symphony, for Mr. Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Doctor Muck performed the symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Doctor Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Doctor Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and asked that, if he played any, it might be this one in C sharp minor, the fifth. Doctor Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The performance of this symphony last spring was without doubt the sensation of the season in Boston, and the general request was that it be performed again as early in the fall as possible. It was played a week ago, with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra, March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston, and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a work of massive proportions in three parts. The first part has two sections and the third part two, making five in all. It begins with an extremely impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony consumes one hour and ten minutes.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ....
Establi

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler's Fifth Symphony—Fritz Kreisler as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert last evening at the Academy in a program such as is more frequently heard in Germany, consisting simply of two large works. Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Neither the inclement weather nor the severity of the program diminished the crowded audience which has so far this season welcomed every symphony concert.

It was most interesting to hear the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler as it was played here some seven years ago under Mr. Gericke, soon after its production in Germany. It may be regarded if not as the greatest, certainly as a typical work of one of the foremost of modern composers, who died in the height of his powers, two years ago, at the end of an engagement as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The symphony is of colossal length, in five movements. that in all require more than an hour and a quarter for performance. Despite a long sustained stress of funereal gloom, full of sombre heroics, the audience at the end gave signs of very hearty approval.

It cannot be said, however, that the work is equally impressive throughout its vast design. In the first half one cannot deny the full sincerity of mood (in grateful contrast with the symphonies of Bruckner, of whom Mahler was a disciple). Moreover, the ideas are clearly melodic, sharply enounced in perspicuous outline, in an individual orchestral style of the composer. A limitation is a certain sort of original distinction in the melodies themselves. After all, it is this quality of melodic beauty, not the mere art of combining melodies in a dramatic plot, that alone justifies a treatment of great length. Throughout the heroic first half one felt that the music was less expressive in the melodic appeal than in the whole tempestuous manner—like a mere rage of tears. In the scherzo is a new atmosphere with a tinge of Viennese gaiety, a lilt of the Waltze. Here, with all the usual brilliancy of the orchestra, there was too heavy a touch, too little of the relief of lightness. If our Boston visitors wish to win us over to this music they must play it, where possible, with a little less academic stress, a little more of abandon. Yet the contrast of the sad episode with the returning dance was well marked. There is a strange mixture of Viennese gaiety and tragic gloom in this symphonic struggle with grief.

In the finale we first lean back for pure merry enjoyment. There is something of the purling motion and charm of the Anacreon Overture of Cherubini. Here is the true high point, nay, the main justification of the symphony. It is not only the greatest finale of all modern symphonies; but it holds its own in all music. Best of all is the revival of the art of pure counterpoint,—and ever rhythmic withal—and most deliciously played. In a comment on the performance it were ungracious not to give special praise to the masterly work of the first trumpet in his most difficult part.

Lack of space forbids full justice to the performance of Kreisler in the lovely Brahms Concerto for violin, which is more and more coming to be considered perhaps the most poetically conceived of all violin concertos, and certainly one of the most melodious. The heavenly melody of the adagio, that has the special charm of his "Sapphic Ode," was sung with resonant beauty. In the last

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 2
Establish

Boston Symphony Concert

Mahler Symphony Beautifully Played —Kreisler Heard in Brahms Concerto

GUSTAV MAHLER'S symphony in C-sharp minor and the Brahms Concerts in D major for violin and orchestra with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist, comprised the program presented last night by Dr. Muck at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season in the Academy of Music and when it was over, [illegible] the large audience, whether cognoscenti or mere amateurs, who did not feel deeply grateful for a revelation of musical beauty such as has seldom been heard here. The symphony is a colossal work which consumes more than an hour in the playing, but it is written with such sustained inspiration, such sweep and variety of imaginative inventiveness that it causes no weariness, as might have been expected, but wonder at the gifted mind that conceived it and, scarcely less at the skill of the musicians who gave it so clear and forceful an interpretation.

In a way the work suggests program music in that it departs from accepted traditions of form and is written with great freedom, but it is not program music of the Strauss type, which is composed, as a task, to illustrate or express in tones some story previously conceived in the less mobile medium of words. Rather it is as if Mahler had let his quick-crowding fancies, his deep reflections on life, his changing emotions, now tender, now grave, now grotesquely cynical, express themselves without restraint in a marvelous tissue of tones. If one were gifted with insight profound enough, it might be possible to tell in words what was passing in the composer's mind, and this would be an interesting and illuminating document, but such cold explanation is, after all, not necessary, for Mahler has succeeded in conveying his message directly, if at times illusively, and the effect it creates is one of great profundity and richness.

The symphony is divided into three part and contains five distinct movements. The first is a dead march, big and imposing in style with its well-stressed rhythms playing under rich, colorful tracery of thematic figuring, pierced here and there with poignant trumpet calls. After an intricate development, this breaks into a stormy figure of passionate expressiveness which, after skirting the borderland of incoherent, but, strange to say, significant, ugliness, returns to the solemn mood of the march and the whole is in its effect stupendous and awesome.

In the third movement the mood changes totally and a valse, of magic grace, trips along with easy abandon, interwoven now and then with delicate melody. This slips into the solemn reflectiveness of the adagietto where serious thought is clothed in beautiful harmony, and this, in turn, gives way to a brilliant rondo finale which contains an involved and sparkling figure and the whole ends with a dash and at a tempo little short of amazing.

The great difficulties of the score were as if they were not to the Boston musicians who once more displayed the matchless virtuosity for which they are justly noted and the audience clamorously paid its tribute to them and to Dr. Muck who led them without disaster and with fine intelligence through the mazes of Mahler's work.

In the Brahm's concerto, Mr. Kreisler showed again those gifts of temperament and those purely technical accomplishments that have caused him to be ranked among the few really great violinists of his time. His playing is always virile and intelligent and it is difficult to conceive tone more lovely than that he produces in legato passages. His cadenza last night was a scintillating exhibition of technique. Of course the audience was delighted and he was called out not fewer than ten times to bow before his admirers.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ....
Established:

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler Symphony Beautifully Played—Kreisler as Soloist.

Philadelphia musicians should feel a debt of gratitude toward Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for bringing to them, in its entirety, the C-sharp minor symphony of the late Gustave Mahler. As played by the Boston Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night this colossal work created a profound impression, and, although one hour and ten minutes was given over to its performance, it is safe to say that no one in the audience experienced any weariness. It is a pleasure to be able to say that interest was excited and sustained, not by freak orchestration and blatant harmonic effects, but by music in its purest form and freshest melodic charm.

When Mahler created his symphony, he threw aside accepted forms and brought to life not only a wonderfully beautiful, original masterpiece, but one in a form foreign to the orthodox symphonic structure. Five movements are used. The first and longest, is a Dead March, done in a big style and introduced by a few short measures from the cornet. The steady rhythmic beat is impressive and powerful, while the coloring, employed principally in the string choir, in illustrating the methodic flow, displays at once the work of a genius. The one criticism that could be offered of this movement is its length. The themes are not left until all parts of the orchestra have been manipulated, and while it is all wonderfully interesting and intense, it is a question whether the ultimate [illegible] would not be stronger if the Dead March [illegible] breviated. Many heroes were somewhat ab- to a resting place in th[illegible]ould be escorted in this movement. It is [illegible] consumed ing, however, that such a effect is incon sequential. Then, too, so many moods are given, ranging from the Dead March to a frenzied, almost incoherent, outburst, that in its entirety the [illegible] is stupendous and awesome.

The second movement of [illegible] brings the listener into a [illegible] realm of thought. A [illegible] and ingratiating enough to be a product, dances its way lightly a terrupted for a time by a beautiful presumably intended as a trio. A valse, broken in form, with other figures obtruding, returns, to end delicacy and grace.

The third movement—another di trast from the scherzo—is a m piece of legato writing, almost in turne style. The melody, sung in lins, seemed unbelievably beauti was so wonderfully played that it a texture of dreams. The adagiett way to a rondo, the only thing symphony that suggests the Boh style. Visions of Smetana's "Ba Bride" float through the mind, although there is no hint of plagiarism in the Mahler music—only a reverting to type, a declaration of nationality. This movement is remarkable, among other things, for a sparkling fugue, which winds its Bach-like way through the orchestral chorus and leads to a rhapsodic finale.

The Boston Orchestra displayed an amazing virtuosity in dealing with this tremendous composition.

The main part of the work falls on the string and wind instruments, although there are passages of great difficulty given to the bass section. Dr. Muck can congratulate himself on his double-bass players. They did some wonderfully clear, rhythmic playing last night. The entire orchestra was superb, and Dr. Muck, for all his quiet way, is a master among leaders. The Mahler Symphony, with a little perspective, will undoubtedly be placed among the great symphonies and will be found with those which have reached celebrity on musical qualities alone.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening, was in superb form and fairly outdid himself in his interpretation of the Brahms Concerto in D Major. Kreisler's art is that of which it is impossible to say anything new. He has been lauded so persistently that there is nothing left to say. He is probably the greatest volinist of his day, possessing infinitely more vitality and brilliancy than does the intrepid Ysaye, and a ringing tone that fairly melts in legato passages. His cadenzas were marvels of scintillating technique, yet technique with a soul as well as a body.

The audience was fairly tumultuous in its manifestations of delight and gave the orchestra as well as Kreisler a great we come.

[71]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa
Date ....
Establi

BOSTON SYMP
KREISLER S

Violinist Plays Brahms' Concerto and Orchestra Gives Mahle Symphony.

PROGRAM.
Mahler..Symphony in C sharp minor, N
Brahms.
Concerto in D major, for violin and chestra, Op. 77.
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Mu
Soloist—Fritz Kreisler.

The Boston Symphony gave the ond concert of its series at the emy of Music last evening, with Kreisler as the soloist. There we two numbers on the program, M Fifth Symphony in C sharp mino Brahm's Concerto in D major. Kreisler is so great an artist that he distinguishes and makes acceptable any program, and in anticipation of his appearance the audience sat patiently through the long-drawn-out Mahler work, which is notable mainly for the amount of hard work it exacts from the orchestra. For an hour and a quarter the instruments are kept constantly employed, working at times to the limit of their endurance, and much of this ponderous work is a problem as to the meaning the composer intended to convey.

Symphony Unintelligible.

Mahler was always averse to explanatory program notes, and he probably had in mind, in taking this view, the writing of just such an involved combination of themes, elaborated frequently beyond recognition, and harmony in combinations not easily grasped through the rapidity with which they are presented. The C-sharp minor is modern in construction and idea; at least it is intended to be, for the composer has followed, except at rare instances, the big exponents of the modern school. But he also allows himself occasionally to run into melody, as if through forgetfulness, only to drift deeper into musical intricacies of almost every character.

The Dead March, which opens the Symphony, is admirable, and as it constitutes the better part of the first movement, it makes this movement emphatic to the average music lover. It also contains a fine solo for the 'cello. Most of the scherzo movement is in waltz time, and the melody played by the strings, with harp accompaniment, in the adagietto movement, is the most enjoyable part of the long work. The trying ordeal through which Conductor Muck and his men passed in presenting this work deserved the three recalls that the conductor received.

Kreisler's Masterly Playing.

Kreisler's playing of the Concerto was in the masterly style of this greatest of violinists. He has never played better and consequently the audience was given a most delightful treat of melody, not only executed with the skill of the master, but with the soul that makes every note penetrate to the innermost part and stirs and thrills and evokes enthusiasm and admiration of a master whose perfection of art surpasses that of any other public performer on the instrument.

Dr. Muck deserves great credit for the way he handled both [illegible]

From INQUIRER
Address. Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 2
Esta 884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard at the Academy of Music With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist

There were only two numbers on the program in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard by a large audience at the Academy of Music last evening. One was Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor No. 5 and the other was Brahms' violin concerto. It was owing to the length of the Mahler composition that these two were sufficient to occupy the evening. This gigantic work plays for considerably over an hour and it may be doubted whether there were many present who would not greatly have preferred a normal kind of program. To listen for more than an hour with the careful attention which music of this character to be at all appreciated demands, is a strain to which only few are easily equal, and it must be said that Mahler's score does not adequately repay the mental exertion on the part of the listener which it exacts.

Some of the thematic material which it engages is ingratiating and sympathetic and it contains some deeply impressive climaxes in which a splendid effect is reached, but it would be a mere affectation to deny that owing to its excessive length it becomes wearisome before the end is reached. It was admirably done. Director Karl Muck conducted its performance con amore and did not permit any of the beauty or the significance of the score to escape a striking and effective exhibition. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist was the assisting artist of the occasion. His selection was the concerto of Brahms, a noble work which needs, however, if it is to be saved from a suggestion of aridity just the kind of eloquent and dignified and keenly analytical interpretation which it received at Mr. Kreisler's hands last night.

In the opinion of many whose judgment, being based on a competently intelligent appreciation is entitled to respect, Fritz Kreisler is the greatest of living violinists, and even those who may regard that statement as too sweeping will agree at least that he has no superior. His tone, his style, his sentiment, his technique are all impeccable. He possesses in a pre-eminent degree that indefinable quality known as distinction. Delicacy and strength, refinement and vigor are combined in his performance to an extent that is quite exceptional, while to the interpretation of the Brahms score he brought a high intellectuality with which some musicians who are very brilliant executants are far from being endowed. To hear such noble music so nobly played was a privilege indeed.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3 191
Esta 384

MANY HEAR FRITZ KREISLER

Great Violinist and Boston Symphony Give Russian Concert.

To a capacity audience which has become an established fact with this organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist. Mr. Kreisler won a veritable ovation by his masterly interpretation of the solo part of the great Tschaikowsky concerto in D major, Op. 35. He was commandingly virile, playing with a warmth and color which gave great variety to the beauty of his tone, while his rhythm was captivating. His is a big art, and he handles with ease this composition that had made Tschaikowsky himself look despairingly around Europe for a violinist who could adequately play it.

The concerto gives first to the solo instrument a decisive theme, rather Spanish in its rhythm. This is in marked contrast to the exquisite beauty of the second theme in which Mr. Kreisler's subtle tone brought out the pianissimo passages with rare shading. These themes were elaborated into most intricate virtuoso work, which, nevertheless, held ever to their rich tonal beauty. The cadenza particularly marked the absolute purity of tone, and in the sweeping return to the first theme the orchestra again took up the accompanying passage with a fineness and delicacy that was infinitely gratifying. Throughout the concerto Dr. Muck was notably appreciative of every mood. In the andante a canzonetta, as it is called, the delicacy of the orchestra and the tonal values of Mr. Kreisler were in absolute accord. The finale, which is distinctively Russian, was bizarre, vital, alive. It included virtuosity, great depth of feeling, clarity of tone, and worked up with absolute unity to what was really a delirious climax.

The Beethoven Pastoral Symphony, which opened the program, is a joy to think back upon, with its serenity and peace, and the quiet hum of rural nature that pervades it, where the birds sing and the pipes play, and rugged pheasants dance. The alternate dominance of the different instruments displayed a real perfection of balance in the parts, and the scenic thunderstorm gave some notable rushing crescendos and diminuendos.

The Weber "Jubel" overture closed the program invigoratingly, bringing the audience to its feet in the last exposition of the German national air, which to us is "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." The martial character and the tender, dainty interlude were charmingly contrasted.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 30 1913

Establ

The Boston Symphony

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will be among the most important of the season. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, whose great success a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra has been chronicled. He will play the Brahms Concerto.

There will be but two numbers on the program, the concerto being the last. The first will be the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. This work is known to some as the "Giant" Symphony. In February, 1906, it was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It made a deep impression at the time, and yet it was not altogether Mahler's symphony, for Mr. Gericke made many cuts and changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Last spring Doctor Muck performed the symphony in Boston, restoring the cuts and changing the instrumentation to its original form. When Mr. Mahler was in this country in the season of 1907-08 he had a long talk with Doctor Muck about his works. They had been years ago associated in Prague and had an abiding admiration for each other's talent. Mahler said to Doctor Muck that he hoped he would be able to play one of his symphonies while he was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and asked that, if he played any, it might be this one in C sharp minor, the fifth. Doctor Muck was not able to play it during that year, but he fulfilled the promise he made to Mahler in the first season of his return to Boston.

The performance of this symphony last spring was without doubt the sensation of the season in Boston, and the general request was that it be performed again as early in the fall as possible. It was played a week ago, with the same success.

The symphony was written in 1901-02 and completed in 1903. Its first performance was in Cologne, October 18, 1904, and its first performance in the United States was by the Cincinnati Orchestra, March 25, 1905. A year later Mr. Gericke played it twice in Boston, and in Philadelphia and New York.

It is a work of massive proportions in three parts. The first part has two sections and the third part two, making five in all. It begins with an extremely impressive and solemn funeral march. The performance of the symphony consumes one hour and ten minutes.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establi

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler's Fifth Symphony—Fritz Kreisler as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert last evening at the Academy in a program such as is more frequently heard in Germany, consisting simply of two large works. Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Concerto for violin, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Neither the inclement weather nor the severity of the program diminished the crowded audience which has so far this season welcomed every symphony concert.

It was most interesting to hear the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler as it was played here some seven years ago under Mr. Gericke, soon after its production in Germany. It may be regarded if not as the greatest, certainly as a typical work of one of the foremost of modern composers, who died in the height of his powers, two years ago, at the end of an engagement as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The symphony is of colossal length, in five movements. that in all require more than an hour and a quarter for performance. Despite a long sustained stress of funereal gloom, full of sombre heroics, the audience at the end gave signs of very hearty approval.

It cannot be said, however, that the work is equally impressive throughout its vast design. In the first half one cannot deny the full sincerity or mood (in grateful contrast with the symphonies of Bruckner, of whom Mahler was a disciple). Moreover, the ideas are clearly melodic, sharply enounced in perspicuous outline, in an individual orchestral style of the composer. A limitation is a certain sort of original distinction in the melodies themselves. After all, it is this quality of melodic beauty, not the mere art of combining melodies in a dramatic plot, that alone justifies a treatment of great length. Throughout the heroic first half one felt that the music was less expressive in the melodic appeal than in the whole tempestuous manner—like a mere rage of tears. In the scherzo is a new atmosphere with a tinge of Viennese gaiety, a lilt of the Waltze. Here, with all the usual brilliancy of the orchestra, there was too heavy a touch, too little of the relief of lightness. If our Boston visitors wish to win us over to this music they must play it, where possible, with a little less academic stress, a little more of abandon. Yet the contrast of the sad episode with the returning dance was well marked. There is a strange mixture of Viennese gaiety and tragic gloom in this symphonic struggle with grief.

In the finale we first lean back for pure merry enjoyment. There is something of the purling motion and charm of the Anacreon Overture of Cherubini. Here is the true high point, nay, the main justification of the symphony. It is not only the greatest finale of all modern symphonies; but it holds its own in all music. Best of all is the revival of the art of pure counterpoint,—and ever rhythmic withal—and most deliciously played. In a comment on the performance it were ungracious not to give special praise to the masterly work of the first trumpet in his most difficult part.

Lack of space forbids full justice to the performance of Kreisler in the lovely Brahms Concerto for violin, which is more and more coming to be considered perhaps the most poetically conceived of all violin concertos, and certainly one of the most melodious. The heavenly melody of the adagio, that has the special charm of his "Sapphic Ode," was sung with resonant beauty. In the last movement, with [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 2 1913

Established

Boston Symphony Concert

Mahler Symphony Beautifully Played —Kreisler Heard in Brahms Concerto

GUSTAV MAHLER'S symphony in C-sharp minor and the Brahms Concerts in D major for violin and orchestra with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist, comprised the program presented last night by Dr. Muck at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season in the Academy of Music and when it was over, there were few in the large audience, whether cognoscenti or mere amateurs, who did not feel deeply grateful for a revelation of musical beauty such as has seldom been heard here. The symphony is a colossal work which consumes more than an hour in the playing, but it is written with such sustained inspiration, such sweep and variety of imaginative inventiveness that it causes no weariness, as might have been expected, but wonder at the gifted mind that conceived it and, scarcely less at the skill of the musicians who gave it so clear and forceful an interpretation.

In a way the work suggests program music in that it departs from accepted traditions of form and is written with great freedom, but it is not program music of the Strauss type, which is composed, as a task, to illustrate or express in tones some story previously conceived in the less mobile medium of words. Rather it is as if Mahler had let his quick-crowding fancies, his deep reflections on life, his changing emotions, now tender, now grave, now grotesquely cynical, express themselves without restraint in a marvelous tissue of tones. If one were gifted with insight profound enough, it might be possible to tell in words what was passing in the composer's mind, and this would be an interesting and illuminating document, but such cold explanation is, after all, not necessary, for Mahler has succeeded in conveying his message directly, if at times illusively, and the effect it creates is one of great profundity and richness.

The symphony is divided into three part and contains five distinct movements. The first is a dead march, big and imposing in style with its well-stressed rhythms playing under rich, colorful tracery of thematic figuring, pierced here and there with poignant trumpet calls. After an intricate development, this breaks into a stormy figure of passionate expressiveness which, after skirting the borderland of incoherent, but, strange to say, significant, ugliness, returns to the solemn mood of the march and the whole is in its effect stupendous and awesome.

In the third movement the mood changes totally and a valse, of magic grace, trips along with easy abandon, interwoven now and then with delicate melody. This slips into the solemn reflectiveness of the adagietto where serious thought is clothed in beautiful harmony, and this, in turn, gives way to a brilliant rondo finale which contains an involved and sparkling figure and the whole ends with a dash and at a tempo little short of amazing.

The great difficulties of the score were as if they were not to the Boston musicians who once more displayed the matchless virtuosity for which they are justly noted and the audience clamorously paid its tribute to them and to Dr. Muck who led them without disaster and with fine intelligence through the mazes of Mahler's work.

In the Brahm's concerto, Mr. Kreisler showed again those gifts of temperament and those purely technical accomplishments that have caused him to be ranked among the few really great violinists of his time. His playing is always virile and intelligent and it is difficult to conceive tone more lovely than that he produces in legato passages. His cadenza last night was a scintillating exhibition of technique. Of course the audience was delighted and he was called out not fewer than ten times to bow before his admirers.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Established:

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mahler Symphony Beautifully Played—Kreisler as Soloist.

Philadelphia musicians should feel a debt of gratitude toward Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for bringing to them, in its entirety, the C-sharp minor symphony of the late Gustave Mahler. As played by the Boston Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night this colossal work created a profound impression, and, although one hour and ten minutes was given over to its performance, it is safe to say that no one in the audience experienced any weariness. It is a pleasure to be able to say that interest was excited and sustained, not by freak orchestration and blatant harmonic effects, but by music in its purest form and freshest melodic charm.

When Mahler created his symphony, he threw aside accepted forms and brought to life not only a wonderfully beautiful, original masterpiece, but one in a form foreign to the orthodox symphonic structure. Five movements are used. The first and longest, is a Dead March, done in a big style and introduced by a few short measures from the cornet. The steady rhythmic beat is impressive and powerful, while the coloring, employed principally in the string choir, in illustrating the methodic flow, displays at once the work of a genius. The one criticism that could be offered of this movement is its length. The themes are not left until all parts of the orchestra have been manipulated, and while it is all wonderfully interesting and intense, it is a question whether the ultimate impression would not be stronger if the Dead March were somewhat abbreviated. Many heroes could be escorted to a resting place in the time consumed in this movement. It is so compelling, however, that such a defect is inconsequential. Then, too, so many moods are given, ranging from the Dead March to a frenzied, almost incoherent, outburst, that in its entirety the thing is stupendous and awesome.

The second movement of the symphony brings the listener into a [illegible] realm of thought. A valse, [illegible] and ingratiating enough to be a Vie[illegible] product, dances its way lightly along, interrupted for a time by a beautiful melody presumably intended as a trio. Again the valse, broken in form, with other melodic figures obtruding, returns, to end in great delicacy and grace.

The third movement—another direct contrast from the scherzo—is a marvelous piece of legato writing, almost in the nocturne style. The melody, sung in the violins, seemed unbelievably beautiful, and was so wonderfully played that it seemed a texture of dreams. The adagietto gives way to a rondo, the only thing in the symphony that suggests the Bohemian style. Visions of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" float through the mind, although there is no hint of plagiarism in the Mahler music—only a reverting to type, a declaration of nationality. This movement is remarkable, among other things, for a sparkling fugue, which winds its Bach-like way through the orchestral chorus and leads to a rhapsodic finale.

The Boston Orchestra displayed an amazing virtuosity in dealing with this tremendous composition.

The main part of the work falls on the string and wind instruments, although there are passages of great difficulty given to the bass section. Dr. Muck can congratulate himself on his double-bass players. They did some wonderfully clear, rhythmic playing last night. The entire orchestra was superb, and Dr. Muck, for all his quiet way, is a master among leaders. The Mahler Symphony, with a little perspective, will undoubtedly be placed among the great symphonies and will be found with those which have reached celebrity on musical qualities alone.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening, was in superb form and fairly outdid himself in his interpretation of the Brahms Concerto in D Major. Kreisler's art is that of which it is impossible to say anything new. He has been lauded so persistently that there is nothing left to say. He is probably the greatest volinist of his day, possessing infinitely more vitality and brilliancy than does the intrepid Ysaye, and a ringing tone that fairly melts in legato passages. His cadenzas were marvels of scintillating technique, yet technique with a soul as well as a body.

The audience was fairly tumultuous in its manifestations of delight and gave the orchestra as well as Kreisler a great welcome.

[74]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establi 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY, KREISLER SOLOIST

Violinist Plays Brahms' Concerto and Orchestra Gives Mahler's Symphony.

PROGRAM.
Mahler..Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5
Brahms.
Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra, Op. 77.
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist—Fritz Kreisler.

The Boston Symphony gave the second concert of its series at the Academy of Music last evening, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. There were but two numbers on the program, Mahler's Fifth Symphony in C sharp minor, and Brahm's Concerto in D major. Kreisler is so great an artist that he distinguishes and makes acceptable any program, and in anticipation of his appearance the audience sat patiently through the long-drawn-out Mahler work, which is notable mainly for the amount of hard work it exacts from the orchestra. For an hour and a quarter the instruments are kept constantly employed, working at times to the limit of their endurance, and much of this ponderous work is a problem as to the meaning the composer intended to convey.

Symphony Unintelligible.

Mahler was always averse to explanatory program notes, and he probably had in mind, in taking this view, the writing of just such an involved combination of themes, elaborated frequently beyond recognition, and harmony in combinations not easily grasped through the rapidity with which they are presented. The C-sharp minor is modern in construction and idea; at least it is intended to be, for the composer has followed, except at rare instances, the big exponents of the modern school. But he also allows himself occasionally to run into melody, as if through forgetfulness, only to drift deeper into musical intricacies of almost every character.

The Dead March, which opens the Symphony, is admirable, and as it constitutes the better part of the first movement, it makes this movement emphatic to the average music lover. It also contains a fine solo for the 'cello. Most of the scherzo movement is in waltz time, and the melody played by the strings, with harp accompaniment, in the adagietto movement, is the most enjoyable part of the long work. The trying ordeal through which Conductor Muck and his men passed in presenting this work deserved the three recalls that the conductor received.

Kreisler's Masterly Playing.

Kreisler's playing of the Concerto was in the masterly style of this greatest of violinists. He has never played better and consequently the audience was given a most delightful treat of melody, not only executed with the skill of the master, but with the soul that makes every note penetrate to the innermost part and stirs and thrills and evokes enthusiasm and admiration of a master whose perfection of art surpasses that of any other public performer on the instrument.

Dr. Muck deserves great credit for the way he handled both compositions [illegible]

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2

884

HE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

at the Academy of Music
h Fritz Kreisler as Soloist were only two numbers on the in which the Boston Symphony was heard by a large audience Academy of Music last evening. ne was Mahler's symphony in C sharp minor No. 5, and the other was Brahms' violin concerto. It was owing to the ngth of the Mahler composition that these two were sufficient to occupy the evening. This gigantic work plays for considerably over an hour and it may be doubted whether there were many present who would not greatly have preferred a normal kind of program. To listen for more than an hour with the careful attention which music of this character to be at all appreciated demands, is a strain to which only few are easily equal, and it must be said that Mahler's score does not adequately repay the mental exertion on the part of the listener which it exacts.

Some of the thematic material which it engages is ingratiating and sympathetic and it contains some deeply impressive climaxes in which a splendid effect is reached, but it would be a mere affectation to deny that owing to its excessive length it becomes wearisome before the end is reached. It was admirably done. Director Karl Muck conducted its performance con amore and did not permit any of the beauty or the significance of the score to escape a striking and effective exhibition. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist was the assisting artist of the occasion. His selection was the concerto of Brahms, a noble work which needs, however, if it is to be saved from a suggestion of aridity just the kind of eloquent and dignified and keenly analytical interpretation which it received at Mr. Kreisler's hands last night.

In the opinion of many whose judgment, being based on a competently intelligent appreciation is entitled to respe Fritz Kreisler is the greatest of livi ists, and even those who may tement as too sweeping at he has no super his sentiment, ble. He pos that in stinction. nat is hent and erpreta formance to ought onal, while ne m the Brahms nts intellectuality who are very far from being noble music so vilege indeed.

the ican while scream. character d a lot of n Franklin any scored the-minute.
at Trocadero
s amusing and he re so when he came

POST
Washington, D. C.
DEC 3 1913

84

HEAR FRITZ KREISLER

Violinist and Boston Symphony Give Russian Concert.

a capacity audience which has be e an established fact with this organ tion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist. Mr. Kreisler won a veritable ovation by his masterly interpretation of the solo part of the great Tschaikowsky concerto in D major, Op. 35. He was commandingly virile, playing with a warmth and color which gave great variety to the beauty of his tone, while his rhythm was captivating. His is a big art, and he handles with ease this composition that had made Tschaikowsky himself look despairingly around Europe for a violinist who could adequately play it.

The concerto gives first to the solo instrument a decisive theme, rather Spanish in its rhythm. This is in marked contrast to the exquisite beauty of the second theme in which Mr. Kreisler's subtle tone brought out the pianissimo passages with rare shading. These themes were elaborated into most intricate virtuoso work, which, nevertheless, held ever to their rich tonal beauty. The cadenza particularly marked the absolute purity of tone, and in the sweeping return to the first theme the orchestra again took up the accompanying passage with a fineness and delicacy that was infinitely gratifying. Throughout the concerto Dr. Muck was notably appreciative of every mood. In the andante a canzonetta, as it is called, the delicacy of the orchestra and the tonal values of Mr. Kreisler were in absolute accord. The finale, which is distinctively Russian, was bizarre, vital, alive. It included virtuosity, great depth of feeling, clarity of tone, and worked up with absolute unity to what was really a delirious climax.

The Beethoven Pastoral Symphony, which opened the program, is a joy to think back upon, with its serenity and peace, and the quiet hum of rural nature that pervades it, where the birds sing and the pipes play, and rugged peasants dance. The alternate dominance of the different instruments displayed a real perfection of balance in the parts, and the scenic thunderstorm gave some notable rushing crescendos and diminuendos.

The Weber "Jubel" overture closed the program invigoratingly, bringing the audience to its feet in the last exposition of the German national air, which to us is "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." The martial character and the tender dainty interlude were charmingly contrasted.

J. MacB.

TIMES

dress: Washington, D. C.

DEC 3 1913

ished:

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS TO CAPACITY

Organization, Under Dr. Karl Muck, and Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, Well Received.

A capacity audience attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck brought out the finest shades of feeling in his orchestra, which played with consummate purity and artistic finish.

The Sixth, or Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, was superbly rendered. It has been aptly said that this symphony "suggests the rustic calm and the tranquillity of the soul in contact with nature." The first movement, Allegro in F Major, has a woodland character, and its placid flowing melody blends into the second movement, a beautiful Andante with its song of the brook and trilling of birds. The cuckoo, quail and nightingale are plainly heard. The third movement suggests a rustic dance, with a [illegible] band of musicians. The gay[illegible] is interrupted [illegible] portraying in tone pictures lightning, thunder and the rain. A clarinet call voices the thankful feelings after the storm is over, and the symphony closes with a burst of joyfulness.

The Tschaikowsy Concerto in D Major has seldom been played with greater mastery than by the brilliant artist Fritz Kreisler, violin soloist of the concert. With virile surety of touch and full beauty of tone and technique, he gave a superb rendition of this most difficult of concertos. The martial theme of the first movement was embroidered by florid passage work for the solo violin, and a cadenza which gave him full opportunity to display his marvelous artistry.

The second movement opens with the plaintive melancholy note that hearers have grown accustomed to associate with Tschaikowsky's music. It is a ritornello almost like a love-song of passionate pleading. Kreisler's interpretation was full of sublime poetry and ineffable beauty. The finale is a rondo based on two Russian dance-themes, insistently repeated, in rhymthic measures. The wild dance is interrupted by a plaintive duet for violin and 'cello, and then the dance is resumed with full vigor.

The concert was brought to a close with the brilliant Jubel Overture, in E Major, of Weber. As the strains of the national hymn "Heil dir im Siegerkranz" rang out in broadly sustained chords, the audience, mistaking this theme for "My Country 'Tis of Thee," rose to its feet.

The next concert will take place Tuesday afternoon, January 6, 1914.

J. M.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est

BOSTON CO. INTERPRETS MOHLER'S SYMPHONY

Presents Fifth Work of Noted Composer and Conductor in Masterful Manner

OVERCOMES PITFALLS

Many Difficult Parts Fail to Affect Organization's Rendition

GUSTAV MAHLER, whose fifth symphony was played by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, was so eminent as a conductor that Americans especially have been inclined to overlook his remarkable gifts as a composer. It was this kind of neglect which helped to bring on the bitter [illegible] musical director, but he objected to an insufficiency of rehearsals. The New York Philharmonic, of which he became conductor, is said to have worried him with petty administrative details. Mahler was in bad health. It was his wish to die in Vienna, and the end did come there in 1911.

His posthumous fame grows. His nine symphonies contain much wonderful modern music despite the sin of prolixity of which they are sometimes guilty. Their influence, too, has been somewhat handicapped by difficulty of interpretation. The Boston Symphony is, therefore, an excellent instrument for the exploitation of Mahler's music.

This was eloquently demonstrated last evening, when the pitfalls of the "giant" symphony in C sharp minor were overcome in masterly style. The work plays for an hour and ten minutes. But in this case, happily, length does not mean dullness. Many moods are graphically depicted in the score.

There is a solemn funeral march, a passionate tempestuous movement; a contrasting scherzo; a lovely, calm adagietto, a blithe rondo and a triumphant finale.

The symphony is in three parts, some of which have minor divisions. The polyphony is exceedingly intricate, and all the resources of a large, modern orchestra are employed with amazing skill.

Doctor Muck's reading of the score was finely lucid and in keenest sympathy with the spirit of the work. Attempts have been made to interpret the symphony as program music, and its "story" has even been told in a brochure twenty-three pages long. But Mahler was emphatically opposed to the policy of attributing concrete meanings here to his harmonic ideas, after the favorite fashion of Richard Strauss. He desired the Fifth Symphony to be heard as "absolute music."

One other number only occupied the program. This was the thoughtful violin concerto in D major, by Brahms, played in this instance by Fritz Kreisler, who made his third appearance here this season. Able critics regard Mr. Kreisler as the first violinist of the period. If one set aside Eugene Ysaye, in his exceptional Promethean mood, this verdict seems just.

The work was written for Joachim, but it is doubtful if that great artist interpreted it any better than did Mr. Kreisler last evening. There was the most exquisite tone production in the adagio, which closely resembles a serenade; an exhibition of impeccable technique in the fantasia of the first movement, and the interpolated unaccompanied cadenza, coruscating brilliancy in the arpeggios and florid runs of the finale. The large audience applauded with justified enthusiasm.

WANT NEW BRIDGE

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3 1913

Establ

$100,000.

PASTORAL SYMPHONY IS ADMIRABLY GIVEN

Boston Organization Scores Success in Work of Beethoven at Its Second Concert.

ENCORES FOR FRITZ KREISLER

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of concerts for this season was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (No. 6) was given, and Fritz Kreisler played Tchaikowsky's D major Concerto, opus 35. The program ended with Weber's "Jubel" overture.

The Sixth Symphony is universally beloved by concert-goers. In the first place, it is full of melodic beauty of an idyllic character; then there is a great deal of reiteration of short, simple themes, impressing rhythmic phrases upon the mind; there is a delightful freshness and frankness—no mystery, no subtlety—about everything; it is all nature made audible and musical. Even the storm-scene music, elementally furious though it is, is not tragic. It is, one might almost say, an optimistic storm.

The work is so rich in rustic poetic suggestion as to challenge exaggeration. But Dr. Muck is far too great a musician to overreach his privileges as a conductor, and in every part of the work consummate skill in the management of the instrumentation goes hand in hand with a judicious but fully adequate portrayal of every mood. His playing of the storm scene was especially remarkable for the suggestion of tempest pushed to the bounds of good taste, yet never for a moment becoming cheaply descriptive. The entire work, from the first to the last measure, was given as it has rarely been given in Washington.

Mr. Kreisler is well recognized as one of the princes of violinists. Even the uninitiated feel the indefinable charm of power expressed in the masterly poise and balance, the pure and flawless tone and the clear-cut, incisive phrasing of Mr. Kreisler's art. He has a masterly way with the violin, as one who determines to declare rather than coaxingly reveal its endless magic. Although the most intricate difficulties seem as nothing to him, he does not lend himself to mere virtuosity. A fine play of light and shade and sobriety of expression are, together with his masterly bowing and phrasing, his great glories. He does not dwell lingeringly on the beautiful singing of his violin; he does not paint with great richness, nor has he the subtle conception of the mysterious, such as hypnotise the memory and intoxicate the senses. He is serene, magnificent, full of a fiery energy, and of a solid musical understanding. Mr. Kreisler was recalled four or five times.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date 2 1913

Esta

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH KREISLER

Mahler's "Giant" Symphony and Brahm's Concerto Magnificently Played.

TRIUMPH FOR DR. MUCK

PROGRAM.

Mahler.....Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5
Brahms,
Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra

In the third of a century during which it has given its annual series of concerts in the Academy the Boston Symphony Orchestra has probably never played better than it played—against villainous weather conditions for strings and valves—last evening. It had assigned itself one of the noblest of instrumental texts in the magnificent "Giant" symphony of Gustav Mahler—popularly so called possibly because of its length, but better deserving the title by its commanding stature in comparison with almost any symphony work that can be cited of modern composition. It is the utterance of a great and a misunderstood life writing itself out in music of a passionate sincerity, a profound intellectuality and withal a poet's sense of the beauty that dwells in deep retreats.

Every player in the orchestra gave himself to the interpretation with a passionate sincerity comparable to the inspired conviction of the writer as he penned this tremendous work of the creative imagination; and though the symphony took 70 minutes to play, there was not a moment when the inspiration flagged or when the hearer felt the sense of surfeit, though it was no easy task to take in the whole length and breadth of a work of such ample dimensions at first hearing. Posterity must surely accord it a place with the greatest music that has been given to the world; it seems to belong in the aristocracy with Bach's Mass in B minor and the masterpieces of Beethoven. Each man in the playing gave himself to the inner subtleties of the architecture as though in the rehearsal he had learned to love the exquisite individualization of his own instrument. This symphony could only have been by one unerringly acquainted with the utmost and the best that the voices of the several choirs can accomplish.

FUNERAL MARCH FIRST.

The first of the three subdivided movements is a funeral march that opens with the thrilling archangelic challenge of the trumpet. After the measured, deliberate pace of pensive meditation, the brasses hurl themselves like the sea against the brave swimming of the violins. 'Cellos and violins engage in cantabile dialogue. As the voices diminish to a murmur, there recurs the beautiful cry of the trumpet. Upon the aroused anger of tympani and basses there follows the lighter altercation of the pizzicato of the second violins and a return to serene philosophy of the 'cellos as that of a "faith that looks through death." The relief of the somewhat lighter mood of the scherzo, with an episode of idealized waltz rhythm, still holds to the heroic pattern of such Olympian relaxation as Brahms gives us in similar movements. Then comes the most affecting and beautiful portion of the celestial entity, in the spiritual exaltation of the adagietto of the last movement, which, by the composer's direction, is to be played "very slowly."

The successive entrance of violins, 'cellos and violas upon the enunciation of the solemn theme was as though he who created these harmonies beheld—like Handel—the "heavens opened" and saw at last the meaning of the fevered riddle of his life. The concluding fugue, worthy of Reger's consummate engineering, rises to a magnificent climax that stirred the immense audience to repeated recalls of Doctor Muck, who bade the players rise in recognition of the tribute to the genius of their endeavor.

In bringing out every delicate shade and accent, every subtle nuance of the score, Doctor Muck outdid himself, and each man played as though his own soul hung on the oboe's luscious quaver, the horn's muffled clarity, the tracery of the harp and the running violins. There was no structural weakness evident anywhere. It was as perfect a reading as the ear and the mind could ask.

KREISLER THE SOLOIST.

Fritz Kreisler was the soloist. He played with fire and feeling, and his violin was absolutely one with the orchestra's already established unity.

He could not have chosen a more satisfactory work for the revelation of the best qualities of his art than this monumental D Major Concerto of Brahms, and into the playing he put all of his resolute and manly personality, his technical wizardry, his discerning sense of values, the scholarship on which his excellence as a performer is solidly grounded.

The cadenza gave to the violin the authority and resonance of a small orchestra, and in this original composition Kreisler had caught exactly the character of the context.

The oboe in the adagio was admirably handled, but it was at all times a particular delight to notice the absolute community of purpose between the soloist and the instrumental background.

Kreisler played as though he felt the occasion, and he rose to the heights of a commanding inspiration. It is scarcely possible to imagine a concert in all particulars [illegible] worthy to be [illegible]

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 30 1913

Esta 34

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, who has fully vindicated the claim of his friends that he is the foremost living violinist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Kreisler's success this year has far surpassed anything he has enjoyed in America before. The musical public, fully realizing the gifts of this great artist, has been flocking to his concerts in large numbers. He will play here Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major, which has become one of the standard pieces of violinistic literature.

The symphony will be the lovely "Pastorale" of Beethoven. This is Beethoven's only vesture into the field of frankly programmatic music. It is interesting to note that in this symphony Beethoven with his comparatively simple and primitive means achieves pictorial results in music at least as vivid as composers of today do with the huge paraphernalia of the modern orchestra. The other number will be Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

Maggie Teyte.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 30 1913

1884

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Kreisler is in America on a tour which will reach into May, and next week he is devoting his services entirely to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its second southern trip. He will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

The symphony will be the "Pastorale" of Beethoven. The other number will be Weber's "Jubilee Overture."

The patronage of the Boston Symphony concerts this season represents the same enthusiastic welcome that the organization has enjoyed for years.

ADVERTISER.

CEMBER 9.

BAR NEGROES FROM CONCERTS

CAPITAL SEGREGATION TAKES A NEW FORM

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "RESERVED"

Guarantors of Five Appearances at Capital, It Is Claimed, Have Not Welcomed Subscriptions From Wealthy Colored Residents of Washington.

By John Lorance.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8.—An extraordinary piece of information that has come out in Washington is the refusal to permit colored persons to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives five concerts in Washington in the course of the winter and which concerts are the greatest musical and social events of their kind in Washington.

They take the place of the grand opera in Boston and New York.

The success of the concerts is made certain by a guarantee fund, and those who subscribe are given the right to purchase tickets to the concerts.

The concerts are now so popular in Washington that the seating capacity of Washington's largest theatre is absorbed by those subscribing to the guarantee fund.

Rarely is a ticket for sale to the public.

Heretofore the colored persons of Washington have been solicited to subscribe to the guarantee fund and thus have they obtained tickets to hear the concerts. This winter, however, they were denied the privilege of subscribing and hence they find themselves without tickets to the concerts and the possibility of getting them. Many of them are wealthy or earn substantial salaries, such as the principals of schools, and many of them have a cultivated taste for music, in which heretofore they have been materially assisted by white lovers of music. The Boston Symphony management is not so much blamed for the present situation as the local managers of the guarantee fund. It is another outbreak of the local race prejudice.

[75]

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 3 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS TO CAPACITY

Organization, Under Dr. Karl Muck, and Fritz Kreisler, Violinist, Well Received.

A capacity audience attended the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck brought out the finest shades of feeling in his orchestra, which played with consummate purity and artistic finish.

The Sixth, or Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, was superbly rendered. It has been aptly said that this symphony "suggests the rustic calm and the tranquillity of the soul in contact with nature." The first movement, Allegro in F Major, has a woodland character, and its placid flowing melody blends into the second movement, a beautiful Andante with its song of the brook and trilling of birds. The cuckoo, quail and nightingale are plainly heard. The third movement suggests a rustic dance, with its village band of musicians. The gayety is interrupted by [illegible] ally portraying in tone pictures lightning, thunder and the rain. A clarinet call voices the thankful feelings after the storm is over, and the symphony closes with a burst of joyfulness.

The Tschaikowsy Concerto in D Major has seldom been played with greater mastery than by the brilliant artist, Fritz Kreisler, violin soloist of the concert. With virile surety of touch and full beauty of tone and technique, he gave a superb rendition of this most difficult of concertos. The martial theme of the first movement was embroidered by florid passage work for the solo violin, and a cadenza which gave him full opportunity to display his marvelous artistry.

The second movement opens with the plaintive melancholy note that hearers have grown accustomed to associate with Tschaikowsky's music. It is a ritornello almost like a love-song of passionate pleading. Kreisler's interpretation was full of sublime poetry and ineffable beauty. The finale is a rondo based on two Russian dance-themes, insistently repeated, in rhymthic measures. The wild dance is interrupted by a plaintive duet for violin and 'cello, and then the dance is resumed with full vigor.

The concert was brought to a close with the brilliant Jubel Overture, in E Major, of Weber. As the strains of the national hymn "Heil dir im Siegerkranz" rang out in broadly sustained chords, the audience, mistaking this theme for "My Country 'Tis of Thee," rose to its feet.

The next concert will take place Tuesday afternoon, January 6, 1914.

J. M.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON CO. INTERPRETS MOHLER'S SYMPHONY

Presents Fifth Work of Noted Composer and Conductor in Masterful Manner

OVERCOMES PITFALLS

Many Difficult Parts Fail to Affect Organization's Rendition

GUSTAV MAHLER, whose fifth symphony was played by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, was so eminent as a conductor that Americans especially have been inclined to overlook his remarkable gifts as a composer. It was this kind of neglect which helped to bring on the bitter [illegible]

The Metropolitan wanted him for a musical director, but he objected to an insufficiency of rehearsals. The New York Philharmonic, of which he became conductor, is said to have worried him with petty administrative details. Mahler was in bad health. It was his wish to die in Vienna, and the end did come there in 1911.

His posthumous fame grows. His nine symphonies contain much wonderful modern music despite the sin of prolixity of which they are sometimes guilty. Their influence, too, has been somewhat handicapped by difficulty of interpretation. The Boston Symphony is, therefore, an excellent instrument for the exploitation of Mahler's music.

This was eloquently demonstrated last evening, when the pitfalls of the "giant" symphony in C sharp minor were overcome in masterly style. The work plays for an hour and ten minutes. But in this case, happily, length does not mean dullness. Many moods are graphically depicted in the score.

There is a solemn funeral march, a passionate tempestuous movement; a contrasting scherzo; a lovely, calm adagietto, a blithe rondo and a triumphant finale.

The symphony is in three parts, some of which have minor divisions. The polyphony is exceedingly intricate, and all the resources of a large, modern orchestra are employed with amazing skill.

Doctor Muck's reading of the score was finely lucid and in keenest sympathy with the spirit of the work. Attempts have been made to interpret the symphony as program music, and its "story" has even been told in a brochure twenty-three pages long. But Mahler was emphatically opposed to the policy of attributing concrete meanings here to his harmonic ideas, after the favorite fashion of Richard Strauss. He desired the Fifth Symphony to be heard as "absolute music."

One other number only occupied the program. This was the thoughtful violin concerto in D major, by Brahms, played in this instance by Fritz Kreisler, who made his third appearance here this season. Able critics regard Mr. Kreisler as the first violinist of the period. If one set aside Eugene Ysaye, in his exceptional Promethean mood, this verdict seems just.

The work was written for Joachim, but it is doubtful if that great artist interpreted it any better than did Mr. Kreisler last evening. There was the most exquisite tone production in the adagio, which closely resembles a serenade; an exhibition of impeccable technique in the fantasia of the first movement, and the interpolated unaccompanied cadenza, coruscating brilliancy in the arpeggios and florid runs of the finale. The large audience applauded with justified enthusiasm.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

$100,000.

PASTORAL SYMPHONY IS ADMIRABLY GIVEN

Boston Organization Scores Success in Work of Beethoven at Its Second Concert.

ENCORES FOR FRITZ KREISLER

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series of concerts for this season was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (No. 6) was given, and Fritz Kreisler played Tchaikowsky's D major Concerto, opus 35. The program ended with Weber's "Jubel" overture.

The Sixth Symphony is universally beloved by concert-goers. In the first place, it is full of melodic beauty of an idyllic character; then there is a great deal of reiteration of short, simple themes, impressing rhythmic phrases upon the mind; there is a delightful freshness and frankness—no mystery, no subtlety—about everything; it is all nature made audible and musical. Even the storm-scene music, elementally furious though it is, is not tragic. It is, one might almost say, an optimistic storm.

The work is so rich in rustic poetic suggestion as to challenge exaggeration. But Dr. Muck is far too great a musician to overreach his privileges as a conductor, and in every part of the work consummate skill in the management of the instrumentation goes hand in hand with a judicious but fully adequate portrayal of every mood. His playing of the storm scene was especially remarkable for the suggestion of tempest pushed to the bounds of good taste, yet never for a moment becoming cheaply descriptive. The entire work, from the first to the last measure, was given as it has rarely been given in Washington.

Mr. Kreisler is well recognized as one of the princes of violinists. Even the uninitiated feel the indefinable charm of power expressed in the masterly poise and balance, the pure and flawless tone and the clear-cut, incisive phrasing of Mr. Kreisler's art. He has a masterly way with the violin, as one who determines to declare rather than coaxingly reveal its endless magic. Although the most intricate difficulties seem as nothing to him, he does not lend himself to mere virtuosity. A fine play of light and shade and sobriety of expression are, together with his masterly bowing and phrasing, his great glories. He does not dwell lingeringly on the beautiful singing of his violin; he does not paint with great richness, nor has he the subtle conception of the mysterious, such as hypnotize the memory and intoxicate the senses. He is serene, magnificent, full of a fiery energy, and of a solid musical understanding. Mr. Kreisler was recalled four or five times.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH KREISLER

Mahler's "Giant" Symphony and Brahm's Concerto Magnificently Played.

TRIUMPH FOR DR. MUCK

PROGRAM.

Mahler.....Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5
Brahms,
Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra

In the third of a century during which it has given its annual series of concerts in the Academy the Boston Symphony Orchestra has probably never played better than it played—against villainous weather conditions for strings and valves—last evening. It had assigned itself one of the noblest of instrumental texts in the magnificent "Giant" symphony of Gustav Mahler—popularly so called possibly because of its length, but better deserving the title by its commanding stature in comparison with almost any symphony work that can be cited of modern composition. It is the utterance of a great and a misunderstood life writing itself out in music of a passionate sincerity, a profound intellectuality and withal a poet's sense of the beauty that dwells in deep retreats.

Every player in the orchestra gave himself to the interpretation with a passionate sincerity comparable to the inspired conviction of the writer as he penned this tremendous work of the creative imagination; and though the symphony took 70 minutes to play, there was not a moment when the inspiration flagged or when the hearer felt the sense of surfeit, though it was no easy task to take in the whole length and breadth of a work of such ample dimensions at first hearing. Posterity must surely accord it a place with the greatest music that has been given to the world; it seems to belong in the aristocracy with Bach's Mass in B minor and the masterpieces of Beethoven. Each man in the playing gave himself to the inner subtleties of the architecture as though in the rehearsal he had learned to love the exquisite individualization of his own instrument. This symphony could only have been by one unerringly acquainted with the utmost and the best that the voices of the several choirs can accomplish.

FUNERAL MARCH FIRST.

The first of the three subdivided movements is a funeral march that opens with the thrilling archangelic challenge of the trumpet. After the measured, deliberate pace of pensive meditation, the brasses hurl themselves like the sea against the brave swimming of the violins. 'Cellos and violins engage in cantabile dialogue. As the voices diminish to a murmur, there recurs the beautiful cry of the trumpet. Upon the aroused anger of tympani and basses there follows the lighter altercation of the pizzicato of the second violins and a return to serene philosophy of the 'cellos as that of a "faith that looks through death." The relief of the somewhat lighter mood of the scherzo, with an episode of idealized waltz rhythm, still holds to the heroic pattern of such Olympian relaxation as Brahms gives us in similar movements. Then comes the most affecting and beautiful portion of the celestial entity, in the spiritual exaltation of the adagietto of the last movement, which, by the composer's direction, is to be played "very slowly."

The successive entrance of violins, 'cellos and violas upon the enunciation of the solemn theme was as though he who created these harmonies beheld—like Handel—the "heavens opened" and saw at last the meaning of the fevered riddle of his life. The concluding fugue, worthy of Reger's consummate engineering, rises to a magnificent climax that stirred the immense audience to repeated recalls of Doctor Muck, who bade the players rise in recognition of the tribute to the genius of their endeavor.

In bringing out every delicate shade and accent, every subtle nuance of the score, Doctor Muck outdid himself, and each man played as though his own soul hung on the oboe's luscious quaver, the horn's muffled clarity, the tracery of the harp and the running violins. There was no structural weakness evident anywhere. It was as perfect a reading as the ear and the mind could ask.

KREISLER THE SOLOIST.

Fritz Kreisler was the soloist. He played with fire and feeling, and his violin was absolutely one with the orchestra's already established unity.

He could not have chosen a more satisfactory work for the revelation of the best qualities of his art than this monumental D Major Concerto of Brahms, and into the playing he put all of his resolute and manly personality, his technical wizardry, his discerning sense of values, the scholarship on which his excellence as a performer is solidly grounded.

The cadenza gave to the violin the authority and resonance of a small orchestra, and in this original composition Kreisler had caught exactly the character of the context.

The oboe in the adagio was admirably handled, but it was at all times a particular delight to notice the absolute community of purpose between the soloist and the instrumental background.

Kreisler played as though he felt the occasion, and he rose to the heights of a commanding inspiration. It is scarcely possible to imagine a concert in all particulars [illegible] worthy to be heard [illegible]

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 30 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fritz Kreisler, who has fully vindicated the claim of his friends that he is the foremost living violinist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Kreisler's success this year has far surpassed anything he has enjoyed in America before. The musical public, fully realizing the gifts of this great artist, has been flocking to his concerts in large numbers. He will play here Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major, which has become one of the standard pieces of violinistic literature.

The symphony will be the lovely "Pastorale" of Beethoven. This is Beethoven's only vesture into the field of frankly programmatic music. It is interesting to note that in this symphony Beethoven with his comparatively simple and primitive means achieves pictorial results in music at least as vivid as composers of today do with the huge paraphernalia of the modern orchestra. The other number will be Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

Maggie Teyte.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible] 1913

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert at the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

Kreisler is in America on a tour which will reach into May, and next week he is devoting his services entirely to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its second southern trip. He will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major.

The symphony will be the "Pastorale" of Beethoven. The other number will be Weber's "Jubilee Overture."

The patronage of the Boston Symphony concerts this season represents the same enthusiastic welcome that the organization has enjoyed for years.

1884

ADVERTISER.
CEMBER 9.

BAR NEGROES FROM CONCERTS

CAPITAL SEGREGATION TAKES A NEW FORM

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "RESERVED"

Guarantors of Five Appearances at Capital, It Is Claimed, Have Not Welcomed Subscriptions From Wealthy Colored Residents of Washington.

By John Lorance.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8.—An extraordinary piece of information that has come out in Washington is the refusal to permit colored persons to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives five concerts in Washington in the course of the winter and which concerts are the greatest musical and social events of their kind in Washington.

They take the place of the grand opera in Boston and New York.

The success of the concerts is made certain by a guarantee fund, and those who subscribe are given the right to purchase tickets to the concerts.

The concerts are now so popular in Washington that the seating capacity of Washington's largest theatre is absorbed by those subscribing to the guarantee fund.

Rarely is a ticket for sale to the public. Heretofore the colored persons of Washington have been solicited to subscribe to the guarantee fund and thus have they obtained tickets to hear the concerts. This winter, however, they were denied the privilege of subscribing and hence they find themselves without tickets to the concerts and the possibility of getting them. Many of them are wealthy or earn substantial salaries, such as the principals of schools, and many of them have a cultivated taste for music, in which heretofore they have been materially assisted by white lovers of music. The Boston Symphony management is not so much blamed for the present situation as the local managers of the guarantee fund. It is another outbreak of the local race prejudice.

BOSTON GLOBE

DECEMBER 8,

KREISLER PLAYS IN SUPERB FASHION

His Program Features 18th Century Music.

Second Sunday Evening Concert at the Boston Opera House.

The consummate art of Fritz Kreisler brought together an audience yesterday afternoon sufficient to fill Symphony Hall to its utmost capacity despite the untoward weather. With an entire program to manipulate to his liking the great violinist had an opportunity to humor his archaic tastes to the full and to bring to light some of the gems of the old masters, moldy and dustladen upon the covers it may be, but raidant and resplendent in spirit, that may have rewarded his search among the ancient archieves of the libraries.

Mr Kreisler played music yesterday from a group of composers who dwelt upon this earth during the 17th or 18th centuries, during parts thereof or both—Friedmann Bach, Couperin, Pugnani, Corelli, Cartier, Tartini. These ancient gentlemen all would wear the opprobrious title of "classicists," according to the usual methods of cataloging, and classical music by all accepted tenets is held to be the bane of the multitudes, yet here was an audience essentially popular and general in character, that applauded the violinist tumultously at every opportunity, urging a repetitioned of one number and insisting upon that of another.

Mr Kreisler accomplishes with apparent unconcern that which the student knows to be of enormous difficulty, yet discussion of his mechanical mastery of his instrument ceased to be timely seasons ago. The violinist, now in the early noonday of his ascendency, was in excellent spirits. He chose pieces by these old masters by turn grave and gay, and made his instrument the translator of their thoughts, their smiles, their pretty conceits, their adorable artificialties, their pompous flourishes and their tears.

What could have been more exquisite than the lightness, inimitable grace and elegance of the air and stately dance of Louis XIII by Couperin? This was Louis, first violinist in the King's band, and eldest of three brothers, all musicians. Cartier's "The Hunt" is an exquisite miniature. Its composer was the son of a dancing master, which may explain his lively sense of rhythm. He also made known in Paris the old Italian masters—Corelli and Tartini—by finding time from his duties as a member of Emperor Napoleon's private band to edit revisions of their works.

They, too, were on Mr Kreisler's program. The set of variations by the latter were of surpassing brilliance, and Corelli's Sarabande showed his gift of melody.

In the second group were Gluck's Melody in D Minor, played with a noble repose, and Schumann's Romance in A Major with intimacy and tenderness. Mozart's Rondo was sparkling in its freshness. Mr Kreisler's own Caprice and three caprices by Paganini finished the program. It was an afternoon of supreme interpretation by an artist who is more than an eminent violinist.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 8, 191

KREISLER RECITAL

Fritz Kreisler, playing yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, again attracted an audience of exceptional numbers, which applauded the violinist to the echo, and remained for more long after the programme as announced had come to an end. Mr. Kreisler, as usual, played a number of pieces of old music, as arranged by him for the violin. There is perhaps no other violinist now before the public who can accomplish so much with this music of a bygone time. Mr. Kreisler's tone is so beautiful that he would win hundreds of admirers for this reason alone, even if he used this tone to less artistic purposes than that to which he consecrates it. The technical finish and the inborn taste which he always displays in interpretation are especially desirable in interpreting music by Couperin, Cartier, Pugnani or Corelli and Tartini, or even the more modern Friedmann Bach. J. S. Bach's suite in E major, and Schumann, Mozart and Paganini added other desirable and contrasting elements to the programme.

BOSTON HER

DECEMBER 8, 1

KREISLER AT SYMPHONY HA

Violinist Pleases Crowded House with Exhibition of His Genius.

Mr. Kreisler gave a recital yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: J. S. Bach, suite in E major; F. Bach, Grave; Couperin, Chanson Louis XIII. et Pavane; Pugnani, Prelude and Allegro; Corelli, Sarabande et Allegretto; Cartier, La Chasse; Tartini, Variations; Gluck, Melody in D minor; Schumann, Romance in A major; Mozart, Rondo, G major; Kreisler. Caprice Viennois; Paganini, Three Caprices in B flat major, B minor, A minor.

Mr. Kreisler gave delight by the art and eloquence of his playing to an audience which crowded the hall. His interpretative genius was displayed in the old-world pieces in themselves decorative, not emotional, but heightened in significance by his performance.

After the serene beauty of Bach's Grave the pieces by Couperin were played with exquisite delicacy and finesse, while there was much more in Mr. Kreisler's interpretation of Pugnani's Prelude and Allegro than mere purity of style. A remarkably effective performance of La Chasse was a feature of the concert and the violinist was generous in repeating it.

As is customary in the playing of this admirable artist, there was throughout the afternoon haunting beauty of tone, poetic phrasing, brilliance and fire. The unfeigned modesty of Mr. Kreisler's bearing, the simplicity and directness with which he expresses himself artistically are, too, irresistible.

Recalled again and again, he lengthened the program. Mr. Lamson played sympathetic accompaniments.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 7,

KREISLER TODAY

The feature of the program which Mr. Kreisler will present in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be the group of his favorite 17th and 18th century composers. It is unnecessary to inquire closely into the tradition that K ran across most of this music in an old Benedictine monastery in Austria. It is sufficient to know that by reviving this delightful music he has made of violin recitals something well worth hearing, for these old composers were melodists in the full sense of the word.

The composers thus represented will be Bach and his son, Friedmann; the Frenchmen Couperin and Cartier, and the Italians Pugnani, Corelli and Tartini. The program begins with Bach's suite in E-major, and includes also pieces by Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

GOGORZA AND RAPPOLD

The appearance here of Emilio de Gogorza, after an absence of several years, will be warmly welcomed by his many friends. Mr. Gogorza is one of the most popular singers that comes to Boston. Associated with Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, he will appear in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14. For the last two or three years Mr. de Gogorza has been living abroad and has given up almost entirely his concert work. But this winter he is again in America singing. Mme. Rappold has not been heard here since she appeared with the Symphony Orchestra last season. The program will be announced shortly.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Schumann's Concerto. Dr. Muck has put on the program two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Weingartner's "Lustpiel" overture and Richard Strauss's latest work, Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the "Lustpiel" overture was played at a concert of the Boston Opera House orchestra last year. Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new Concert Hall in Vienna last October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times. The first performance was in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra led by Mr. Oberhoffer. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 1	Beethoven
"Lustpiel" overture	Weingartner
Concerto for piano	Schumann
Festliches Praeludium	Strauss

The Symphony Orchestra returned last night from its second southern trip, which was as successful as the first. Every seat was sold for every concert and many turned away. Kreisler's performance was everywhere triumphal.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

Fritz Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. It has been necessary to change this, and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until [illegible] in the season. The [illegible] surely or-

---

From EVO. STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 4 1913

88

MUSIC LOVERS OUT TO HEAR SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Greeted By Large Crowd at the Lyric.

With Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as special soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, gave the second of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The audience was gratifyingly large, and quite properly found much to enjoy.

Beethoven's seventh symphony was played first, then Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, opus 35, for violin with orchestra, and Smetana's overture to the opera The Sold Bride. This is not a brilliant combination from the standpoint of program construction, and consequently the concert did not have particular pertinence.

Neither was the rendition of the music especially distinctive. It sounded occasionally like lax routine instead of concentrated thought, and faulty tuning of some of the instruments made tonal purity of the ensemble impossible. On the other hand, there was some exquisite soft playing, especially by the string instruments.

Kreisler played better than he did when he played the Brahms' concerto here with the same orchestra December 4 of last year. His conception of the Tschaikowsky concerto was better defined. His work has action, a good deal of style and fluency; but it is strong, convincing only when his intonation is pure. This is difficult, of course, especially in a composition containing manifold great difficulties like the Tschaikowsky concerto; but Kreisler is a great violinist, and should not have trouble with this, as do violinists of less caliber. It has been done by others. Without accurate intonation—faultless pitch—the most accomplished violinist does little more than saw his instrument, so far as the actual musical value of his work is concerned. This is a frank, candid criticism, based upon the standard of unfluctuatingly true pitch; it is not meant to detract one particle from the many conspicuous excellencies which have given Kreisler a conspicuous place among living violinists.

Among the pleasures of the evening were the second movement of the Beethoven symphony and the Smetana overture. The evolution of music does not seem to have any of the effect of the ravages of time upon the Beethoven movement. It is still a jewel which stands the acid, and every other test. The Smetanan overture is distinctive for the remarkable effect produced by rapid strings playing softly.

J. N. H.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL,

NOVEMBER 30, 1913.

be accomplished. [illegible]

OUR NATIONAL AIR.

No Reason for Rising to German National Hymn.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

In a letter to the editor of the Sunday Journal, a "music lover" objects strenuously to the rising of the audience at the last symphony concert, when Weber's Jubel Overture was played, which closes with the German anthem. He is perfectly right; but when he says that the audience rose "en masse"—he is mistaken, for there was one who had the courage of his convictions, and kept his seat, in spite of the rather unpleasant glances of the people around him, and this daring person was the writer of these lines.

When Weber composed the overture and his inspiration dictated him to finish his work with patriotic ending, he looked upon the melody as the German national hymn only, and his inspiration ought to be respected, and neither an English nor American national interpretation should be imposed upon it.

I therefore did not see the slightest reason for rising, for I have been an American citizen for the last 20 years, and the German national hymn has consequently lost its claim to my reverence. Should I hear this composition played in Germany, I should rise, with the others, partly as a matter of good manners, partly in recognition of my native country, and my love for it, a feeling that no one can ever lose, be he American, German or French, and no matter how many citizen papers he takes out.

Aside from all this, even in Germany, the true German anthem is supposed to be Deutchland, Deutchland uber Alles, (Germany, Germany above All), whose beautiful and patriotic words and sentiment are far above the one used by Weber, which addresses itself entirely to the Kaiser, totally ignoring country and people, and which, with its bombastic phraseology of no meaning whatever, smacks a good deal of Byzantism, and is woefully anachronistic from a 20th century point of view.

If I am not mistaken, the same air is also played at the close of every performance at the Providence Opera House, and the whole audience rises—to go home, and turn their backs to the musicians, surely not a mark of respect. The same feeling seems to have prevailed last Tuesday, and the ladies, who are always more practical than the men, made good use of this incident and put on their wraps and hats, and in the back rows the people immediately started to leave, instead of standing still in aweful reverence.

As far as the knowing of all the words of any national hymn is concerned, this defect might be found in all [illegible] and it is wholly immater[illegible] countries; knows all [illegible]. Neither [illegible] one

Will[illegible]

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

What if a large audience at the Symphony concert did stand by mistake(?) while the orchestra played "God Save the King?" Why should a few people who chanced to be "on the inside" and knew better make any fuss about it? It may be true that "the national air" of the United States is the "Star Spangled Banner," and we have no other recognized national air, but it will always be hard to keep people in their seats when what we know as "America" is played. It is undeniably English in origin, but are not many of us undeniably English, in our origin, and has any nation a mortgage on a fine tune? The fact is, "America" is superbly vocal, while "Star Spangled Banner" is singularly unvocal. Moreover, words count heavily in a national anthem, and the words of "America" have a tremendous hold upon the nation. "America" may be a mistake; but we are liable to remain in the error for many years to come.

PATRIA.

Providence, Nov. 25.

"SYMPHONY" PROGRAMMES.

Commiserations for a Benighted Intelligence on Parade.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal.

May I have a little space in which to answer "Musiker non Troppo"? Poor man! Doomed to hear one of the finest orchestras in the world, and unable to enjoy it because it will not play "Annie Laurie" or "Old Black Joe"! Musiker is honest, and his remarks about the cheese were really funny; but if to his dutifulness as a husband, his honesty, and his sense of humor he would add a little intellectual humility, his sufferings at the Symphony concerts might be greatly alleviated.

What does he think that orchestra represents? A money-making scheme? No. It could not exist a year in its present perfection without heavy financial backing. The fad of a few millionaires? No. They could provide the orchestra, but not the audience. Something for society to go to? No. In a neighboring city thousands of working people attend at reduced prices. Such an orchestra, composed of individual artists and headed by a master-musician, really represents the highest point of musical intelligence reached by a nation. The fact that "Musiker" and hundreds of others cannot honestly enjoy it only shows how far short the average American falls, musically speaking. Such statements as "Musiker" makes in his article, the average European, especially German, would blush to make.

The Symphony Orchestra does not play popular music for the same reason that "Musiker" does not select a dandelion when he can pick a superb rose; nor buy a rhinestone when he can as easily have a diamond, nor expect a cup of water from Niagara when he can have it from the home faucet. The simple melodies he refers to have their rightful place, but why not try to understand a more, colossal music structure?

Yes, it is true that Dvorak founded a symphony on American negro melodies, but, unless "Musiker" brushes up a little, he would better stay at home on the night it is played. If he were the least bit musical (which I am afraid he is not), he would hear dozens of little melodies as charming as his favorites, woven into the grander compositions like golden threads in a great tapestry.

If he really wanted to find out what there was in this seeming "horrific display of concatenated discord," he would talk seriously with musicians, read up a bit, or even go to a preparatory lecture, if there are any this year. Then, having obtained a little understanding of the subject matter of big compositions, if he honestly dislikes the programme, he can still say so—but intelligently.

This much "Musiker" can do. Try to enjoy the orchestra simply, a sound (he has admitted that it is rather pleasing at times). Listen for the heavenly sweetness of the violins, the richness of the 'cellos, the deep boom of the great bass viols, the plaintive piping of the oboes, the brilliance of the clarinets and the glorious crash of the brass. Melody is all right, and it is no crime to love it, but there is something more to music than melody.

If he cannot do even this, let him stay at home, play "Nancy Lee" with one finger and send his Symphony ticket to me.

HIGHBROW.

Providence, Nov. 24.

Audiences Are Sincere.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I think it is a slander on many hundreds of people to say that three-quarters of the audiences at the symphony concerts go because they think it is the "proper thing," and not because they enjoy good music, as one of your correspondents did last Sunday. Of course there are some, and there always will be. Some people go to church for the same reason. But I believe, judging by the appreciation which is shown, that the number is very small. Certainly it is not 75 per cent., and such wholesale slurs should not be allowed.

H. F. W.

Providence, Nov. 27.

A Chance for "Musiker."

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

May one suggest to your correspondent who complains because the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not play ragtime or plantation folk songs that blacksmith shops do not manufacture watches, nor do woolen factories weave fancy silks. A symphony orchestra is one kind of musical organization; a German street band is another. Your correspondent is at perfect liberty to choose the kind he prefers, but having chosen, let him not expect figs to grow from thistles or roses from skunk cabbage.

May one further suggest that a street piano, easily to be engaged by the hour or day, might furnish the kind of "music" your correspondent so earnestly desires.

[76]

ON GLOBE

DECEMBER 8.

KREISLER PLAYS IN SUPERB FASHION

His Program Features 18th Century Music.

Second Sunday Evening Concert at the Boston Opera House.

The consummate art of Fritz Kreisler brought together an audience yesterday afternoon sufficient to fill Symphony Hall to its utmost capacity despite the untoward weather. With an entire program to manipulate to his liking the great violinist had an opportunity to humor his archaic tastes to the full and to bring to light some of the gems of the old masters, moldy and dustladen upon the covers it may be, but raidant and resplendent in spirit, that may have rewarded his search among the ancient archieves of the libraries.

Mr Kreisler played music yesterday from a group of composers who dwelt upon this earth during the 17th or 18th centuries, during parts thereof or both—Friedmann Bach, Couperin, Pugnani, Corelli, Cartier, Tartini. These ancient gentlemen all would wear the opprobrious title of "classicists," according to the usual methods of cataloging, and classical music by all accepted tenets is held to be the bane of the multitudes, yet here was an audience essentially popular and general in character, that applauded the violinist tumultously at every opportunity, urging a repetitioned of one number and insisting upon that of another.

Mr Kreisler accomplishes with apparent unconcern that which the student knows to be of enormous difficulty, yet discussion of his mechanical mastery of his instrument ceased to be timely seasons ago. The violinist, now in the early noonday of his ascendency, was in excellent spirits. He chose pieces by these old masters by turn grave and gay, and made his instrument the translator of their thoughts, their smiles, their pretty conceits, their adorable artificialties, their pompous flourishes and their tears.

What could have been more exquisite than the lightness, inimitable grace and elegance of the air and stately dance of Louis XIII by Couperin? This was Louis, first violinist in the King's band, and eldest of three brothers, all musicians. Cartier's "The Hunt" is an exquisite miniature. Its composer was the son of a dancing master, which may explain his lively sense of rhythm. He also made known in Paris the old Italian masters—Corelli and Tartini—by finding time from his duties as a member of Emperor Napoleon's private band to edit revisions of their works.

They, too, were on Mr Kreisler's program. The set of variations by the latter were of surpassing brilliance, and Corelli's Sarabande showed his gift of melody.

In the second group were Gluck's Melody in D Minor, played with a noble repose, and Schumann's Romance in A Major with intimacy and tenderness. Mozart's Rondo was sparkling in its freshness. Mr Kreisler's own Caprice and three caprices by Paganini finished the program. It was an afternoon of supreme interpretation by an artist who is more than an eminent violinist.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 8, 191

KREISLER RECITAL

Fritz Kreisler, playing yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, again attracted an audience of exceptional numbers, which applauded the violinist to the echo, and remained for more long after the programme as announced had come to an end. Mr. Kreisler, as usual, played a number of pieces of old music, as arranged by him for the violin. There is perhaps no other violinist now before the public who can accomplish so much with this music of a bygone time. Mr. Kreisler's tone is so beautiful that he would win hundreds of admirers for this reason alone, even if he used this tone to less artistic purposes than that to which he consecrates it. The technical finish and the inborn taste which he always displays in interpretation are especially desirable in interpreting music by Couperin, Cartier, Pugnani or Corelli and Tartini, or even the more modern Friedmann Bach. J. S. Bach's suite in E major, and Schumann, Mozart and Paganini added other desirable and contrasting elements to the programme.

BOSTON HERALD

DECEMBER 8, 1913.

KREISLER AT SYMPHONY HALL

Violinist Pleases Crowded House with Exhibition of His Genius.

Mr. Kreisler gave a recital yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: J. S. Bach, suite in E major; F. Bach, Grave; Couperin, Chanson Louis XIII. et Pavane; Pugnani, Prelude and Allegro; Corelli, Sarabande et Allegretto; Cartier, La Chasse; Tartini, Variations; Gluck, Melody in D minor; Schumann, Romance in A major; Mozart, Rondo, G major; Kreisler. Caprice Viennois; Paganini, Three Caprices in B flat major, B minor, A minor.

Mr. Kreisler gave delight by the art and eloquence of his playing to an audience which crowded the hall. His interpretative genius was displayed in the old-world pieces in themselves decorative, not emotional, but heightened in significance by his performance.

After the serene beauty of Bach's Grave the pieces by Couperin were played with exquisite delicacy and finesse, while there was much more in Mr. Kreisler's interpretation of Pugnani's Prelude and Allegro than mere purity of style. A remarkably effective performance of La Chasse was a feature of the concert and the violinist was generous in repeating it.

As is customary in the playing of this admirable artist, there was throughout the afternoon haunting beauty of tone, poetic phrasing, brilliance and fire. The unfeigned modesty of Mr. Kreisler's bearing, the simplicity and directness with which he expresses himself artistically are, too, irresistible.

Recalled again and again, he lengthened the program. Mr. Lamson played sympathetic accompaniments.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 7.

KREISLER TODAY

The feature of the program which Mr. Kreisler will present in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be the group of his favorite 17th and 18th century composers. It is unnecessary to inquire closely into the tradition that Kreisler ran across most of this music in an old Benedictine monastery in Austria. It is sufficient to know that by reviving this delightful music he has made of violin recitals something well worth hearing, for these old composers were melodists in the full sense of the word.

The composers thus represented will be Bach and his son, Friedmann; the Frenchmen Couperin and Cartier, and the Italians Pugnani, Corelli and Tartini. The program begins with Bach's suite in E-major, and includes also pieces by Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

GOGORZA AND RAPPOLD

The appearance here of Emilio de Gogorza, after an absence of several years, will be warmly welcomed by his many friends. Mr. Gogorza is one of the most popular singers that comes to Boston. Associated with Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, he will appear in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14. For the last two or three years Mr. de Gogorza has been living abroad and has given up almost entirely his concert work. But this winter he is again in America singing. Mme. Rappold has not been heard here since she appeared with the Symphony Orchestra last season. The program will be announced shortly.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Schumann's Concerto. Dr. Muck has put on the program two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Weingartner's "Lustpiel" overture and Richard Strauss's latest work, Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the "Lustpiel" overture was played at a concert of the Boston Opera House orchestra last year. Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new Concert Hall in Vienna last October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times. The first performance was in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra led by Mr. Oberhoffer. The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 1........Beethoven
"Lustpiel" overture..................Weingartner
Concerto for piano...................Schumann
Festliches Praeludium...............Strauss

The Symphony Orchestra returned last night from its second southern trip, which was as successful as the first. Every seat was sold for every concert and many turned away. Kreisler's performance was everywhere triumphal.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

Frits Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. It has been necessary to change this, and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until later in the season. The [illegible] surely or-

---

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

DEC 4 1913

IC LOVERS OUT O HEAR SYMPHONY

88

Boston Orchestra Greeted By Large Crowd at the Lyric.

With Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as special soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, gave the second of its local concerts of the season at the Lyric last night. The audience was gratifyingly large, and quite properly found much to enjoy.

Beethoven's seventh symphony was played first, then Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, opus 35, for violin with orchestra, and Smetana's overture to the opera The Sold Bride. This is not a brilliant combination from the standpoint of program construction, and consequently the concert did not have particular pertinence.

Neither was the rendition of the music especially distinctive. It sounded occasionally like lax routine instead of concentrated thought, and faulty tuning of some of the instruments made tonal purity of the ensemble impossible. On the other hand, there was some exquisite soft playing, especially by the string instruments.

Kreisler played better than he did when he played the Brahms' concerto here with the same orchestra December 4 of last year. His conception of the Tschaikowsky concerto was better defined. His work has action, a good deal of style and fluency; but it is strong, convincing only when his intonation is pure. This is difficult, of course, especially in a composition containing manifold great difficulties like the Tschaikowsky concerto; but Kreisler is a great violinist, and should not have trouble with this, as do violinists of less caliber. It has been done by others. Without accurate intonation—faultless pitch—the most accomplished violinist does little more than saw his instrument, so far as the actual musical value of his work is concerned. This is a frank, candid criticism, based upon the standard of unfluctuatingly true pitch; it is not meant to detract one particle from the many conspicuous excellencies which have given Kreisler a conspicuous place among living violinists.

Among the pleasures of the evening were the second movement of the Beethoven symphony and the Smetana overture. The evolution of music does not seem to have any of the effect of the ravages of time upon the Beethoven movement. It is still a jewel which stands the acid, and every other test. The Smetanan overture is distinctive for the remarkable effect produced by rapid strings playing softly.

J. N. H.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL,

NOVEMBER 30, 1913.

be accomplished.

OUR NATIONAL AIR.

No Reason for Rising to German National Hymn.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

In a letter to the editor of the Sunday Journal, a "music lover" objects strenuously to the rising of the audience at the last symphony concert, when Weber's Jubel Overture was played, which closes with the German anthem. He is perfectly right; but when he says that the audience rose "en masse"—he is mistaken, for there was one who had the courage of his convictions, and kept his seat, in spite of the rather unpleasant glances of the people around him, and this daring person was the writer of these lines.

When Weber composed the overture and his inspiration dictated him to finish his work with patriotic ending, he looked upon the melody as the German national hymn only, and his inspiration ought to be respected, and neither an English nor American national interpretation should be imposed upon it.

I therefore did not see the slightest reason for rising, for I have been an American citizen for the last 20 years, and the German national hymn has consequently lost its claim to my reverence. Should I hear this composition played in Germany, I should rise, with the others, partly as a matter of good manners, partly in recognition of my native country, and my love for it, a feeling that no one can ever lose, be he American, German or French, and no matter how many citizen papers he takes out.

Aside from all this, even in Germany, the true German anthem is supposed to be Deutchland, Deutchland uber Alles, (Germany, Germany above All), whose beautiful and patriotic words and sentiment are far above the one used by Weber, which addresses itself entirely to the Kaiser, totally ignoring country and people, and which, with its bombastic phraseology of no meaning whatever, smacks a good deal of Byzantism, and is woefully anachronistic from a 20th century point of view.

If I am not mistaken, the same air is also played at the close of every performance at the Providence Opera House, and the whole audience rises—to go home, and turn their backs to the musicians, surely not a mark of respect. The same feeling seems to have prevailed last Tuesday, and the ladies, who are always more practical than the men, made good use of this incident and put on their wraps and hats, and in the back rows the people immediately started to leave, instead of standing still in aweful reverence.

As far as the knowing of all the words of any national hymn is concerned, this defect might be found in all countries; and it is wholly immater[illegible] countries; knows all [illegible]

[illegible]

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

What if a large audience at the Symphony concert did stand by mistake(?) while the orchestra played "God Save the King?" Why should a few people who chanced to be "on the inside" and knew better make any fuss about it? It may be true that "the national air" of the United States is the "Star Spangled Banner," and we have no other recognized national air, but it will always be hard to keep people in their seats when what we know as "America" is played. It is undeniably English in origin, but are not many of us undeniably English, in our origin, and has any nation a mortgage on a fine tune? The fact is, "America" is superbly vocal, while "Star Spangled Banner" is singularly unvocal. Moreover, words count heavily in a national anthem, and the words of "America" have a tremendous hold upon the nation. "America" may be a mistake; but we are liable to remain in the error for many years to come.

PATRIA.

Providence, Nov. 25.

"SYMPHONY" PROGRAMMES.

Commiserations for a Benighted Intelligence on Parade.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal.

May I have a little space in which to answer "Musiker non Troppo"? Poor man! Doomed to hear one of the finest orchestras in the world, and unable to enjoy it because it will not play "Annie Laurie" or "Old Black Joe"! Musiker is honest, and his remarks about the cheese were really funny; but if to his dutifulness as a husband, his honesty, and his sense of humor he would add a little intellectual humility, his sufferings at the Symphony concerts might be greatly alleviated.

What does he think that orchestra represents? A money-making scheme? No. It could not exist a year in its present perfection without heavy financial backing. The fad of a few millionaires? No. They could provide the orchestra, but not the audience. Something for society to go to? No. In a neighboring city thousands of working people attend at reduced prices. Such an orchestra, composed of individual artists and headed by a master-musician, really represents the highest point of musical intelligence reached by a nation. The fact that "Musiker" and hundreds of others cannot honestly enjoy it only shows how far short the average American falls, musically speaking. Such statements as "Musiker" makes in his article, the average European, especially German, would blush to make.

The Symphony Orchestra does not play popular music for the same reason that "Musiker" does not select a dandelion when he can pick a superb rose; nor buy a rhinestone when he can as easily have a diamond, nor expect a cup of water from Niagara when he can have it from the home faucet. The simple melodies he refers to have their rightful place, but why not try to understand a more colossal music structure?

Yes, it is true that Dvorak founded a symphony on American negro melodies, but, unless "Musiker" brushes up a little, he would better stay at home on the night it is played. If he were the least bit musical (which I am afraid he is not), he would hear dozens of little melodies as charming as his favorites, woven into the grander compositions like golden threads in a great tapestry.

If he really wanted to find out what there was in this seeming "horrific display of concatenated discord," he would talk seriously with musicians, read up a bit, or even go to a preparatory lecture, if there are any this year. Then, having obtained a little understanding of the subject matter of big compositions, if he honestly dislikes the programme, he can still say so—but intelligently.

This much "Musiker" can do. Try to enjoy the orchestra simply, a sound (he has admitted that it is rather pleasing at times). Listen for the heavenly sweetness of the violins, the richness of the 'cellos, the deep boom of the great bass viols, the plaintive piping of the oboes, the brilliance of the clarinets and the glorious crash of the brass. Melody is all right, and it is no crime to love it, but there is something more to music than melody.

If he cannot do even this, let him stay at home, play "Nancy Lee" with one finger and send his Symphony ticket to me.

HIGHBROW.

Providence, Nov. 24.

Audiences Are Sincere.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I think it is a slander on many hundreds of people to say that three-quarters of the audiences at the symphony concerts go because they think it is the "proper thing," and not because they enjoy good music, as one of your correspondents did last Sunday. Of course there are some, and there always will be. Some people go to church for the same reason. But I believe, judging by the appreciation which is shown, that the number is very small. Certainly it is not 75 per cent., and such wholesale slurs should not be allowed.

H. F. W.

Providence, Nov. 27.

A Chance for "Musiker."

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

May one suggest to your correspondent who complains because the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not play ragtime or plantation folk songs that blacksmith shops do not manufacture watches, nor do woolen factories weave fancy silks. A symphony orchestra is one kind of musical organization; a German street band is another. Your correspondent is at perfect liberty to choose the kind he prefers, but having chosen, let him not expect figs to grow from thistles or roses from skunk cabbage.

May one further suggest that a street piano, easily to be engaged by the hour or day, might furnish the kind of "music" your correspondent so earnestly desires.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 8 1913

Dr. Karl Muck led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon through Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Handel's concerto for strings and wind orchestras, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's concerto for violin in D, op. 61. In the latter the soloist was Fritz Kreisler. The playing of both the solo artist and the orchestra was of the very highest order, which a crowded house of music lovers enjoyed to the uttermost.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date 1913

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted their matinee yesterday to an all classic programme, which for sheer beauty cast most of the ultra-modern music of the day into outer darkness. After Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Handel's concerto in F for strings and wind, and Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Dr. Muck and his players united with Fritz Kreisler in a rendition of Beethoven's concerto for violin, which was as nearly perfect as anything mun- [illegible] possible be.

From PRESS
Address: New York
DEC 7 - 1913
Date

CONCERT OF OLD MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Kreisler as Soloist, Gives Classical Programme.

Though the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon brought forward no novelties, devoting its attention entirely to classical music ranging from Haydn to Beethoven, a large crowd listened to the musical ministrations of Dr. Muck's disciples and applauded the art of Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished soloist of the matinee.

The programme opened with old "Papa" Haydn's "Surprise" symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 6). Dr. Muck never is heard to greater advantage than in works of "ye olden times," as he showed in Gustave F. Kogel's edition of Handel's concerto for strings and wind orchestra in F major.

In Beethoven's immortal concerto for violin, which always has been one of the most admired offerings in his repertory, Fritz Kreisler confirmed the impression made at his recent recital that he has gained greatly in artistic repose and concentration.

Technically, however, the famous violinist was not in his best form. His dexterous fingers had less of their usual security and precision and his intonation left something to be desired not only in the difficult double stops of the two cadenzas, but sometimes even in simple cantilena.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date 1913

SECOND LONGY RECITAL.

New Organization Gives Another Enjoyable Concert.

That excellent new organization, the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, gave its second concert in Aeolian Hall last night. The ensemble numbers were played by fifteen members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by Mr. Georges Longy, oboist. The assisting artist was Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist, who, with Mr. J. Keller, 'cellist, played a sonata by Mr. Henry Woollett.

The last part of the programme contained a pastorale by Jean Hure and a suite, op. 103, by Emmanuel Moor. It was a thoroughly enjoyable concert and was applauded by a large audience, which seemed to revel in the playing of these rarely heard works.

Established: 1884

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date 1913

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das übliche ausverkaufte Haus bereitete den Darbietungen unſerer ſtets willkommenen Boſtoner Gäſte auch geſtern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die feſtlichſte Aufnahme. Man konnte ein klaſſiſches Program nicht allzu ſchweren Kalibers in wirklich vollendeten Darbietungen genießen. Die Haydn'ſche G-Dur Symphonie (Breitkopf & Härtel No. 6) wurde ſtiliſtiſch und klanglich unvergleichlich geſpielt, wobei mir die feinen dynamiſchen Kontraſte Muck's im „Andante" mit ihren wundervoll verhauchenden Pianiſſimi beſondere Freude bereitet haben. Das „Menuett" prangte in der ganzen altfränkiſchen Würde jenes graziöſen Geſellſchaftstanzes, der letzte Satz brachte die feinſten Farbenwirkungen.

Nach vielen Jahren hörte ich wieder das Händel'ſche F-Dur-Konzert für Streich-Orcheſter und Bläſer, das mit ſeiner reinen Harmonie athmenden Klaſſizität beſonders feierlich und gefällig wirkte. Namentlich das „Largo" haben die Heren wirklich mit erleſenem Klangreiz geſpielt, und das erſterbende Diminuendo zum Schluß war bis in die letzten Schwingungen hinein klingend. Konzertmeiſter Witek, die Oboiſten Longy und Müller und die Horniſten Wendler und Jaennecke ſpielten ein jeder ſeinen Part mit köſtlichem Ton und virtuoſer Stilreinheit.

Nach der von Dr. Muck vollendet dirigirten Mozart'ſchen Ouverture zu „~~Figaro's Hochzeit~~" Zauberflöte ſpielte Herr Fritz Kreisler das Beethoven'ſche Violinkonzert mit höchſter Meiſterſchaft. Man konnte eine Fuſion bewundern, die ungeachtet der Brillanz der Kreisler'ſchen Kadenzen alles Virtuoſenhafte feinſinnig ausſchloß. Anfangs ſchien der große Künſtler gelegentlich vom Pfade reiner Intonation abzuweichen, aber bald hatte er ſich vollſtändig gefunden, ſo daß er durch eine mannhafte, durchgeiſtigte und ſpielend virtuoſe Leiſtung entzücken konnte. Ganz beſonders wird mir das von ſeinem feinen Humor durchſonnte „Rondo" gerühmt, das ich nicht mehr hören konnte. Der Künſtler wurde gefeiert wie ein erleſener Liebling, und Dr. Muck und ſein Orcheſter wurden gleichfalls in aller Form mit Beifall überſchüttet.

H.

York, 1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date

Concert Reviews of the Past Week.

GUSTAV MAHLER was a great musician, and his skill as a conductor will long be gratefully remembered by those of the community who kept abreast of the musical times. His ability as a composer, however, is not likely to go down to posterity. Last Thursday evening, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, played Mahler's fifth symphony, and though the achievement was an amazing bit of orchestral virtuosity, the work itself left the hearers cold at the end and caused no little discomfort because of the extreme length—one hour and twenty minutes.

Called "The Giant Symphony," there is nothing in either originality or spontaneity which impresses as justifying such a title. Composed of five movements, there are portions of two only in which there are measures grateful to the cultivated ear. Unquestionably, the adagietto is the most musical section of the symphony, which is reminiscent of Wagner, Berlioz, Saint-Saens and other musicians. Viewed from the stand point of musicianship, there can be no doubt that this symphony is entitled to respect, but its academic qualities are those alone which are valuable.

It was fortunate that relief was afforded the Thursday night audience in the presentation, after the Mahler work, of Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler appearing as the soloist. He played with purity and sensuous beauty of tone, strict adherence to rhythm, broad style and facility of technic that made one forget that such a thing is necessary in violin playing.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Modern and Ultra-Modern Numbers in Programme at Academy of Music.

Dr. Muck makes his Boston Symphony programmes on the principle of harmonies rather than of contrast. As his first programme was classical, that for his second concert at the Academy last evening was modern and ultra-modern. It began with the music of day after tomorrow—cynical people say of the morning after—by a Frenchman named Florent Schmitt, and progressed crab-wise to an overture by Dvorak as old as 1883. Last night the Dvorak music fell very gratefully on some confused ears, roused the great audience to high enthusiasm and sent people home happy.

But let us begin with the French, M. Schmitt. He is one of a long procession of better men than Herod whom Salome has bedeviled with her dancing and the visions of the dramatic representation of it. Sudermann wrote a play which turns on that dance of the seven veils, Strauss wrote something that he calls music for Oscar Wilde's play on the same theme, and the Frenchman Robert d'Humieres wrote a pantomime on Salome in which Loie Fuller played the central figure and gave some wonderful incidental dances. For that pantomime Florent Schmitt wrote the music, and this score, enlarged to the scope of a great orchestra, was what Brooklyn heard for the first time last night.

It has the defect of all programme music, that unless you can fit the programme accurately into the score—which requires more preparation than most concert-goers give before they get to the hall—you get lost in the mazes and feel, properly, that you are entitled to dramatic action to guide you through the story. Wagner used to protest furiously against the use of his music in concert form, because he declared that it was impossible to follow it without text and action. But his music is so much more vital than the dramas which it illustrates that it has triumphed over the divorce.

The Schmitt music has no such tremendous grip. The strongest impression it creates is of its kinship with Strauss. But Strauss triumphs by sheer audacity in presenting the impossible, and when he dealt with "Salome" in this city he had an excellent dramatic performance on the stage, with Mary Garden as the hussy dancer, and that helped a whole lot. M. Schmitt, though he is more musical than Strauss, is less audacious and he achieves merely a score of extreme picturesqueness instead of something which you think must be genius because it is so far "beyond the beyonst," as the Irish put it. He evokes in his prelude an atmosphere of mystery and melancholy, which is the proper setting for the horrible drama, and thereafter he has passages of a strange, haunting beauty, notably the horn call representing the voice from the sea which paralyzes Herod. It ought to. And throughout, the composer shows great skill in making the most of the resources of the modern orchestra. The use of the harp to mark the rhythm in a passage which the clarinets lead, the treatment of the voodwinds throughout, especially the boe, the dance rhythms, which give a 'elcome contrast to the general murki- ess, and the majestic entrance of the rass at the crisis of the tragedy are ever and effective; but the music needs point of focus, such as it would have lth stage pictures of the catyclysm and th Loie Fuller doing the dances. Without such a magnet of cohesion it is curious and interesting for once in a while, but hardly likely to hold a prominent place even in the programmes of revolutionary modern music.

The "Salome" was followed by the great Tschaikowsky "Concerto for Violin," with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. Only a few years ago this composition was modern, and when Maude Powell introduced it to New York she was credited with a revolutionary achievement, but last night it sounded delightfully old-fashioned and restful. So easily does Kreisler surmount its stupendous difficulties that you are lulled into thinking how fine it is and not how hard it is—which is the ultimate triumph possible to the most perfect technique. The lovely second movement especially was good to hear. Not the least effect of the cadenza which Kreisler played was the evident enjoyment which the violinists in the orchestra took in it. Kreisler frankly enjoyed the enthusiasm which his playing evoked, and the tribute of the musicians must have been the pleasantest part of his triumph.

Then came the patriotic overture by Dvorak, an old-fashioned fellow who did not find it necessary to write in two keys at once in order to thrill his hearers. It is the good red-blooded simple music for which one seldom looks to Dvorak in vain, and it set its auditors firmly on their feet on warm, solid earth after their bath in a sea of terrors.

Established: 1884

[77]

HILL, 81 Market square.
ERRACE PLAT possesses ad

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date DEC 8 1913

Dr. Karl Muck led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon through Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Handel's concerto for strings and wind orchestras, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's concerto for violin in D, op. 61. In the latter the soloist was Fritz Kreisler. The playing of both the solo artist and the orchestra was of the very highest order, which a crowded house of music lovers enjoyed to the uttermost.

Esta 884
ishe

---

rom EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress: New York
ate 1913

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted their matinee yesterday to an all classic programme, which for sheer beauty cast most of the ultra-modern music of the day into outer darkness. After Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Handel's concerto in F for strings and wind, and Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Dr. Muck and his players united with Fritz Kreisler in a rendition of Beethoven's concerto for violin, which was as nearly perfect as anything mundane could possibly be.

ablis

---

ew York DEC 7 - 1913
te
Established:

CONCERT OF OLD MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Kreisler as Soloist, Gives Classical Programme.

Though the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon brought forward no novelties, devoting its attention entirely to classical music ranging from Haydn to Beethoven, a large crowd listened to the musical ministrations of Dr. Muck's disciples and applauded the art of Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished soloist of the matinee.

The programme opened with old "Papa" Haydn's "Surprise" symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 6). Dr. Muck never is heard to greater advantage than in works of "ye olden times," as he showed in Gustave F. Kogel's edition of Handel's concerto for strings and wind orchestra in F major.

In Beethoven's immortal concerto for violin, which always has been one of the most admired offerings in his repertory, Fritz Kreisler confirmed the impression made at his recent recital that he has gained greatly in artistic repose and concentration.

Technically, however, the famous violinist was not in his best form. His dexterous fingers had less of their usual security and precision and his intonation left something to be desired not only in the difficult double stops of the two cadenzas, but sometimes even in simple cantilena.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date 1913
E 1884

SECOND LONGY RECITAL.

New Organization Gives Another Enjoyable Concert.

That excellent new organization, the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, gave its second concert in Aeolian Hall last night. The ensemble numbers were played by fifteen members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by Mr. Georges Longy, oboist. The assisting artist was Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist, who, with Mr. J. Keller, 'cellist, played a sonata by Mr. Henry Woollett.

The last part of the programme contained a pastorale by Jean Hure and a suite, op. 103, by Emmanuel Moor. It was a thoroughly enjoyable concert and was applauded by a large audience, which seemed to revel in the playing of these rarely heard works.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City. 191
Date
ork, 1884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das übliche ausverkaufte Haus bereitete den Darbietungen unſerer ſtets willkommenen Boſtoner Gäſte auch geſtern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die feſtlichſte Aufnahme. Man konnte ein klaſſiſches Program nicht allzu ſchweren Kalibers in wirklich vollendeten Darbietungen genießen. Die Haydn'ſche G-Dur Symphonie (Breitkopf & Härtel No. 6) wurde ſtiliſtiſch und klanglich unvergleichlich geſpielt, wobei mir die feinen dynamiſchen Kontraſte Muck's im „Andante" mit ihren wundervoll verhauchenden Pianiſſimi beſondere Freude bereitet haben. Das „Menuett" prangte in der ganzen altfränkiſchen Würde jenes graziöſen Geſellſchaftstanzes, der letzte Satz brachte die feinſten Farbenwirkungen.

Nach vielen Jahren hörte ich wieder das Händel'ſche F-Dur-Konzert für Streich-Orcheſter und Bläſer, das mit ſeiner reinen Harmonie athmenden Klaſſizität beſonders feierlich und gefällig wirkte. Namentlich das „Largo" haben die Heren wirklich mit erleſenem Klangreiz geſpielt, und das erſterbende Diminuendo zum Schluß war bis in die letzten Schwingungen hinein klingend. Konzertmeiſter Witek, die Oboiſten Longy und Müller und die Horniſten Wendler und Jaennecke ſpielten ein jeder ſeinen Part mit köſtlichem Ton und virtuoſer Stilreinheit.

Nach der von Dr. Muck vollendet dirigirten Mozart'ſchen Ouverture zu „~~Figaro's Hochzeit~~" Zauberflöte ſpielte Herr Fritz Kreisler das Beethoven'ſche Violinkonzert mit höchſter Meiſterſchaft. Man konnte eine Fuſion bewundern, die ungeachtet der Brillanz der Kreisler'ſchen Kadenzen alles Virtuoſenhafte feinſinnig ausſchloß. Anfangs ſchien der große Künſtler gelegentlich vom Pfade reiner Intonation abzuweichen, aber bald hatte er ſich vollſtändig gefunden, ſo daß er durch eine mannhafte, durchgeiſtigte und ſpielend virtuoſe Leiſtung entzücken konnte. Ganz beſonders wird mir das von ſeinem feinen Humor durchſonnte „Rondo" gerühmt, das ich nicht mehr hören konnte. Der Künſtler wurde gefeiert wie ein erleſener Liebling, und Dr. Muck und ſein Orcheſter wurden gleichfalls in aller Form mit Beifall überſchüttet.

H.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date
Establi

Concert Reviews of the Past Week.

GUSTAV MAHLER was a great musician, and his skill as conductor will long be gratefully remembered by those of the community who kept abreast of the musical times. His ability as a composer, however, is not likely to go down to posterity. Last Thursday evening, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, played Mahler's fifth symphony, and though the achievement was an amazing bit of orchestral virtuosity, the work itself left the hearers cold at the end and caused no little discomfort because of the extreme length—one hour and twenty minutes.

Called "The Giant Symphony," there is nothing in either originality or spontaneity which impresses as justifying such a title. Composed of five movements, there are portions of two only in which there are measures grateful to the cultivated ear. Unquestionably, the adagietto is the most musical section of the symphony, which is reminiscent of Wagner, Berlioz, Saint-Saens and other musicians. Viewed from the standpoint of musicianship, there can be no doubt that this symphony is entitled to respect, but its academic qualities are those alone which are valuable.

It was fortunate that relief was afforded the Thursday night audience in the presentation, after the Mahler work, of Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin and orchestra, with Fritz Kreisler appearing as the soloist. He played with purity and sensuous beauty of tone, strict adherence to rhythm, broad style and facility of technic that made one forget that such a thing is necessary in violin playing.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date
Est 884

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Modern and Ultra-Modern Numbers in Programme at Academy of Music.

Dr. Muck makes his Boston Symphony programmes on the principle of harmonies rather than of contrast. As his first programme was classical, that for his second concert at the Academy last evening was modern and ultra-modern. It began with the music of day after tomorrow—cynical people say of the morning after—by a Frenchman named Florent Schmitt, and progressed crab-wise to an overture by Dvorak as old as 1883. Last night the Dvorak music fell very gratefully on some confused ears, roused the great audience to high enthusiasm and sent people home happy.

But let us begin with the French, M. Schmitt. He is one of a long procession of better men than Herod whom Salome has bedeviled with her dancing and the visions of the dramatic representation of it. Sudermann wrote a play which turns on that dance of the seven veils, Strauss wrote something that he calls music for Oscar Wilde's play on the same theme, and the Frenchman Robert d'Humieres wrote a pantomime on Salome in which Loie Fuller played the central figure and gave some wonderful incidental dances. For that pantomime Florent Schmitt wrote the music, and this score, enlarged to the scope of a great orchestra, was what Brooklyn heard for the first time last night.

It has the defect of all programme music, that unless you can fit the programme accurately into the score—which requires more preparation than most concert-goers give before they get to the hall—you get lost in the mazes and feel, properly, that you are entitled to dramatic action to guide you through the story. Wagner used to protest furiously against the use of his music in concert form, because he declared that it was impossible to follow it without text and action. But his music is so much more vital than the dramas which it illustrates that it has triumphed over the divorce.

The Schmitt music has no such tremendous grip. The strongest impression it creates is of its kinship with Strauss. But Strauss triumphs by sheer audacity in presenting the impossible, and when he dealt with "Salome" in this city he had an excellent dramatic performance on the stage, with Mary Garden as the hussy dancer, and that helped a whole lot. M. Schmitt, though he is more musical than Strauss, is less audacious and he achieves merely a score of extreme picturesqueness instead of something which you think must be genius because it is so far "beyond the beyonst," as the Irish put it. He evokes in his prelude an atmosphere of mystery and melancholy, which is the proper setting for the horrible drama, and thereafter he has passages of a strange, haunting beauty, notably the horn call representing the voice from the sea which paralyzes Herod. It ought to. And throughout, the composer shows great skill in making the most of the resources of the modern orchestra. The use of the harp to mark the rhythm in a passage which the clarinets lead, the treatment of the woodwinds throughout, especially the oboe, the dance rhythms, which give a welcome contrast to the general murkiness, and the majestic entrance of the brass at the crisis of the tragedy are clever and effective; but the music needs a point of focus, such as it would have with stage pictures of the cataclysm and with Loie Fuller doing the dances. Without such a magnet of cohesion it is curious and interesting for once in a while, but hardly likely to hold a prominent place even in the programmes of revolutionary modern music.

The "Salome" was followed by the great Tschaikowsky "Concerto for Violin," with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. Only a few years ago this composition was modern, and when Maude Powell introduced it to New York she was credited with a revolutionary achievement, but last night it sounded delightfully old-fashioned and restful. So easily does Kreisler surmount its stupendous difficulties that you are lulled into thinking how fine it is and not how hard it is—which is the ultimate triumph possible to the most perfect technique. The lovely second movement especially was good to hear. Not the least effect of the cadenza which Kreisler played was the evident enjoyment which the violinists in the orchestra took in it. Kreisler frankly enjoyed the enthusiasm which his playing evoked, and the tribute of the musicians must have been the pleasantest part of his triumph.

Then came the patriotic overture by Dvorak, an old-fashioned fellow who did not find it necessary to write in two keys at once in order to thrill his hearers. It is the good red-blooded simple music for which one seldom looks to Dvorak in vain, and it set its auditors firmly on their feet on warm, solid earth after their bath in a sea of terrors.

[77]

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

Dr. Muck's Men and Mr. Kreisler Play Excellently

Masterly Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—Whole Programme Classical.

Contrary to last Thursday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the programme was devoted to music by modern composers, yesterday afternoon's programme was devoted entirely to classics. It was given in Carnegie Hall, which was crowded.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, again chose the old device of letting the concert end with a concerto. This was Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Mr. Fritz Kreisler. It was a masterly performance of a masterpiece by a master. The great violinist's noble tone never has been heard to better advantage than in the larghetto, nor has he ever shown more nobility of interpretation than in the opening movement, and the final allegro was contagious in its rollicking mood. Mr. Kreisler played his own cadenzas in the concerto. They are daring feats technically, but completely in the spirit of the work.

Dr. Muck conducted an ideal accompaniment, and he also led his men through a series of interpretations of the classics that will stand as models of clarity and beauty. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony was played with an Old World grace that was admirable. And when, in the andante movement, there came the fortissimo crash, it startled every one, just as Haydn had intended that it should do and because of which he called it the "Surprise" symphony.

Then came the Händel concerto for strings and wind orchestra. The solo parts were played by Messrs. Witek, Longy, Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke so exquisitely that at its close Dr. Muck made the artists stand up and receive the applause. The last orchestral number was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," in which the virtuosity of the body of players was remarkably set forth.

At the close of the concert the audience remained to applaud Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra, and then went away, most of it humming simple, eighteenth century tunes.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Classical Programme with Mr. Fritz Kreisler Again as Soloist.

Dr. Muck went to the other extreme in making the programme for yesterday's afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His numbers bore the most approved classical names of Haydn, Handel, and Mozart. In addition, Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, changed his selection, which had originally been of concertos by Mozart and Viotti, to Beethoven's concerto, at the request of some who were to listen to him. No doubt most were content with the change, though Mr. Kreisler has many times played Beethoven's concerto here. He has rarely, perhaps never, played it with greater nobility, warmth, and eloquence than he did yesterday, and never have the cantabile passages of the first movement and of the larghetto been set forth with more appealing tenderness, tugging harder at the heartstrings. Though there were moments, especially at the beginning, when his intonation was not wholly perfect.

Mr. Kreisler soon gained a completer control of the mechanism of his technique. His playing of this concerto has now, on the whole, finer and deeper qualities than ever before. No wonder that it profoundly impressed the audience. The cadenzas that he played—appropriate and interesting in their development of themes of the movements themselves—were Mr. Kreisler's own.

The first orchestral number was Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, most mellifluously played, with spirit and refinement. There was a concerto grosso by Handel, in F major, for strings and two wind orchestras, in the arrangement of Gustav F. Kogel; a splendid and stately piece, comprising five of the nine movements originally constituting the concerto. Mr. Kogel in his arrangement of this music for modern performance has no doubt filled out the harmony to obtain greater sonority and transferred to orchestral instruments the part for the "continuo," indispensable in every orchestral score of Handel's time. The "concerto" as it now stands consists of two oboes, two horns, and violin, of which the last named has much the least to do. The playing of the pair of oboes, by Messrs. Longy and Müller, and of the pair of horns, by Messrs. Wendler and Jännicke, in numerous passages that they have together, was a delight to listen to. The overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute," was brilliantly played. Deserving more than a passing mention was the exquisitely finished and balanced accompaniment to the concerto.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
DEC 7 1913
Date

LONGY PLAYERS HEARD.

Give an Interesting Concert of Modern Chamber Music.

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society gave its second concert in Aeolian Hall last night with results as interesting as those of the first appearance of the organization. The programme included a new Suite by Emmanuel Moor for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, two violins, viola, 'cello and bass; a Sonata for 'cello and piano by Henry Woollett, and a Pastorale by Jean Hure for three flutes, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and piano. Perhaps it is unnecessary by this time to say that the fifteen members of the ensemble are players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Carolyn Beebe, pianist, assisted the organization.

The suite by Emmanuel Moor proved to be interesting music of the type that does not pretend to be profound. It was graceful and entertaining, and the audience, which was of fair size, manifested considerable pleasure in it. Mr. Woollett's sonata did not earn the same verdict. It is "modern" music in the unpleasant sense of that term, when it is used to describe affected harmonization, bizarre effects at the expense of sustained development, and altogether the feeling that the composer took many pages of his random sketch book and joined them together with a few bars, without woryying much, abou tho w the separate ideas fitted each other or the tonality they happened to be in. At the same time a word of thanks must be given any organization that will attempt nwe music conscientiously, and if the result does not seem all that could be desired, it should simply be wished better luck next time.

The last number of the programme was again well received, and the total effect of the evening was that something worth while and interesting had been done in an entirely satisfying manner.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date DEC 7 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Haydn, Handel, Mozart and Beethoven Furnish Matinee Programme.

The second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Haydn's G major symphony, Handel's concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and the Beethoven violin concerto. In the last Fritz Kreisler was heard, while the soloists in the Handel number were Anton Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns.

The Handel composition is one which used to slumber in the pages of a volume called "Sketches" contained in the royal collection in England. It comprised nine movements, of which Gustav Kogel, editor of the version heard yesterday, used five. The first of these is an overture in the French form, and the others are of alternate characters as they succeed. The brilliant and erudite annotator of the Boston Symphony programmes, Philip Hale, says:

"The original is full of Handelian mannerisms, and students of the organ concertos will here and there recognize familiar passages. The instrumentation is often of an antiphonal character; the different wind choirs answer the strings, and vice versa. In his method of dividing the orchestra into separate and distinct families Handel anticipated in a measure the processes of modern masters of instrumentation."

Wonder that no one cares to write in the form of the concerto for several instruments after the manner of Bach or Handel has often been expressed here. With the additions of modern harmony and the resources of modern instrumentation marvels might be accomplished. It is hardly necessary to add that the concerto was excellently played yesterday. Nor is there any pressing need of a long story of Mr. Kreisler's performance of the composition of Beethoven. He has played it here often, and he always plays it with breadth and depth.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kreisler Soloist in a Wonderfully Played Programme.

The second in a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Acedemy, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the assisting artist.

The concert was remarkably short, taking up little more than an hour and a half, but this was atoned for by the quality of the music and the exquisite rendition which aroused the large audience to prolonged applause.

The opening orchestral number was "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, given for the first time in Brooklyn—a gripping, soul-stirring composition that tells the story of the tragedy in a marvellous and compelling way.

Tschaikowsky's concerto in D minor for violin, op. 35, was Mr. Kreisler's contribution for the evening, familiar to all [illegible]

[illegible] by the artist, the finale, allegro vivacissimo, being wonderfully executed and exciting such enthusiasm that it was hard to maintain the rule of no encores.

The overture, "Husitska," op. 67, by Dvorak, was the closing number, and the [illegible] rendering of this exquisite work completed an evening of rare musical enjoyment.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 7 - 1913

CLASSICS AT A MATINE

Beautiful Playing by Kreis and Boston Symphony.

When the infrequent visits of the Bos Symphony Orchestra to New York h afforded an evening of classic calm, Muck and his men often depart two d later hurling thunders of the modern d pots of din. Sometimes they reverse t order, putting forward the more radic propaganda, as on Thursday night th did in a symphony of Mahler.

The balance is speedily restored by Saturday matinee such as yesterday's Carnegie Hall, devoted to the ancient and honorable company of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Familiarity has affected the psychologic element of suspense in Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, but not the music, which was beautifully played. Still more was appreciation stirred by a concerto of Handel for strings and wind, with solo parts for Messrs. Witek, Longy and Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke. One descending scale of Longy's oboe was as thrilling as if played by any virtuoso star, instead of coming from the personnel of the band.

The concert was to have ended with an overture of Weber and violin concertos of Mozart and Viotti for Mr. Fritz Kreisler. Not Kreisler, but the audience, changed all that. A large number of letter writers to soloist and conductor had begged for the Beethoven concerto, which was accordingly played. It was preceded by the Mozart overture to "The Magic Flute," heard on a recent Saturday at the opera. The concert audience could not miss the dramatic hint of the triple trumpet call.

After an intermission Mr. Kreisler was heartily welcomed. The demonstration was repeated after both the free solo passages in the first and third parts of Beethoven's music, with which this player had astonished a Bostonian Thursday right audience last year. The intervening larghetto was a thing of heavenly beauty as accompanied by the orchestra yesterday.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

Fritz Kreisler, Soloist, Achieves Great Triumph—New Composition Played.

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Brooklyn season, which was heard last night in the Academy of Music, Dr. Muck offered "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, a composition heard for the first time in this borough, and Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Any programme in which the master violinist of his period appears assumes at once distinction and importance. Further interest naturally attaches to the presentation of a musical novelty.

This descriptive orchestral music, a suite in two parts, was written for "La Tragedie de Salome," a mimodrame in two acts and seven scenes, by Robert d'Humieres, performed for the first time in Paris in 1907, although not in its present form, which amplified, elaborated and arranged for concert use was first performed at a Concert Colonne in 1911.

The composition, essentially and specifically modern of the modern, while written in the idiom of Debussy and his school, reveals no less positively the influence of the great classic composers. There are not lacking lyric moments in the work in contrast with dinamic effects of almost startling vehemence and executive orchestration. The work reveals genuine creative power and variety. With the outline of the mute drama in the foreground of the mind, it is not difficult to find the composition descriptive. It offers interesting combinations of instruments and orchestration. Salome's several dances, as they enter into the work, are seductively Oriental, the climaxes, notably that of the finale, are striking.

Whether the reception accorded the completion of the number was for the work itself, for the wonderful playing of the orchestra or a personal tribute to Dr. Muck, it is not easy to decide. The first number was received in complete silence upon the part of the large audience. The applause at the finish was difficult to analyze.

Not so that accorded Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major, op. 35. It was a performance of great brilliancy, a revelation of artistry in superlative degree. Such clarity of high notes, such cello-like warmth and opulence of low tones, such balance between the extremes of a too great intellectuality and excessive sentiment are matters to be grateful for. The consonetta was especially lovely. The rendition of the finale, a magnificent exposition of the vertuosic qualities, exacted a sympathetic responsiveness to the composer's moods. It was a performance to be recorded. Brilliant also was the orchestra's share. Mr. Kreisler, whose appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge a perfect tumult of demonstration. Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," completed the programme.

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTONIANS PLAY NINETY MINUTES

Briefest Programme Featured by Ultra-Modern Piece of Discords and Harshness.

"SALOME" WIERD "PAINTING"

Kreisler the Soloist in Tschaikowsky Concerto.

A scant hour and a half of Boston symphony orchestra playing was heard by Brooklyn's subscribers, again filling the Opera House at the second concert of the season in the Academy of Music. Brief as was the programme, it was one of startling contrast. A violent assault upon tradition and commonplace, in which canons and forms as the public knows them were shattered and outraged in every conceivable way, was followed directly by a honey-sweet familiar concerto of the [illegible] and popular style, the solo part played by no less an exponent of the fascination of musical grace than Fritz Kreisler, the Bohemian violinist. The audience was bewildered and stirred by the former and was charmed and pleased by the latter.

The reception accorded to these divergent styles of composition left no doubt as to their comparative popularity. The visits of the Bostonians to Brooklyn are assuming more and more the aspect of social events. In this respect they rank second only to the Saturday night Metropolitan opera. As such the auditors last night were in most cases impatient at the ultra-modern tone-painting and applauded perfunctorily at its close. The climax of the concerto occasioned a tumult of approval, bringing the soldier-violinist back to the footlights eight or nine times.

The novelty was Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome." This was its first performance in Brooklyn, following only a week after its initial production in the United States. In harshness and discord it outdoes Strauss by many a mile; for wierdness of effects it puts to shame the oddest imaginings of Debussy. The full strength of the orchestra is required for its curious exaggeration of tone-depicting, especial reliance being placed upon muted brasses, cymbals and the upper reaches of the harp.

It is of course the familiar story of Salome and the bloody head of the saint that is being enacted in this orgy of orchestral imagery. The Oriental effect is easily recognizable; in fact is amazing in its realism. The poem starts quietly with a dialogue of woodwind motives, and the harp, which seemingly acts as punctuation throughout the story, is introduced early. On comes the dance, its rhythm being unmistakable. Discord is piled on ear-splitting discord. The regiment of muted brasses appear to differ unanimously as to the key. The gentleman who plays the largest tuba had apparently stuffed his overcoat into the horn to produce the raucous effect; whatever it was it protruded twelve inches or so from the top of the bell. The quaintest of all the combinations is a pizzicato accompaniment of all the bass-viols to a droning passage on the bassoons.

Thirty-seven minutes it lasted. It was creepy and fantastic and as different from anything heard before as could be imagined. And yet there were phrases of exquisite beauty. One of these was for the wood-wind in harmony; another was a solo melody for the cellos; still a third was a Wagnerian harmony of the heaviest brasses, which, however, lost no time in resolving itself into utter riot. Mr. Schmitt, of Paris, evidently knows orchestral coloring, and he certainly has devised new and effective combinations of instruments, but the question arises: who is to know, who is to be the judge if the thing is played entirely wrong? How different would that brass passage in the first movement sound if played backwards?

To go from Schmitt to Tschaikowsky was like leaving a clinic at the insane asylum to pass directly into the home of a tried and true friend, there to be regaled with stories of one's companions of long ago. If it did seem to possess a certain sameness, a cloying sweetness, by reason of the contrast, it was sameness and sweetness of the sort one associates with his [illegible]

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date ,DEC

Dr. Muck's Men and Mr. Kreisler Play Excellently

rk, 1884

[illegible]erly Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—Whole Programme Classical.

[illegible] to last Thursday's concert of [illegible]n Symphony Orchestra, when the [illegible]e was devoted to music by modern composers, yesterday afternoon's programme was devoted entirely to classics. It was given in Carnegie Hall, which was crowded.

[illegible] Karl Muck, conductor, again chose the device of letting the concert end with a concerto. This was Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Mr. Fritz Kreisler. It was a masterly performance of a masterpiece by a master. The great violinist's noble tone never has been heard to better advantage than in the larghetto, nor has he ever shown more nobility of interpretation than in the opening movement, and the final allegro was contagious in its rollicking mood. Mr. Kreisler played his own cadenzas in the concerto. They are daring feats technically, but completely in the spirit of the work.

Dr. Muck conducted an ideal accompaniment, and he also led his men through a series of interpretations of the classics that will stand as models of clarity and beauty. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony was played with an Old World grace that was admirable. And when, in the andante movement, there came the fortissimo crash, it startled every one, just as Haydn had intended that it should do and because of which he called it the "Surprise" symphony.

Then came the Händel concerto for strings and wind orchestra. The solo parts were played by Messrs. Witek, Longy, Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke so exquisitely that at its close Dr. Muck made the artists stand up and receive the applause. The last orchestral number was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," in which the virtuosity of the body of players was remarkably set forth.

At the close of the concert the audience remained to applaud Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra, and then went away, most of it humming simple, eighteenth century tunes.

From TIMES

Address: New York City

Date DEC 7 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Classical Programme with Mr. Fritz Kreisler Again as Soloist.

Establish

Dr. Muck went to the other extreme in making the programme for yesterday's afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His numbers bore the most approved classical names of Haydn, Handel, and Mozart. In addition, Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, changed his selection, which had originally been of concertos by Mozart and Viotti, to Beethoven's concerto, at the request of some who were to listen to him. No doubt most were content with the change, though Mr. Kreisler has many times played Beethoven's concerto here. He has rarely, perhaps never, played it with greater nobility, warmth, and eloquence than he did yesterday, and never have the cantabile passages of the first movement and of the larghetto been set forth with more appealing tenderness, tugging harder at the heartstrings. Though there were moments, especially at the beginning, when his intonation was not wholly perfect.

Mr. Kreisler soon gained a completer control of the mechanism of his technique. His playing of this concerto has now, on the whole, finer and deeper qualities than ever before. No wonder that it profoundly impressed the audience. The cadenzas that he played—appropriate and interesting in their development of themes of the movements themselves—were Mr. Kreisler's own.

The first orchestral number was Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, most mellifluously played, with spirit and refinement. There was a concerto grosso by Handel, in F major, for strings and two wind orchestras, in the arrangement of Gustav F. Kogel; a splendid and stately piece, comprising five of the nine movements originally constituting the concerto. Mr. Kogel in his arrangement of this music for modern performance has no doubt filled out the harmony to obtain greater sonority and transferred to orchestral instruments the part for the "continuo," indispensable in every orchestral score of Handel's time. The "concerto" as it now stands consists of two oboes, two horns, and violin, of which the last named has much the least to do. The playing of the pair of oboes by Messrs. Longy and Müller, and of the pair of horns, by Messrs. Wendler and Jännicke, in numerous passages that they have together, was a delight to listen to. The overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute," was brilliantly played. Deserving more than a passing mention was the exquisitely finished and balanced accompaniment to the concerto.

From TIMES

Address: New York City

DEC 7 1913

LONGY PLAYERS HEARD.

Give an Interesting Concert of Modern Chamber Music.

1884

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society gave its second concert in Aeolian Hall last night with results as interesting as those of the first appearance of the organization. The programme included a new Suite by Emmanuel Moor for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, two violins, viola, 'cello and bass; a Sonata for 'cello and piano by Henry Woollett, and a Pastorale by Jean Hure for three flutes, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and piano. Perhaps it is unnecessary by this time to say that the fifteen members of the ensemble are players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Carolyn Beebe, pianist, assisted the organization.

The suite by Emmanuel Moor proved to be interesting music of the type that does not pretend to be profound. It was graceful and entertaining, and the audience, which was of fair size, manifested considerable pleasure in it. Mr. Woollett's sonata did not earn the same verdict. It is "modern" music in the unpleasant sense of that term, when it is used to describe affected harmonization, bizarre effects at the expense of sustained development, and altogether the feeling that the composer took many pages of his random sketch book and joined them together with a few bars, without woryying much abou tho w the separate ideas fitted each other or the tonality they happened to be in. At the same time a word of thanks must be given any organization that will attempt nwe music conscientiously, and if the result does not seem all that could be desired, it should simply be wished better luck next time.

The last number of the programme was again well received, and the total effect of the evening was that something worth while and interesting had been done in an entirely satisfying manner.

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date DEC 7 1913

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Haydn, Handel, Mozart and Beethoven Furnish Matinee Programme.

Es 1884

The second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Haydn's G major symphony, Handel's concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and the Beethoven violin concerto. In the last Fritz Kreisler was heard, while the soloists in the Handel number were Anton Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns.

The Handel composition is one which used to slumber in the pages of a volume called "Sketches" contained in the royal collection in England. It comprised nine movements, of which Gustav Kogel, editor of the version heard yesterday, used five. The first of these is an overture in the French form, and the others are of alternate characters as they succeed. The brilliant and erudite annotator of the Boston Symphony programmes, Philip Hale, says:

"The original is full of Handelian mannerisms, and students of the organ concertos will here and there recognize familiar passages. The instrumentation is often of an antiphonal character; the different wind choirs answer the strings, and vice versa. In his method of dividing the orchestra into separate and distinct families Handel anticipated in a measure the processes of modern masters of instrumentation."

Wonder that no one cares to write in the form of the concerto for several instruments after the manner of Bach or Handel has often been expressed here. With the additions of modern harmony and the resources of modern instrumentation marvels might be accomplished. It is hardly necessary to add that the concerto was excellently played yesterday. Nor is there any pressing need of a long story of Mr. Kreisler's performance of the composition of Beethoven. He has played it here often, and he always plays it with breadth and depth.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kreisler Soloist in a Wonderfully Played Programme.

1884

The second in a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Acedemy, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the assisting artist.

The concert was remarkably short, taking up little more than an hour and a half, but this was atoned for by the quality of the music and the exquisite rendition which aroused the large audience to prolonged applause.

The opening orchestral number was "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, given for the first time in Brooklyn—a gripping, soul-stirring composition that tells the story of the tragedy in a marvellous and compelling way.

Tschaikowsky's concerto in D minor for violin, op. 35, was Mr. Kreisler's contribution for the evening, familiar to all [illegible]

[illegible] and [illegible] throughout by the artist, the finale, allegro vivacissimo, being wonderfully executed and exciting such enthusiasm that it was hard to maintain the rule of no encores.

The overture, "Husitska," op. 67, by Dvorak, was the closing number, and the [illegible] rendering of this exquisite work completed an evening of rare musical enjoyment.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date DEC 7 - 1913

CLASSICS AT A MATINEE

Beautiful Playing by Kreisler and Boston Symphony.

Es

When the infrequent visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York have afforded an evening of classic calm, Dr. Muck and his men often depart two days later hurling thunders of the modern despots of din. Sometimes they reverse this order, putting forward the more radical propaganda, as on Thursday night they did in a symphony of Mahler.

The balance is speedily restored by a Saturday matinee such as yesterday's in Carnegie Hall, devoted to the ancient and honorable company of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Familiarity has affected the psychologic element of suspense in Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, but not the music, which was beautifully played. Still more was appreciation stirred by a concerto of Handel for strings and wind, with solo parts for Messrs. Witek, Longy and Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke. One descending scale of Longy's oboe was as thrilling as if played by any virtuoso star, instead of coming from the personnel of the band.

The concert was to have ended with an overture of Weber and violin concertos of Mozart and Viotti for Mr. Fritz Kreisler. Not Kreisler, but the audience, changed all that. A large number of letter writers to soloist and conductor had begged for the Beethoven concerto, which was accordingly played. It was preceded by the Mozart overture to "The Magic Flute," heard on a recent Saturday at the opera. The concert audience could not miss the dramatic hint of the triple trumpet call.

After an intermission Mr. Kreisler was heartily welcomed. The demonstration was repeated after both the free solo passages in the first and third parts of Beethoven's music, with which this player had astonished a Bostonian Thursday night audience last year. The intervening larghetto was a thing of heavenly beauty as accompanied by the orchestra yesterday.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Da

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD.

Fritz Kreisler, Soloist, Achieves Great Triumph—New Composition Played.

Est

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Brooklyn season, which was heard last night in the Academy of Music, Dr. Muck offered "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt, a composition heard for the first time in this borough, and Fritz Kreisler as soloist. Any programme in which the master violinist of his period appears assumes at once distinction and importance. Further interest naturally attaches to the presentation of a musical novelty.

This descriptive orchestral music, a suite in two parts, was written for "La Tragedie de Salome," a mimodrame in two acts and seven scenes, by Robert d'Humieres, performed for the first time in Paris in 1907, although not in its present form, which amplified, elaborated and arranged for concert use was first performed at a Concert Colonne in 1911.

The composition, essentially and specifically modern of the modern, while written in the idiom of Debussy and his school, reveals no less positively the influence of the great classic composers. There are not lacking lyric moments in the work in contrast with dinamic effects of almost startling vehemence and executive orchestration. The work reveals genuine creative power and variety. With the outline of the mute drama in the foreground of the mind, it is not difficult to find the composition descriptive. It offers interesting combinations of instruments and orchestration. Salome's several dances, as they enter into the work, are seductively Oriental, the climaxes, notably that of the finale, are striking.

Whether the reception accorded the completion of the number was for the work itself, for the wonderful playing of the orchestra or a personal tribute to Dr. Muck, it is not easy to decide. The first number was received in complete silence upon the part of the large audience. The applause at the finish was difficult to analyze.

Not so that accorded Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D major, op. 35. It was a performance of great brilliancy, a revelation of artistry in superlative degree. Such clarity of high notes, such cello-like warmth and opulence of low tones, such balance between the extremes of a too great intellectuality and excessive sentiment are matters to be grateful for. The consonetta was especially lovely. The rendition of the finale, a magnificent exposition of the vertuosic qualities, exacted a sympathetic responsiveness to the composer's moods. It was a performance to be recorded. Brilliant also was the orchestra's share. Mr. Kreisler, whose appearance was the signal for prolonged applause, was recalled half a dozen times to acknowledge a perfect tumult of demonstration. Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," completed the programme.

---

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTONIANS PLAY NINETY MINUTES

Briefest Programme Featured by Ultra-Modern Piece of Discords and Harshness

"SALOME" WIERD "PAINTING"

Kreisler the Soloist in Tschaikowsky Concerto.

A scant hour and a half of Boston symphony orchestra playing was heard by Brooklyn's subscribers, again filling the Opera House at the second concert of the season in the Academy of Music. Brief as was the programme, it was one of startling contrast. A violent assault upon tradition and commonplace, in which canons and forms as the public knows them were shattered and outraged in every conceivable way, was followed directly by a honey-sweet familiar concerto of the most [illegible] and popular style, the solo part played by no less an exponent of the fascination of musical grace than Fritz Kreisler, the Bohemian violinist. The audience was bewildered and stirred by the former and was charmed and pleased by the latter.

The reception accorded to these divergent styles of composition left no doubt as to their comparative popularity. The visits of the Bostonians to Brooklyn are assuming more and more the aspect of social events. In this respect they rank second only to the Saturday night Metropolitan opera. As such the auditors last night were in most cases impatient at the ultra-modern tone-painting and applauded perfunctorily at its close. The climax of the concerto occasioned a tumult of approval, bringing the soldier-violinist back to the footlights eight or nine times.

The novelty was Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome." This was its first performance in Brooklyn, following only a week after its initial production in the United States. In harshness and discord it outdoes Strauss by many a mile; for wierdness of effects it puts to shame the oddest imaginings of Debussy. The full strength of the orchestra is required for its curious exaggeration of tone-depicting, especial reliance being placed upon muted brasses, cymbals and the upper reaches of the harp.

It is of course the familiar story of Salome and the bloody head of the saint that is being enacted in this orgy of orchestral imagery. The Oriental effect is easily recognizable; in fact is amazing in its realism. The poem starts quietly with a dialogue of woodwind motives, and the harp, which seemingly acts as punctuation throughout the story, is introduced early. On comes the dance, its rhythm being unmistakable. Discord is piled on ear-splitting discord. The regiment of muted brasses appear to differ unanimously as to the key. The gentleman who plays the largest tuba had apparently stuffed his overcoat into the horn to produce the raucous effect; whatever it was it protruded twelve inches or so from the top of the bell. The quaintest of all the combinations is a pizzicato accompaniment of all the bass-viols to a droning passage on the bassoons.

Thirty-seven minutes it lasted. It was creepy and fantastic and as different from anything heard before as could be imagined. And yet there were phrases of exquisite beauty. One of these was for the wood-wind in harmony; another was a solo melody for the cellos; still a third was a Wagnerian harmony of the heaviest brasses, which, however, lost no time in resolving itself into utter riot. Mr. Schmitt, of Paris, evidently knows orchestral coloring, and he certainly has devised new and effective combinations of instruments, but the question arises: who is to know, who is to be the judge if the thing is played entirely wrong? How different would that brass passage in the first movement sound if played backwards?

To go from Schmitt to Tschaikowsky was like leaving a clinic at the insane asylum to pass directly into the home of a tried and true friend, there to be regaled with stories of one's companions of long ago. If it did seem to possess a certain sameness, a cloying sweetness, by reason of the contrast, it was sameness and sweetness of the sort one associates with his [illegible] friends and most loved companions. Kreisler's fiddle sang eloquently and Dr. Muck's band followed faithfully and with restraint. Btu of course there was nothing revolutionary about any of it.

The third and last number—there certainly would have been time for more—was Dvorak's sparkling "Husitska" overture, its melodies characteristic of the composer's native Bohemia. Throughout the brief programme the orchestra excelled its greatest past efforts in the production of tones. The Bostonians extracted from the tone-picture a profusion of rich coloring that caused one to marvel at its effectiveness even while one's eardrums were being so rudely treated. In the concerto, with smaller numbers, the orchestra furnished a mellow, softened background to enhance the beauties of Kreisler's art. The little overture, itself quite an attempt at the depicting of varying moods, was given a splendid reading. Not the most pleasing—or the most musically—programme within memory, it was one of undoubted interest. It surely will not soon be forgotten.

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 7,

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. He will play the Schumann Concerto.

Dr. Muck has put on the programme two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Felix Weingartner's Lustpiel Overture and Richard Strauss's latest work —Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the Lustpiel Overture was played at a concert in the Boston Opera House last year.

Richard Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new Concert Hall in Vienna, which was opened in October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times, the first performance having been in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra under Mr. Oberhoffer. The programme in full is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 1	Beethoven
Lustpiel overture	Weingartner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor	Schuman
Festliches praeludium	R. Strauss

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. It has been necessary to change this and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until later in the season. The concert will, therefore, be purely orchestral. The programme will consist of Mozart's Symphony in E flat major with the familiar menuet, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Cherubini's Overture, "Anacreon," and Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," which created such a deep impression at the last Boston concerts. Undoubtedly many who heard it then will be glad of an opportunity to hear it again.

Bauer and Thibaud at Symphony

The series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall will be broken Dec. 21 when the Handel and Haydn Society gives its usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" in the evening. The following Sunday brings one of the most interesting combinations of the year, Harold Bauer, the pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, the brilliant pianist, who will be heard in Boston for the first time in upwards of 10 years. There will be solo and ensemble numbers.

HEINRICH GEBHARD IN RECITAL

Tomorrow (Monday) afternoon brings the recital of Heinrich Gebhard in Jordan Hall. The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Italian concert	Bach
Poeme des Montagnes, Op. 15	D'Indy
Grillen, Traumeswirren	Schumann
Impromptu in F sharp, Ballade, No. 3, in A flat	Chopin
The Gulls	Richard Platt
Wandering (from "Iona Memories")	Helen Hopekirk
Peau d'Espagne (Tango)	Carl Engel
Blue Danube Waltzes (Strauss)	Schulz-Evler

Harold Henry will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 15, at 3 o'clock.

Beatrice Harrison, an English violincellist, who is making her first tour of America this season, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Dec. 17.

Maggie Teyte will give a second song recital in Jordan Hall on the afternoon of Thursday, Dec. 18.

The first concert of the season by the Cecilia Society will be given in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, Dec. The programme will comprise Florent Schmitt's "Psalm XLVI," sung French, and Chadwick's "Noel."

The usual season of Handel and Haydn Society concerts opens at Symphony Hall with the two performances of "The Messiah" on Dec. 21 and 22. "Samson and Delilah" will be given on Sunday, Feb. 8 and the "Redemption" on Easter Sunday, April 12.

"A Warrior Bold" .... Adam
Mr. Cartwright.
"Flower Song," from Faust .... Gounod
Mme. Morse.
"Old Black Joe" .... Foster
"Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" .... Old English
"The Pretty Creature" .... Storace
Mr. Cartwright.
"Sally in Our Alley," "Ben Bolt," "Come Lads and Lasses."
Mme. Morse.
Piano selections ...... Mr. Emiliano Renaud
"The Holy City" (Mr. O'Shea at organ) .... Adam
"Morning Hymn" .... Henschel
Mr. Cartwright.
"The Lost Chord" (Mr. O'Shea at organ) .... Sullivan
"Tenting on the Old Camp Grounds," "Dixie," "Battle Hymn of the Republic"
Mme. Morse.
"A Perfect Day" .... Carrie Jacobs-Bond
"Morning" .... Speaks
"The Hanging of Danny Deever" (Words by Kipling) .... Damrosch
Mr. Cartwright.

Folk Singers at Toy Theatre

Lovers of folk music will be interested to hear that the Misses Fuller are paying another visit to this country and are giving their first recital in this city at the Toy Theatre on three afternoons and evenings—Dec. 13, 15 and 16. They announce a programme of special interest, including as it does, some Christmas carols and many newly discovered English folk songs. These young ladies accompany their songs on an old Irish minstrels' harp, which is perfectly adapted for this purpose. Following their custom of last year the Misses Fuller appear in early Victorian costume. Such a recital given in the delightful and appropriate surroundings of the Toy Theatre will doubtless attract a large audience.

AMERICAN STRING QUARTET

The American String Quartet will give a concert at Steinert Hall, Dec. 16, in the evening, at 8:15. Their assisting artist is Mr. Huyman Buitikan, who has recently been heard here.

The American String Quartet has steadily made its way in the musical world under the tutelage of Charles Martin Loeffler. Three members of the quartet have been his pupils.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 8, 1913

FRITZ KREISLER AT SYMPHONY HALL

IDEAL CONCERT BY THE FAMOUS VIOLINIST

Viennese Caprice, Composed by Artist Himself, a Beautiful Composition.

By Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon, seats, aisles and platform, when Fritz Kreisler gave one of his most interesting recitals.

It was another of the important concerts given on Sunday afternoons, which are taking rank with the best musical events in Boston. The programme presented a long list of the short pieces of the older violin school, but it began with a suite by Bach and ended with technical display in a work by Paganini, plus encores. In such a programme all the greatness of Fritz Kreisler is made manifest. He is wonderful in his technique, but he rarely vouchsafes a display of it as in the last group, three Caprices by Paganini, on this occasion.

He is less a creature of moods than many great violin virtuosi, and the surety of his intonation, his artistic phrasing, his broad bowing, are well-known to the general public. Nevertheless it is an especial delight to hear him in a programme chiefly devoted to the violin-playing of that serene time when double-stopping in harmonics, left-hand pizzicati, artificial harmonics, etc., were not in use, when the violin was employed chiefly as an instrument of expression.

Schumann's Romance was the most modern work in point of chronology, in this recital, and this was not a "display-piece" of the modern school, but leaned towards the purer and older style. The older works were all very brief, easily comprehended and readily enjoyed. Yet there was one work of the present placed beside the Paganini works, a Viennese Caprice by Kreisler himself, a beautiful composition, charmingly executed, and enthusiastically encored. After this came the Paganinian technical display which closed the concert. In this the artist displayed his wares in a most brilliant manner, and one was astonished that the German and the Franco-Belgian school should be so well united in a single artist.

Nevertheless the chief enjoyment to the present reviewer was in the purer and older school of work. We doubt whether Kreisler has a rival in this field. Daintiness, archness, broad legatos, were here placed in most effective contrast.

One of these old numbers deserves especial mention. L. Couperin's arrangement of a Chanson by Louis XIII was the "Amaryllis" composed by that monarch in praise of Madame D'Hauteville. There is another more widely-known "Amaryllis" parading as "composed by Louis XIII" and arranged by Ghys, of which Louis wrote not a single note, since it was composed by Baltazarini before the king was born, and was called "Le Clochette" and not "Amaryllis." It is one of the popular errors in music. This dignified song, followed by a stately Pavane, was very attractive and much applauded.

In the Bach suite the Gavotte seemed to find the greatest favor. There was some great G string work in the Pugnani Prelude and Allegro. Cartier's pretty little "La Chasse" was imperatively redemanded. It is a comparatively modern work (early in the 19th century) with some fine skipping bow passages, and it was superbly played, with just the right spiciness and delicacy. Mozart's Rondo presented some fine work in the high positions and older, shorter works to make a good foil to them. In these the piquancy of some of the earlier numbers was replaced by a more earnest and romantic vein, which was admirably caught up by the artist.

Of the brilliancy of the last part of the concert it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Kreisler is acknowledged as being in the first rank, and perhaps the very first, of living violinists. When one bears in mind that yesterday was anything but violin weather, that one almost always gets a "dead" tone in such a dampened atmosphere, it is the more remarkable that there was such an incisive quality of tone attained. Jupiter Pluvius was unable either to restrict the size of the audience, or the artistic effect of the violinist, or the enthusiasm either, for we have never seen so ebullient a public, nor was it a case of "encore-fiend" either, for when Mr. Kreisler showed his desire not to play further the audience respected his wish and did not attempt to force matters.

And a final word of praise must be added for the accompanist, Mr. Carl Lamson, who supported Mr. Kreisler with taste and artistic sympathy throughout. In every way this concert was ideal, and it is evident Paderewski does not stand alone as a public idol, but has a worthy artistic rival in Fritz Kreisler.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

DECEMBER 7, 1913

Kreisler This Afternoon at Symphony Hall

The feature of the program which Fritz Kreisler will play in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be the group of his favorite 17th and 18th century composers. It is unnecessary to inquire too closely into the tradition that Kreisler ran across most of his music in an old Benedictine monastery in Austria, it being sufficient to know that by reviving this delightful music he has made of violin recitals something well worth hearing, for these old composers were melodists in the full sense of the world.

The composers thus represented will be Friedmann Bach, the son of the great Johann Sebastian; the Frenchmen, Couperin and Cartier; and the Italians, Pugnani, Corelli and Tartini. The program begins with Bach's suite in E Major and includes also pieces by Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

Second Popular Concert at Opera House Tonight

The large audience present at the Opera House last Sunday night gave proof that a public awaits the popular type of program at popular prices which it is the policy of the management to present at these concerts—a program sung by principal and assisting singers of the company aided by the house orchestra. Mmes Scotney-White, D'Alvarez, Messrs Tanlongo and Ancona will be the soloists tonight. The program will be as follows:

Overture, The Barber of Seville Orchestra.	Rossini
Prologue from Pagliacci Mr Ancona.	Leoncavallo
Bell Song from Lakme Miss Scotney.	Delibes
Aria from Samson and Delilah Mme D'Alvarez.	Saint-Saens
Prelude from Lohengrin Orchestra.	Wagner
Aria from La Boheme, First Act Mr Tanlongo.	Puccini
Di Provenza from Traviata Mr Ancona.	Verdi
Habanera from Carmen Mme D'Alvarez.	Bizet
Quartet from Rigoletto Mmes Scotney and Leveroni, Messrs Tanlongo and Ancona.	Verdi

Mr Gebhard's Recital Tomorrow Afternoon

Tomorrow afternoon brings the recital of Heinrich Gebhard, the brilliant local pianist, in Jordan Hall. The program will begin with Bach's Italian Concerto, which is seldom heard now on the concert platform, and this will be followed by d'Indy's Poeme des Montagnes, op. 15. The program which features compositions by three Boston composers—Mme Helen Hopekirk and Richard Platt, both pianists, and Carl Engel, whose songs Maggie Teyte has sung with success in London, is as follows:

Italian Concerto	Bach
Poeme des Montagnes, Op 15	D'Indy
Grillen	Schumann
Troumeswirren	Schumann
Impromptu in F sharp	Chopin
Ballade No 3, in A flat	Chopin
The Gulls	Richard Platt
Wandering (from Iona Memories)	Helen Hopekirk
Peau d'Espagne (Tango)	Carl Engel
Blue Danube Waltzes (Strauss)	Schulz-Evler

Josef Hofmann Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Joseph Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. He will play the Schumann Concerto. Hofmann's playing of Schumann is famous and the opportunity to hear this beautiful concerto played by him will be warmly welcomed by all lovers of the piano.

Dr Muck has put on the program two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Felix Weingartner's Lustpiel Overture and Richard Strauss' latest work, Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the Lustpiel Overture was played at a concert in the Boston Opera House last year.

Richard Strauss' "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new concert hall in Vienna which was opened in October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times, the first performance having been in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra, under Mr Oberhoffer. The program in full is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in C Major, No. 1; Weingartner, Lustpiel Overture; Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte in A Minor; R. Strauss, Festliches Praeludium.

baritone; Emiliano Renaud, pianist, and John O'Shea, organist.
Organ overture, Tannhauser .... Wagner
Mr O'Shea.
Songs—
Stein Song .... Bullard
A Warrior Bold .... Adam
Mr Cartwright.
Aria, Flower Song, from Faust .... Gounod
Mme Morse.
Ballads—
Old Black Joe .... Foster
Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes, ... Old English
The Pretty Creature .... Storace
Mr Cartwright.
Ballads—
Sally in Our Alley.
Ben Bolt.
Come Lads and Lasses.
Mme Morse.
Piano selections .... Mr Emiliano Renaud
Songs—
The Holy City (Mr O'Shea at organ) ... Adam
Morning Hymn .... Henschel
Mr Cartwright.
Song, The Lost Chord (Mr O'Shea at organ) .... Sullivan
Mme Morse.
Martial Songs—
Tenting on the Old Campground.
Dixie.
Battle Hymn of the Republic (words by Mrs Howe).
Mme Morse.
Songs—
A Perfect Day .... Carrie Jacobs-Bond
Morning .... Speaks
The Hanging of Danny Deever (words by Kipling) .... Damrosch
Mr Cartwright.

Mr Hubbard's Opera Talks For the Week In and Out of Boston

Havrah W. L. Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver eight of his popular opera talks during the course of the coming week. Floyd M. Baxter will assist him at the piano.

"Monna Vanna" will be the subject of three talks, to be given on Tuesday afternoon, before the Heptorean and Somerville Women's Clubs, in Somerville; on Thursday evening, before the Roxburghe Club, Roxbury, and again on Friday afternoon, before the Middlesex Women's Club of Lowell.

"Tales of Hoffmann" will be given Tuesday evening before the Somerville Teachers' Club in Somerville, and again, in connection with "The Secret of Suzanne," before the Pepperell Woman's Club in Pepperell.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" will be given Wednesday afternoon before the Woman's Club of Fitchburg; "Mme Butterfly" on Monday afternoon before the Woman's Club of Littleton, and "Hansel and Gretel," together with "The Secret of Suzanne," on Thursday morning before the West Roxbury Women's Club, in Highland.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

Fritz Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, but it has been necessary to change this and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until late in the season. The concert will, therefore, be purely orchestral.

The first part will comprise Mozart's symphony in E flat Major, Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and strings and Cherubini's overture, "Anacreon." The second part will be devoted to Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome."

Rappold and Gogorza.

The appearance here of Emilio de Gogorza after an absence of several years will be warmly welcomed by his many friends. Mr Gogorza is one of the most popular singers that come to Boston and associated with that attractive soprano, Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, he will appear in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Dec 14. For the last two or three years Mr de Gogorza has been living abroad and has given up almost entirely his concert work, but this Winter he is again in America. Mme Rappold has not been heard here since she appeared with the Symphony Orchestra last season. She is one of the best of present-day dramatic sopranos. The program will be announced shortly.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 13.

HOFMANN AT SYMPHONY HALL

SOLOIST IN CURRENT CONCERT PROGRAMME

Classical and Romantic Schools of Music Finely Balanced in This Week's Offering.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—First Symphony, C major.
Weingartner—Lustige Overture, Op. 53.
Schumann—Piano Concerto, A minor.
Strauss—Festliches Praeludium, Orchestra and Organ.
Pianist, Mr. Josef Hofmann.

Our chief text for today, dearly beloved brethren, will be found in the first book of Beethoven, chapter one. There was a finely varied programme, presenting some of the classical and romantic school, and also specimens of the more comprehensible numbers of the most recent type. The Beethoven symphony is perhaps the lightest of the nine, and gives clear evidence of the influence of Haydn, but it is stronger than Haydn in many respects. Its Minuet is far freer than any Minuet that Haydn ever composed, and plainly foreshadows the Scherzo, with which Beethoven replaced the Minuet in his second symphony. Its finale is Haydn to the life, and even its slow movement gives the suave and melodic counterpoint of the teacher of Beethoven.

It is, of course, impossible to read anything new into this somewhat formal work, but it was refreshing to hear the crisp clearness and excellent shading with which it was interpreted, and it is a very good idea to impress some of this sane and healthy music upon the public mind in these days of turgid over-swollen, and sometimes incomprehensible music.

friends and most loved companions. Kreisler's fiddle sang eloquently and Dr. Muck's band followed faithfully and with restraint. Btu of course there was nothing revolutionary about any of it.

The third and last number—there certainly would have been time for more—was Dvorak's sparkling "Husitska" overture, its melodies characteristic of the composer's native Bohemia. Throughout the brief programme the orchestra excelled its greatest past efforts in the production of tones. The Bostonians extracted from the tone-picture a profusion of rich coloring that caused one to marvel at its effectiveness even while one's eardrums were being so rudely treated. In the concerto, with smaller numbers, the orchestra furnished a mellow, softened background to enhance the beauties of Kreisler's art. The little overture, itself quite an attempt at the depicting of varying moods, was given a splendid reading. Not the most pleasing—or the most musically—programme within memory, it was one of undoubted interest. It surely will not soon be forgotten.

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 7,

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. He will play the Schumann Concerto.

Dr. Muck has put on the programme two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Felix Weingartner's Lustpiel Overture and Richard Strauss's latest work —Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the Lustpiel Overture was played at a concert in the Boston Opera House last year.

Richard Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new Concert Hall in Vienna, which was opened in October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times, the first performance having been in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra under Mr. Oberhoffer. The programme in full is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 1....Beethoven
Lustpiel overture..............Weingartner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor..Schuman
Festliches praeludium............R. Strauss

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. It has been necessary to change this and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until later in the season. The concert will, therefore, be purely orchestral. The programme will consist of Mozart's Symphony in E flat major with the familiar menuet, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Cherubini's Overture, "Anacreon," and Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," which created such a deep impression at the last Boston concerts. Undoubtedly many who heard it then will be glad of an opportunity to hear it again.

Bauer and Thibaud at Symphony

The series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall will be broken Dec. 21 when the Handel and Haydn Society gives its usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" in the evening. The following Sunday brings one of the most interesting combinations of the year, Harold Bauer, the pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, the brilliant pianist, who will be heard in Boston for the first time in upwards of 10 years. There will be solo and ensemble numbers.

HEINRICH GEBHARD IN RECITAL

Tomorrow (Monday) afternoon brings the recital of Heinrich Gebhard in Jordan Hall. The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Italian concert..........................Bach
Poeme des Montagnes, Op. 15......D'Indy
Grillen, Traumeswirren..........Schumann
Impromptu in F sharp, Ballade, No. 3, in A flat.......................Chopin
The Gulls......................Richard Platt
Wandering (from "Iona Memories")..............Helen Hopekirk
Peau d'Espagne (Tango)..........Carl Engel
Blue Danube Waltzes (Strauss)..Schulz-Evler

Harold Henry will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, Dec. 15, at 3 o'clock.

Beatrice Harrison, an English violincellist, who is making her first tour of America this season, will give a recital in Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Dec. 17.

Maggie Teyte will give a second song recital in Jordan Hall on the afternoon of Thursday, Dec. 18.

The first concert of the season by the Cecilia Society will be given in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, Dec. 18. The programme will comprise Florent Schmitt's "Psalm XLVI., sung in French, and Chadwick's "Noel."

The usual season of Handel and Haydn Society concerts opens at Symphony Hall with the two performances of "The Messiah" on Dec. 21 and 22. "Samson and Delilah" will be given on Sunday, Feb. 8 and the "Redemption" on Easter Sunday, April 12.

"A Warrior Bold"
Mr. Cartwright.
"Flower Song," from Faust..............Gounod
Mme. Morse.
"Old Black Joe"............................Foster
"Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes"..............................Old English
"The Pretty Creature"....................Storace
Mr. Cartwright.
"Sally in Our Alley," "Ben Bolt," "Come Lads and Lasses."
Mme. Morse.
Piano selections.........Mr. Emiliano Renaud
"The Holy City" (Mr. O'Shea at organ)......................................Adam
"Morning Hymn"..........................Henschel
Mr. Cartwright.
"The Lost Chord" (Mr. O'Shea at organ)...................................Sullivan
"Tenting on the Old Camp Grounds," "Dixie," "Battle Hymn of the Republic"
Mme. Morse.
"A Perfect Day"..........Carrie Jacobs-Bond
"Morning"..................................Speaks
"The Hanging of Danny Deever" (Words by Kipling).....................Damrosch
Mr. Cartwright.

Folk Singers at Toy Theatre

Lovers of folk music will be interested to hear that the Misses Fuller are paying another visit to this country and are giving their first recital in this city at the Toy Theatre on three afternoons and evenings—Dec. 13, 15 and 16. They announce a programme of special interest, including as it does, some Christmas carols and many newly discovered English folk songs. These young ladies accompany their songs on an old Irish minstrels' harp, which is perfectly adapted for this purpose. Following their custom of last year the Misses Fuller appear in early Victorian costume. Such a recital given in the delightful and appropriate surroundings of the Toy Theatre will doubtless attract a large audience.

AMERICAN STRING QUARTET

The American String Quartet will give a concert at Steinert Hall, Dec. 16, in the evening, at 8:15. Their assisting artist is Mr. Huyman Buitikan, who has recently been heard here.

The American String Quartet has steadily made its way in the musical world under the tutelage of Charles Martin Loeffler. Three members of the quartet have been his pupils.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 8, 191

FRITZ KREISLER AT SYMPHONY HALL

IDEAL CONCERT BY THE FAMOUS VIOLINIST

Viennese Caprice, Composed b Artist Himself, a Beautifu Composition.

By Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall was crowded yesterday afternoon, seats, aisles and platform, when Fritz Kreisler gave one of his most interesting recitals.

It was another of the important concerts given on Sunday afternoons, which are taking rank with the best musical events in Boston. The programme presented a long list of the short pieces of the older violin school, but it began with a suite by Bach and ended with technical display in a work by Paganini, plus encores. In such a programme all the greatness of Fritz Kreisler is made manifest. He is wonderful in his technique, but he rarely vouchsafes a display of it as in the last group, three Caprices by Paganini, on this occasion.

He is less a creature of moods than many great violin virtuosi, and the surety of his intonation, his artistic phrasing, his broad bowing, are well-known to the general public. Nevertheless it is an especial delight to hear him in a programme chiefly devoted to the violin-playing of that serene time when double-stopping in harmonics, left-hand pizzicati, artificial harmonics, etc., were not in use, when the violin was employed chiefly as an instrument of expression.

Schumann's Romance was the most modern work in point of chronology, in this recital, and this was not a "display-piece" of the modern school, but leaned towards the purer and older style. The older works were all very brief, easily comprehended and readily enjoyed. Yet there was one work of the present placed beside the Paganini works, a Viennese Caprice by Kreisler himself, a beautiful composition, charmingly executed, and enthusiastically encored. After this came the Paganinian technical display which closed the concert. In this the artist displayed his wares in a most brilliant manner, and one was astonished that the German and the Franco-Belgian school should be so well united in a single artist.

Nevertheless the chief enjoyment to the present reviewer was in the purer and [illegible] school of work. We doubt whether [illegible]er has a rival in this field. Dainti[illegible] [illegible]archness, broad legatos, were here [illegible] in most effective contrast.

[illegible] these old numbers deserves especial [at]tention. L. Couperin's arrangement [of a ch]anson by Louis XIII was the "Ama[ryllis," c]omposed by that monarch in praise [of Ma]me D'Hauteville. There is another [more w]idely-known "Amaryllis" parading [as "c]omposed by Louis XIII" and arranged by Ghys, of which Louis wrote not [a] single note, since it was composed by [Ghys and] Itazanini before the king was born, and [wa]s called "Le Clochette" and not "Amaryllis." [I]t is one of the popular errors in [mu]sic. This dignified song, followed by a [sta]tely pavane, was very attractive and [mu]ch applauded.

[In t]he Bach suite the Gavotte seemed to [win] the greatest favor. There was some [[illegible]] string work in the Pugnani Pre[lude and] Allegro. Cartier's pretty little [[illegible]]e" was imperatively redemanded. [[illegible]] a comparatively modern work [(of t]he 19th century) with some fine [[illegible]]w passages, and it was superb[ly [illegible]] with just the right spiciness [[illegible]]y. Mozart's Rondo presented [[illegible]] work in the high positions and older, shorter [illegible] to make a good foil to them. In these the piquancy of some of the earlier numbers was replaced by a more earnest and romantic vein, which was admirably caught up by the artist.

Of the brilliancy of the last part of the concert it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Kreisler is acknowledged as being in the first rank, and perhaps the very first, of living violinists. When one bears in mind that yesterday was anything but violin weather, that one almost always gets a "dead" tone in such a dampened atmosphere. it is the more remarkable that there was such an incisive quality of tone attained. Jupiter Pluvius was unable either to restrict the size of the audience, or the artistic effect of the violinist, or the enthusiasm either, for we have never seen so ebullient a public, nor was it a case of "encore-fiend" either, for when Mr. Kreisler showed his desire not to play further the audience respected his wish and did not attempt to force matters.

And a final word of praise must be added for the accompanist, Mr. Carl Lamson, who supported Mr. Kreisler with taste and artistic sympathy throughout. In every way this concert was ideal, and it is evident Paderewski does not stand alone as a public idol, but has a worthy artistic rival in Fritz Kreisler.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

DECEMBER 7, 1913

Kreisler This Afternoon at Symphony Hall

The feature of the program which Fritz Kreisler will play in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be the group of his favorite 17th and 18th century composers. It is unnecessary to inquire too closely into the tradition that Kreisler ran across most of his music in an old Benedictine monastery in Austria, it being sufficient to know that by reviving this delightful music he has made of violin recitals something well worth hearing, for these old composers were melodists in the full sense of the world.

The composers thus represented will be Friedmann Bach, the son of the great Johann Sebastian; the Frenchmen, Couperin and Cartier; and the Italians, Pugnani, Corelli and Tartini. The program begins with Bach's suite in E Major and includes also pieces by Gluck, Schumann, Mozart, Kreisler and Paganini.

Second Popular Concert at Opera House Tonight

The large audience present at the Opera House last Sunday night gave proof that a public awaits the popular type of program at popular prices which it is the policy of the management to present at these concerts—a program sung by principal and assisting singers of the company aided by the house orchestra. Mmes Scotney-White, D'Alvarez, Messrs Tanlongo and Ancona will be the soloists tonight. The program will be as follows:

Overture, The Barber of Seville........Rossini
Orchestra.
Prologue from Pagliacci...........Leoncavallo
Mr Ancona.
Bell Song from Lakme................Delibes
Miss Scotney.
Aria from Samson and Delilah.....Saint-Saens
Mme D'Alvarez.
Prelude from Lohengrin...............Wagner
Orchestra.
Aria from La Boheme, First Act.......Puccini
Mr Tanlongo.
Di Provenza from Traviata...............Verdi
Mr Ancona.
Habanera from Carmen..................Bizet
Mme D'Alvarez.
Quartet from Rigoletto..................Verdi
Mmes Scotney and Leveroni, Messrs Tanlongo and Ancona.

Mr Gebhard's Recital Tomorrow Afternoon

Tomorrow afternoon brings the recital of Heinrich Gebhard, the brilliant local pianist, in Jordan Hall. The program will begin with Bach's Italian Concerto, which is seldom heard now on the concert platform, and this will be followed by d'Indy's Poeme des Montagnes, op. 15. The program which features compositions by three Boston composers—Mme Helen Hopekirk and Richard Platt, both pianists, and Carl Engel, whose songs Maggie Teyte has sung with success in London, is as follows:

Italian Concerto............................Bach
Poeme des Montagnes, Op 15...........D'Indy
Grillen ....Schumann
Troumeswirren ....Schumann
Impromptu in F sharp....................Chopin
Ballade No 3, in A flat...................Chopin
The Gulls............................Richard Platt
Wandering (from Iona Memories)..........
Helen Hopekirk
Peau d'Espagne (Tango)............Carl Engel
Blue Danube Waltzes (Strauss)....Schulz-Evler

Josef Hofmann Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Joseph Hofmann will be the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. He will play the Schumann Concerto. Hofmann's playing of Schumann is famous and the opportunity to hear this beautiful concerto played by him will be warmly welcomed by all lovers of the piano.

Dr Muck has put on the program two novelties, so far as the Symphony concerts are concerned, one of which has never been heard in Boston. These are Felix Weingartner's Lustpiel Overture and Richard Strauss' latest work, Festival Prelude. Under the composer's direction the Lustpiel Overture was played at a concert in the Boston Opera House last year.

Richard Strauss' "Festliches Praeludium" was written for the dedication of the new concert hall in Vienna which was opened in October. It calls for a large orchestra and a great organ. It has been played in America several times, the first performance having been in Minneapolis by the Minneapolis Orchestra, under Mr Oberhoffer. The program in full is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in C Major, No. 1; Weingartner, Lustpiel Overture; Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte in A Minor; R. Strauss, Festliches Praeludium.

[79]

baritone; Emiliano Renaud, pianist, and John O'Shea, organist.

Organ overture, Tannhauser...........Wagner
Mr O'Shea.

Songs—
Stein Song ....Bullard
A Warrior Bold...............................Adam
Mr Cartwright.
Aria, Flower Song, from Faust.........Gounod
Mme Morse.

Ballads—
Old Black Joe...............................Foster
Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes, Old English
The Pretty Creature.....................Storace
Mr Cartwright.

Ballads—
Sally in Our Alley.
Ben Bolt.
Come Lads and Lasses.
Mme Morse.
Piano selections..........Mr Emiliano Renaud
Songs—
The Holy City (Mr O'Shea at organ)...Adam
Morning Hymn ....Henschel
Mr Cartwright.
Song, The Lost Chord (Mr O'Shea at organ) Sullivan
Mme Morse.

Martial Songs—
Tenting on the Old Campground.
Dixie.
Battle Hymn of the Republic (words by Mrs Howe).
Mme Morse.

Songs—
A Perfect Day..........Carrie Jacobs-Bond
Morning ....Speaks
The Hanging of Danny Deever (words by Kipling) ....Damrosch
Mr Cartwright.

Mr Hubbard's Opera Talks For the Week In and Out of Boston

Havrah W. L. Hubbard of the Boston Opera House will deliver eight of his popular opera talks during the course of the coming week. Floyd M. Baxter will assist him at the piano.

"Monna Vanna" will be the subject of three talks, to be given on Tuesday afternoon before the Heptorean and Somerville Women's Clubs, in Somerville; on Thursday evening, before the Roxburghe Club, Roxbury, and again on Friday afternoon, before the Middlesex Women's Club of Lowell.

"Tales of Hoffmann" will be given Tuesday evening before the Somerville Teachers' Club in Somerville, and again, in connection with "The Secret of Suzanne," before the Pepperell Woman's Club in Pepperell.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" will be given Wednesday afternoon before the Woman's Club of Fitchburg; "Mme Butterfly" on Monday afternoon before the Woman's Club of Littleton, and "Hansel and Gretel," together with "The Secret of Suzanne," on Thursday morning before the West Roxbury Women's Club, in Highland.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

Fritz Kreisler was announced as soloist at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, but it has been necessary to change this and his appearance in Cambridge has been postponed until late in the season. The concert will, therefore, be purely orchestral.

The first part will comprise Mozart's symphony in E flat Major, Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and strings and Cherubini's overture, "Anacreon." The second part will be devoted to Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome."

Rappold and Gogorza.

The appearance here of Emilio de Gogorza after an absence of several years will be warmly welcomed by his many friends. Mr Gogorza is one of the most popular singers that come to Boston and associated with that attractive soprano, Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, he will appear in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Dec 14. For the last two or three years Mr de Gogorza has been living abroad and has given up almost entirely his concert work, but this Winter he is again in America. Mme Rappold has not been heard here since she appeared with the Symphony Orchestra last season. She is one of the best of present-day dramatic sopranos. The program will be announced shortly.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 13.

HOFMANN AT SYMPHONY HALL

SOLOIST IN CURRENT CONCERT PROGRAMME

Classical and Romantic Schools of Music Finely Balanced in This Week's Offering.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—First Symphony, C major.
Weingartner—Lustige Overture, Op. 53.
Schumann—Piano Concerto, A minor.
Strauss—Festliches Praeludium, Orchestra and Organ.
Pianist, Mr. Josef Hofmann.

Our chief text for today, dearly beloved brethren, will be found in the first book of Beethoven, chapter one. There was a finely varied programme, presenting some of the classical and romantic school, and also specimens of the more comprehensible numbers of the most recent type. The Beethoven symphony is perhaps the lightest of the nine, and gives clear evidence of the influence of Haydn, but it is stronger than Haydn in many respects. Its Minuet is far freer than any Minuet that Haydn ever composed, and plainly foreshadows the Scherzo, with which Beethoven replaced the Minuet in his second symphony. Its finale is Haydn to the life, and even its slow movement gives the suave and melodic counterpoint of the teacher of Beethoven.

It is, of course, impossible to read anything new into this somewhat formal work, but it was refreshing to hear the crisp clearness and excellent shading with which it was interpreted, and it is a very good idea to impress some of this sane and healthy music upon the public mind in these days of turgid, over-swollen, and sometimes incomprehensible music.

set all the [illegible] a time: [illegible] phony in C with a [illegible] Sym- thing unheard of! But we heard many things bolder than this before the concert was over. Dr. Muck did not cut a single repeat, and then the symphony was only half-an-hour long. It was read in so direct and sensible a fashion that the whole audience enjoyed every part of it and it is a significant point that this work which some would think too simple for the 20th century, was enthusiastically applauded, and the orchestra forced to rise in acknowledgment.

The Schumann Concerto was another reminder of the time when melody, romance and harmonic effect had not been replaced by complexity and overwhelming tone-colors. In point of orchestral coloring this work was like a student's exercise in instrumentation compared with what came after. Our most radical composers give us almost everything in music, except musical ideas, and Schumann's concerto is brimful of these.

And Josef Hofmann is just the interpreter for such impressive music. He is a much safer guide for the musical student than Paderewski, and, judging by the result of his work yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, a great favorite with the general public as well. He never allows his great technique to run away with him, and he never plays at the gallery. There is something solid and sterling in his work which musician and non-musician unite in appreciating.

Hofmann's playing is sometimes as leonine as that of Eugen D'Albert used to be. Yet he does not pound, and his delicacy is also wonderful, as the glorious tenderness of the Andantino Grazioso abundantly proved.

Through the whole concerto there was a sense of surety that bred serenity in the breast of the auditor, who could think of the music only, rather than of the great artist who was interpreting it.

The performance was something to remember, something to rhapsodize over, and at the end there was another great and spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm, which would not be stilled until Mr. Hofmann had come back to the platform many times.

The remainder of the programme was of the better class of modern music, and, while it did not obliterate the simplicity of the earlier Beethoven, or the melodious romance of the poetic Schumann, was yet of intrinsic worth in its own style. Both pieces were festive and bright (or majestic) and there was no crabbed asceticism in either composition.

We were very glad, in the Strauss work, to hear the organ in combination with the orchestra. The instrument sounds exceptionally well in Symphony Hall, and the union of the two forces made us yearn for a good organ concerto again; it is long since we have had one in Boston. And we were glad to have the important organ part in the hands of such a competent artist as Wallace Goodrich, who played with surety and a well-chosen registration that gave a fine ensemble.

Richard Strauss seems to be receding from the extremely dissonant and untuneful effects that he has used in his "Salome" and "Elektra" vein.

But, of course, Richard Strauss would not write a festival prelude (for the opening of a great concert-hall) at retail. He goes in for wholesale scoring almost from first to last (especially last), and the wood wind is more than doubled, while such unusual instruments as the heckelphone, E-flat clarinette, C clarinettes, extra kettle drums, extra trumpets, as well as organ, appear, and the use of a patent air-pump called the Aerophor is recommended to the bassoonists. Naturally not all of these demands could be met. The score is as exorbitant in its demands as the "Dies Irae" in Berlioz's Requiem, in which conductors are always ready to make a good discount. But there were enough instruments in our great orchestra to avoid the slightest sense of deficiency, and the composer's ideas were brilliantly and noisily carried out.

There is some skilful counterpoint in this new work, and there is some majestic work for the organ, but the main thing is terrific noise! The "1812" overture, which hitherto held the palm for tumult, is a spring zephyr beside it. There are not "Fs" enough in the type font to give an idea of how loud this work is. We almost expected Symphony Hall to follow the example of the walls of Jericho, but it stood firm. How grateful the ear-doctors ought to be to Richard Strauss!

Nevertheless it is difficult to score this kind of a noise, and the work was interesting, though not inspired, and there was much applause at the end.

Weingartner's Comic Overture, or Jolly Overture, was neither comic nor jolly. It is a question whether instrumental music, per se, can be comic. "L'Apprenti Sorcier" and "Till Eulenspiegel" have programme definitions attached. The work was full of brusque contrasts, sudden interruptions and changes, and startling explosions. It had an impressive march theme, and was skilfully scored, but it had less "raison d'etre" than Strauss's musical earthquake.

Altogether this concert was of the right length (it might have been a wee bit shorter) and was interesting all through. It came in like a lamb, and it went out like a whole menagerie!

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAYS BIG NOISE FEST

Strauss Prelude Given —Hofmann Feature

MONDAY MORNING.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Strauss' "Festival Prelude" for orchestra and organ, op. 61, was played for the first time in Boston at the Symphony rehearsal of yesterday afternoon; Weingartner's Merry Overture, op. 53, was played for the first time at these concerts; Josef Hofmann, soloist of the occasion, played Schumann's A minor piano concerto, and it is probable that no such poetic and masterly performance of this concerto has been recorded since Symphony Hall first opened its doors; Beethoven's early First Symphony, the music of the earlier Beethoven, as yet scarce delivered from the teachings of Haydn, was performed so well that the orchestra rose to its feet, with Dr. Muck, to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

It seems absurd to deny traces, hints of the later Beethoven, in this symphony. On the other hand, this early orchestral work has little interest for the concertgoer of today, and its place could far better have been filled by music of the later Beethoven or—later music.

FOR 142 PLAYERS

It is said that Strauss was long in consenting to write a festival prelude for the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of Vienna, a work intended for the opening of the society's new Konzerthaus. The prelude is scored for piccolo, four flutes, four oboes, heckelphone—this instrument is not employed—one E-flat clarinet, two C clarinets, two A clarinets, four bassoons, double-bassoon, eight horns, four trumpets, six trumpets stationed above the orchestra or on two slides of it, four trombones, bass tuba, eight kettle-drums, played by two drummers, who worked hard yesterday; 20 first and 20 second violins, 12 first violas, 12 second violas, 10 first 'cellos, 10 second 'cellos, 12 double-basses. That the players of certain wind instruments, such as the bassoons, shall sustain tones without a break in the breathing, Strauss recommends the use of Samuel's aerophor, a kind of pump, a bellows worked by the foot of the player and connected with the instrument by a length of rubber tube.

It may be said that this Prelude makes a brave noise, that no composer could hope to get much more tone from a body of such instruments as are furnished in this day, that a passage here and there has the harmonic bite and the contrapuntal solidity and brilliancy of Strauss' characteristic style, and that the work as a whole, though well made, contains little that is original or worthy of the reputation of the composer.

Weingartner's Comic Overture

Weingartner's comic overture is interesting by reason of its orchestration, which is very skilful. It has well-defined themes, treated with considerable scholarship, and the coda is cheaply effective. We like this music little more than other orchestral music by Weingartner heard in Boston, although the scoring is far lighter and more artistic than the scoring of the horrible symphony heard two seasons ago. The form is clear; the composer displays an annoying fluency; the music is empty. It is made music, glibly, ingeniously put together and of poor quality.

The feature of this concert was Mr. Hofmann's playing of Schumann's poetic concerto. In the modern literature of the piano there is no other piece of such intimate character for piano and orchestra, and there are no more beautiful and simple passages of orchestration than the instrumental commentary or accompaniment of the piano part. Many pianists play this concerto as if it were a great and pretentious thing. Not so Mr. Hofmann. It was as though he improvised, dreaming at his keyboard, and yet, despite this imaginative treatment, and the exquisite tonal coloring, nothing could have been more admirable than the finish of his performance, and the certainty of what he was going to do. It must be an unusual pleasure for orchestral players to perform with such a soloist. Each detail was wisely and carefully planned so that a most gratifying security and inevitability characterized the interpretation, and yet all was as a play of fancy, a succession of intimate moods, the piano at times commanding, at times soliloquizing, or holding impetuous dialogue with the other instruments.

Something to Cherish

The playing of the intermezzo was something to cherish in the memory, a thing to be heard only once, as a thought to be held dear. Nor, with all its fleetness and excitement, did the performance of the finale take the music from its frame. Such a performance is only brought about by exceptional talent, the most intelligent industry, and time. A process not to be accomplished in a day or a year; yet thousands who would have flocked to hear the little Josef Hofmann play the Beethoven's C major concerto as a boy of 10, would have shown little or no curiosity to listen to the artist, who had no peer yesterday afternoon. The public is not sufficiently appreciative of such art, but the reward of the artist, happily, is not in ratio to the appreciation of the public.

BOSTON [illegible]

DECEMBER [illegible]

SYMPHONY'S 8TH REHEARSAL

Weingartner's "Merry Overture" a Tricksy, Cheery, Pleasant Piece, Played.

STRAUSS FESTIVAL PRELUDE

All That Is to Be Said of This Is Exceedingly Noisy—Hofmann Is Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Josef Hofmann was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, C major......Beethoven
Merry Overture op. 53........Weingartner
Concerto in A minor for piano...Schumann
Festival Prelude for orchestra and organ op. 61....................R. Strauss

Mr. Weingartner conducted his overture at a concert of the Boston Opera House Orchestra last February. Strauss's Prelude was played for the first time in the city.

The overture is joyous and frankly tuneful. Its themes are of an operetta nature, but they are dexterously developed and combined, and there is tricksy instrumentation. The overture includes even a waltz in 6-4 time. It is pleasant, cheery music for a holiday season, music that is not pretentious, but they that clamor for symphonic poems of a "literary" nature, music that depicts struggles of the soul, or yearnings after the infinite, music that is the voice of a symbolist or an impressionist, will no doubt find the overture light and flippant and shake their heads.

Strauss's prelude was composed for the dedication of a new concert house in Vienna and at the request of the Society of Friends of Music in that city. The first performance was on the 19th of last October. The prelude is scored for organ and a huge orchestra. The composer asks for 40 violins, 24 violas, 20 'cellos and 12 double basses; at least 10 trumpets and he would prefer 16. He recommends to the players of certain wind instruments an aerophor, or bellows pump, so that they can sustain long passages without "windy suspiration of forced breath." Strauss evidently thought that this dedication required "a great and thundering speech," otherwise as Mycetes in Marlowe's tragedy, he could not express himself. And what is to be said of this Prelude? Nothing, except that it is exceedingly noisy. There is little majesty or nobility in the conception, the themes are without commanding pomp; and any effect made on the hearer is a purely nervous one. The extra trumpeters, pupils of trumpeters in the orchestra, swelled the din and evidently enjoyed themselves. It is a pity that Strauss did not introduce the noise-creating instruments employed at a Futurist concert in Milan, buzzers, bursters, rustlers, gurglers, students, snorters, smashers, thunderers. A stone-crushing machine might have helped in the final climax.

The orchestra gave a beautiful performance of Beethoven's Symphony. Why debate whether the music is wholly Mozartian; whether there are traces of the "greater" Beethoven? Let the music be taken for what it is, music of the end of the 18th century. At the same time let us recall the fact that when this symphony was played in Paris 103 years ago two or three critics protested against the "astonishing success" of Beethoven's works as "a danger to musical art." "It is believed," said one, "that a prodigal use of the most barbaric dissonances and a noisy use of all the orchestral instruments will make an effect. Alas, the ear is only stabbed; there is no appeal to the heart." And so in 2016 this Festival Prelude of Strauss may seem to the sitter in the seat of the scornful gently lyrical and absurdly simple.

Mr. Hofmann played Schumann's concerto in a rarely poetic manner and the orchestra was in full sympathy with him. In the great hall Mr. Hofmann succeeded in establishing at once the peculiar intimacy that should exist between hearer and pianist when this concerto is played. There was a refreshing absence of undue force, but the delicacy of the pianist's touch showed true strength. His tone always had exquisite quality; clearness was never mechanical; there was the suggestion of the composer musing, weaving his fancies, and then confiding them to one that would understand him. Seldom if ever has there been here a more Schumannesque performance.

The program of next week will be as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E minor, No. 2; Mozart, concerto for flute and harp (Messrs. Maquarre and Holy); Mendelssohn, overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

BOSTON GLOBE

DECEMBER 12

JOSEF HOFMANN IN SCHUMANN CONCERTO

Plays With Consummate Poetry.

Strauss Prelude Is Swollen and Perfunctory.

The program of the eighth Symphony rehearsal was as follows. Josef Hofmann was soloist; Dr Muck conducted.

Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Weingartner, Lustige overture; Schumann, concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra; Strauss, Festival Prelude, op 61, first time in Boston.

The feature of the afternoon was Mr Hofmann's playing of the Schumann concerto. It was a rare and beautiful exposition of the finest qualities of technical and interpretative pianism, and of the spirit of the composer as this music has caught and communicated it.

Mr Hofmann was content to let the piano remain as an instrument, resourceful, but withal limited in volume of tone, rather than to place upon it the responsibilities of an orchestra. The result was one of those artistic achievements that are born in propitious moments—a great pianist who is an inspired poet, song music with an improvisational spontaneity; a great conductor who sensed and aided his purposes, and a great orchestra as an appropriate frame.

This concerto sprang from a fertile and inspired period of Schumann's life; the first movement, which he originally intended as a separate fantasy, marking the year after his long-deferred marriage with Clara Wieck; the other the movements following four years later, after he had devoted himself to chamber music, the song and the symphony.

The intermezzo of this concerto is a clear example of Schumann's sense of lyric beauty in the piano, of its powers to sing with that simplicity of emotional speech that lays bare the secrets of heart and whispers the confidences of Nature. It is essentially music of a precious and exquisite intimacy of understanding; it is as though the composer were revealing to his closest friend his inmost, his most treasured thoughts, reflections and feelings, that would be profaned by proclamation to an irrelevant world.

To what an extraordinary degree did Mr Hofmann—by passionate restraint, rather than by the excess of romantic ardor, which some mistake for it—suggest this sensibility, this listening for interior voices, for their leading, their resolution and their messages, suggest the recreated, vernal impulse as the heart of life that sings through these adorable phrases of melody—to what an extraordinary degree did he accomplish these things by the magic of his touch, that the piano gave the illusion of song, such as only voices or strings can create in reality.

It was a performance of the highest poetic beauty, a perfection that watched the art of bel canto with true limpidity in the florid pages that follow in the last movement; not as demonstrations of the technical prowess of a virtuoso, but as the wings of rhapsody.

By the aid of 150 men, the Strauss prelude was first performed in Vienna last October at the dedication of the new concert hall in that city. The work was written at the request of the Society of the Friends of Music. With the cooperation of all the available brasses in the orchestra and of a battery of trumpets ensconced behind the string basses the piece was performed here yesterday for the first time in this city. Dr Strauss' most commendable attainment in it is the fact that he has furnished employment for a considerable number of extra men.

His reputation will derive no great benefit from his musical bombardment. A more bombastic, pompous and vacuous proclamation of musical festivity has not found its way to these shores from the workshop of any German Kappelmeister. Dr Strauss has confessed to a desire to make the work resemble the overture to "The Mastersingers." His contrasting theme is a weak reminiscence. The organ effectively played yesterday by Mr Goodrich furnishes imposing interludes of the nature of chorals, and holds down the swelling chords on a pedal point. There are no arresting musical ideas, nor is there more than a conventional cleverness in orchestral dress. Bold modulations in the concluding measures suggest the composer with a sinister smile for the acoustics of a hall that are stormed into submission by such a fusilade. Bells, cannon and brewery whistles are omitted from the score, although a device is recommended to pump wind faster into the wind instrument players.

Mr Weingartner's overture, heard for the first time at these concerts, has the prevailing symbols of agitation, at times of gladness. There is an abundance of dramatic punctuation. Ideas follow each other in short and declamatory fashion. They also possess variety in character. Their appearance exceeds their structure in worth. The new work was given a spirited performance.

Dr Muck and his men played the symphony with surpassing beauty. Its thoughts have freshness and spontaneity if not the intensity and range of feeling of those that follow with the Eroica. The audience was demonstrative in applause for the symphony and Mr Hofmann.

[80]

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 10,

COLOR LINE IGNORED BY SYMPHONY

Major Higginson Denies Washington Report

Major Henry L. Higginson emphatically denied yesterday that any attempt was being made to bar colored persons from the Washington concerts given by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Major Higginson declares the report emanating from Washington is absolutely untrue.

"The story is not true. I am the guarantee fund, and the subscribers' lists are open to all persons without discrimination," said Major Higginson yesterday.

SOLD OUT ANYWAY

The report causes widespread comment everywhere, it being asserted that the concerts had fallen in line with the alleged discrimination said to exist at the capital.

Boston, the birthplace of the abolitionist movement, and the "cradle of liberty," was supposed to be free from prejudice, and it came as a great surprise when it was declared that the subscribers, forming a guarantee fund, were closing their lists against negroes. Major Higginson declares that he has supplied the "guarantee fund," and that the statement is wholly untrue.

As a matter of fact the capacities of the halls in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington where the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays are sold out a year in advance, so the only approach to discrimination would be the inability to sell a single seat to any applicant, white or colored, on the day of the concerts.

ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 10.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

No Discrimination.

To the Editor of The Advertiser:—

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to call the attention of The Advertiser to several errors contained in its despatch from Washington this morning to the effect that negroes are excluded from its concerts in that city by the guarantors of the orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has neither guarantors nor guarantee fund in Washington. It rents the New National Theatre for its series of five concerts, and as the tenant of the theatre complies with its rules, whatever they may be. As the house is nearly sold out for the season by subscription very few tickets for single concerts are for sale, and in the disposal of these the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not aware that any discrimination is used.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 13,

SYMPHONY PRODIGIOUS NOISE

Once in a dog's age or so the Symphony Orchestra does something sensation, flamboyant, circus-like—the orchestral equivalent of looping the loop or executing a triple somersault.

It offered one of these sensations yesterday when it performed for the first time the "Festliches Praeludium" that Richard Strauss wrote this very year for the dedication of the new Konzerthaus in Vienna.

The performance yesterday was by an augmented orchestra. Strauss asked for 130 musicians. Dr. Muck found room on the Symphony Hall stage for 110, which is about ten more than the orchestra can ordinarily boast of. The [illegible] by Wallace Goodrich, and there were extra wind players scattered through the body of the orchestra and grouped high up in a corner of the platform. Strauss also suggested buying patent foot bellows to keep the tone of the wood wind sustained, but this suggestion was rejected.

The chief result of this record-breaking array of regular and extra members of the orchestra was the most blatant, bombastic, hurrah-boys-hurrah sort of music ever heard in Symphony Hall. The Mahlerites who were grieved a few weeks ago by sundry remarks concerning their favorite "Giant Symphony" can now have their revenge. Strauss has won the blue ribbon for holiday noise. That was the only striking attribute of the composition—noise, plain noise. What little melody occurred from time to time was borrowed from other composers, notably Wagner and Weber.

Weingartner's "Lustige Overture" was also played yesterday for the first time at Symphony Hall. It suggests Richard Strauss at his best, and furnished a contrast to Strauss at his worst. It is modern in style, yet rather rich in melodies. The performance was thoroughly enjoyed. The hints of Viennese dances will help to make the piece popular.

Beethoven's first symphony, which was berated a century ago as too radical altogether, seemed amiable and ingenuous, compared with these twentieth century works, but either the third or fourth movement of it offered more inspiration and more genuine musical refreshment than may be found in a cargo of works by the new "masters." Weingartner, like Mahler, excels in songs; Strauss also in songs and in his famous tone poems and his new opera "Rosenkavalier."

The performance of the Beethoven number aroused great applause. Dr. Muck himself recognized the beautiful playing of the orchestra by bidding the men stand up to receive the plaudits of the very large audience.

Another artistic feature of the concert was the performance of the Schumann piano concerto in A minor, with Josef Hofmann as the soloist. The excellence of Mr. Hofmann's performance has not been approached here in recent years, so far as this particular concerto is concerned, except by the one given by Harold Bauer.

The same program will be repeated tonight.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 14, 1913.

MAGGIE TEYTE

Miss Maggie Ttyte will follow out a new idea at her song recital in Jordan Hall next Thursday at 3 o'clock, when she will devote the entire program to ultra modern songs, most of which have been written in the last three years. Her first group will be French songs by Debussy, Hue and Chabrier. The Villanelle of the Little Ducks," by Chabrier, is a specimen of caricature in music. The second group includes tw pieces by Zandonai, John Carpenter "Silhouettes" and Schindler's song "Marion," written to a poem by Georg Meredith. The third group begins wit a Chinese ode to words of Confuciu with music by Albert Roussel of France whose work is tinged with orienta color through his service in th navy of French China. Ignor Sta vinsky, the most talked about composer of last spring in Paris, where hi ballet "La Sacre du Printemps" me with catcalls and enthusiasm, will contribute a mystic song of the ancien Russian Flagellants, "The Sacred Dew, which in subject and musical structur is a sketch of the above mentione ballet. Moussorgsky is represented by humorous genre-picture, "The Chattering Magpie." The last group, whic Miss Teyte will sing in German, open with two seldom heard songs by Hug Wolf and finishes with "The Jolly Hermit" by Karol Szymanowsky and a la by the Russian Bleichman. Eight o the songs will be sung here for the firs time.

BEATRICE HARRISON

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the extraordinarily gifted English 'cellist, who i making her first tour of America this season, will give a recital in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 17, at 3 o'clock. Born of English-speaking parents in India she early showed signs of musical genius, and at the age of 10 won the gold medal offered by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London. About 4000 persons tried for the honor. After studying at the Royal College under Whitehouse, her parents sent her to Germany to study with Hugo Becker. She studied with him and then astonished the musical world by capturing the Mendelssohn prize, the first time this prize had been won by a 'cellist and the first time it had been won by so young a student. Miss Harrison at the time was only 17, and she is but four years older now. She recently met with extraordinary success in New York. Her program includes a sonata by Strauss, Bach's Suite in G major, Boccherini's Sonate in A major, Elegie by Faure and Papillons by Hamilton Harty.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The feature of the Symphony program to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Mozart's concerto for harp and flute. This has not been played at a Symphony concert for many years. The last performance was by Heinrich Schuecker and Charles Mole. It will serve to introduce as soloist to the Symphony patrons Alfred Holy, the new harpist of the orchestra, and Andre Maquarre.

The symphony will be Rachmaninoff's in [illegible] minor No. 2, played here thrice under Mr. Fiedler. The Rachmaninoff symphony will begin the program. The final number will be Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." The feature of the Christmas program for Dec. 26 and 27 will be the first performance by this orchestra of Ravel's little suite, "Mother Goose."

HANDEL AND HADYN.

Two performances of the "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Dec. 21, at 7:30, and Monday evening, Dec. 22, at 7:45 o'clock. This work has been given by the Handel and Haydn 127 times, but it is still a great delight to the musical public, and Christmas would not seem complete to many without its inspiration. The soloists for the Sunday performance are Miss Grace Kerns, Miss Adelaide Griggs, William W. Hicks and George H. Downing. For the Monday performance the solosts are Mme. Wilhelmina Wright Calvert, Miss Christine Miller, William H. Pagdin and William Hinshaw.

The sale of single tickets will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning at 8:30.

TREMONT TEMPLE CONCERT

Fine old songs and ballads will compose the bulk of the program at the third concert of the Tremont Temple course next Thursday evening. The singers will be Mme. Jeska Swartz-Morse of the Boston Opera Company, who has taken important roles as Haensel, Siebel and Suzuki, and Earl Cartwright, baritone, who has sung here with the Handel and Haydn and Cecilia. Emiliano Renaud, pianist, and John A. O'Shea, organist and accompanist, are well known locally. Mr. Renaud has just returned from a concert tour. Last season he toured the continent with Calve. One of the features of the concert will be Mr. Cartwright's singing of "Danny Deever." He will also sing "The Holy City" and Bullard's Stein song. Mme. Morse will sing "Dixie," "Sally in Our Alley" and "Ben Bolt," also Sullivan's "Lost Chord," with organ accompaniment, and the "Flower" song from "Faust."

RAPPOLD AND SPENCER

The illness of Mr. de Gogorza has made necessary a radical change in the program of the concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. Miss Eleanor Spencer, pianist, is to take his place. She will then make her debut in Boston. A native of Chicago, a pupil of William Mason, Leschititsky and Bauer, she has played with much success both in Europe and in New York city. The revised program is as follows:

Arabesque Novelette	Schumann
Miss Spencer.
Claerchen's Lied	Schubert
Es blinkt der Thau	Rubinstein
Waldeinsamkeit	Reger
Zueignung	Strauss
Mme. Rappold.
Variations Serieuses	Mendelssohn
Miss Spencer.
Jean	Spross
Two Roses	Gilberte
Early Morning	Graham Peel
Oft have I seen the Swift Swallows	Dell'Acqua
Mme. Rappold.
Waldesrauschen	Liszt
Seiree de Vienne	Schubert-Liszt
Miss Spencer.
Chere Nuit	Bachelet
Als die alte Mutter	Dvorak
In quelle trine morbide	Puccini
Vissi d' arte	Puccini
Mme. Rappold.

JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 15,

RAPPOLD AND MISS SPENCER IN CONCERT

Mme. Marie Rappold and Miss Eleanor Spencer gave a pleasing concert at Symphony Hall yesterday, but the size of the audience showed evidences of the disappointment caused by the unavoidable absence of De Gogorza, who is a Boston favorite and who has been away several years.

Miss Spencer, a newcomer, proved herself a pianist well worth hearing. Her technical power is well developed and consequently her performance of the brilliant Liszt numbers was as satisfactory to the audience as that of the less taxing Schumann and Mendelssohn selections.

Mme. Rappold, whose ability as a dramatic soprano is well known in Boston, sang songs in various languages agreeably.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 13,

Composer Found to Have Developed Device of Contrasting Large Volumes of Tone in Festival Piece for Orchestra

MR. HOFMANN PLAYS

Giving the first Boston performance of the "Festival Prelude" of Richard Strauss and presenting Josef Hofmann as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its eighth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon to warm applause. The works played were: Beethoven, first symphony in C major; Weingartner, "Merry Overture"; Schumann, piano concerto in A minor; Strauss, "Festival Prelude" for orchestra and organ.

With such resources as he had at his command, Dr. Muck could only make the "Festival Prelude" a duet of the brasses and the organ. If the quartet of tone departments could have been completed by reinforced string and wood choirs the effect would have had a splendor beyond anything yet accomplished in orchestral performance in Boston. As it was, the piece was a magnificent expression of the resistless onward social march of the times. Nobody who believes in the accomplishments and immediate promise of the twentieth century could hear this work and not rejoice.

The "Prelude" is not only a song of triumph. It is a presentation of a new style of instrumental technique. It opens the way for the development of the orchestra in a manner of writing that is frankly away from the old thematic and harmonic methods. Its melody is not that of "first subject" and "second subject," its harmony not that of four melodies corresponding in general idea to the four ranges of the human voice. The vocal restriction, which has fastened itself on symphonic music for a century and a quarter, is slipped off. The orchestra is no longer a greater string quartet, as the string quartet before it was only a wide-ranging group of soprano, contralto, tenor and bass voices; it is a quartet of tone departments, with organ at the foundation, with brass at the outer extreme and with strings and wood taking the inside positions.

The relation of one department to the other, however, is not, as in the old order, from the bottom to the top. The idea of various voice levels is replaced by that of voice assemblages all on the same level. Composers have been working toward such a scheme for a long time, but Strauss here has brought it for the first time fully to realization. He causes the listener to forget harmonized tone ranges altogether and think only of harmonized tone classes. Thus he makes orchestral music a counterpart of the modern social system, with vast groups working independently for the lesser affairs of life and working coordinately for the greater.

Mr. Hofmann, appearing for the third time in Boston this season, was the pianist of light touch and subdued tone that he knows how to be when he is out of the epoch of the earlier nineteenth century romanticists and in that of the later. He gave an interpretation of the Schumann concerto that was admirably in agreement with the style and sentiment of the composer. Mr. Hofmann is the stoutest self-disciplinarian on the concert stage. He will not play all works alike. He will not let today's performance tell you what tomorrow's will be. He will not submit to classification. He is a man of progress. He may bring us a stormy Schumann the next time he comes. Or he may bring us a gentle Beethoven. Whatever he does, he will make us listen and he will broaden our view of the classic field of composition.

Beethoven's first symphony was played with as delicate a bowing on the part of the violinists as if they had never done anything in their lives but work in the old repertory. Dr. Muck's baton had no motion in it that told of big Straussian rehearsals the past week.

The Weingartner overture had sympathetic presentation. The music is indeed merry in style, whether it is in inspiration or not. Many humorous effects of orchestration have new and effective application, perhaps studied, but undeniably interesting and to the point.

* * *

Alfred Holy, harpist, and Andre Maquarre, flutist, will present Mozart's concerto for harp and flute as a solo number at the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts of Dec. 19 and 20. Rachman hich Max Fiedler introduced to the rep- tory during his conductorship, is on the rogram, also Mendelssohn's overture, Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

At the Symphony concerts of Dec. 26 nd 27, Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose," ill be played.

Otto Urack, the assistant conductor f the orchestra, is to seek the applause f the public as a composer in January en his symphony in E major is to ve its Boston production.

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 13,

Dr. Muck in Rachmaninoff's Eloquent Symphony—The Cecilia and Schmitt's Mighty Psalm—A New and Remarkable 'Cellist—Miss Teyte and Her Novel Songs—The Sunday Concert—The Fullers Again—Minor Recitals

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

DR. MUCK delves diligently into the library of the Symphony Orchestra. There he discovered not long ago a Nocturne by Mozart for four little orchestras that he promptly put on one of his programmes. Now he has made another discovery, also from Mozart—a concerto for harp and flute, which will be played at the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Mr. Holy, the new harpist for one of the virtuosi and Mr. Maquarre, the justly admired first flutist, for the other. The symphony, to begin the concert, is Rachmaninoff's in E minor, that has pleased the average hearer of such music beyond any other contemporary symphony except Dvorak's "From the New World." Six times Mr. Fiedler led it before audiences that answered to the eloquence of its melodies and of their interplay, to the dramatic quality of the piece and to its harmonic and instrumental richness. Deservedly Dr. Muck will revive it once more. The overture, to end the concert, is Mendelssohn's familiar and amiable "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

Symphony Hall—The Cecilia

Seemingly Florent Schmitt is the discovered composer of the musical year in Boston. Two weeks ago, Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra made known his tone-poem, "The Tragedy of Salome"; before the winter is done, the Hoffmann Quartet will play his quintet for piano and strings; and next Thursday evening, the Cecilia will sing his setting of the Forty-Seventh Psalm—a masterpiece of contemperary choral music, a great song of praise to Jehovah as the omnipotent deity of a victorious Hebrew host, barbarically exultant, driving orchestra and chorus to the utmost of their power, glowing with color of many kinds, sweeping forward in magnificently rising flood. Whatever else it may be, it is music of fiery imagination and unquenchable and undaunted vigor: The Cecilia does well to perform it for the first time in America and to put the choir to the tests that it exacts. The regenerated Cecilia will sing the piece restored by Dr. Mees to its old virtues and with new added to them. It was good to hear last year and appreciative audiences encouraged it, by both which tokens it should now increase in good works. For foil to Schmitt's mighty psalm and for its own pleasant qualities stands Mr. Chadwick's cantata, "Noël" hitherto unheard in Boston. The Symphony Orchestra will be the orchestra of the concert and the solo singers are Mmes, Sundelius and Child and Messrs. Wheeler and Werrenrath.

Jordan Hall—Miss Harrison

Miss Beatrice Harrison, a young and comely woman, English by birth, German by training and—what is more important—one of the most distinguished of living violoncellists, will play for the first time in Boston at a recital of her own on Wednesday afternoon. Miss Harrison was the born 'cellist, with the instinct of a virtuoso and musician for the instrument. Training quickly ripened her and now young as she is, she ranks in Europe next to Mr. Casals, the present genius of the violoncello. What will more commend her to a part of her potential public in America, she is an interesting "personality" as well as an eminent virtuoso. Her programme proves her a "serious artist." It comprises a sonata by Strauss, another by Boccherini, a suite by Bach and two lighter "display" pieces.

Jordan Hall—Miss Teyte

Maggie Teyte courts daring ventures and being now an established singer in America with a dependable public, she usually reaps the excellent reward that her courage deserves. Strange as it may seem in a singer who can count upon an audience for herself, Miss Teyte keeps her eagerness for novel music and yet more incredibly seeks it not among overlooked classics, but in the songs that the youngest generation of composers write. More: having made her discoveries and chosen among them, she dares to fill a whole programme with her choice. Accordingly, when she sings next Thursday afternoon, her audience will hear novel songs by Debussy, Hüe, Chabrier and Roussel for French composers; by Stravinsky, Bleichmann and Moussorgsky for Russian; by Carpenter and Schindler for American; by Wolf for a German and only Szymanowsky for a Pole. Here is enough to whet many sorts of interest.

Symphony Hall—Sunday Concert

A familiar and agreeable singer, Mme. Rappold, who appears occasionally at the Metropolitan Opera House and who goes up and down the country for many concerts, and a new pianist, Miss Spencer, who was well received in New York the other day, will be heard tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Rappold's

---

SUNDAY GLOBE

DECEMBER 14,

Rappold and Spencer Today at Symphony Hall

The illness of Mr de Gogorza has made necessary a radical change in the program of the concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The management has secured the services of Miss Eleanor Spencer, pianist, to take Mr de Gogorza's place. Miss Spencer, who will make her debut in Boston at this concert, is preceded by a reputation which promises much for her. A native of Chicago, a pupil of William Mason, Leschititsky and Harold Butler, she has played with much success both in Europe and in New York city.

Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing the selections originally announced. The program is as follows:

Arabesque	Schumann
Novelette	Schumann
Miss Eleanor Spencer.
Clarchen's Lied	Schubert
Es blinkt der Thau	Rubinstein
Waldeinsamkeit	Reger
Zueignung	Strauss
Mme Marie Rappold.
Variations Serieuses	Mendelssohn
Miss Eleanor Spencer.
Jean	Spross
Two Roses	Gilberte
Early Morning	Graham Peel
Oft Have I Seen the Swift Swallows,	Dell' Acqua
Mme Marie Rappold.
Waldesrauschen	Liszt
Soiree de Vienne	Schubert-Liszt
Miss Eleanor Spencer.
Chere Nuit	Bachelet
Als die alte Mutter	Dvorak
In quelle trine morbide	Puccini
Vissi d'arte	Puccini
Mme Marie Rappold.

Mary Garden Tonight at Opera House Concert

Miss Garden will appear tonight as the principal attraction at the Opera House concert. She will sing an aria from Boito's "Mefistofele" and two groups of songs. Miss Garden will be assisted by Mme Cora Sapin, contralto; Jacques Jou-Jerville, tenor, and Alban Grand, baritone. The program in full will be as follows:

Overture, Oberon	von Weber
Orchestra
Melodie, A Toi	Bemberg
Mr Jou-Jerville
Aria from La Gioconda	Ponchielli
Miss Sapin
Stances from Lakme	Delibes
Mr Grand
Aria from Mefistofele	Boito
Miss Garden
Marche Hongroise from Damnation or Faust	Berlioz
Orchestra
Group of Songs	Various composers
Miss Garden
Aria from Manon	Massenet
Mr Jou-Jerville
Duet from Samson et Dalila	Saint-Saens
Miss Sapin-Mr Grand
Aria from Carmen	Bizet
Miss Garden

Miss Nielsen, who will return to Boston this week after a tour will be the feature at the concert next Sunday night. Her numbers will be operatic arias from "Mme Butterfly," "Rigoletto" and ballads. Mr Mordones and Mr Fornari will assist her.

Harold Henry's Recital Tomorrow in Jordan Hall

The young pianist, Harold Henry, will give a recital tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, in Jordan Hall, offering several selections that do not appear in the usual concert programs. Being an American, Mr Henry delights in music by Edward MacDowell, and he has placed his "Keltic" sonata in the third part of bill.

The other numbers include the Bach-Busoni prelude and fugue in D minor; "Rigaudon," by Rameau-Godowsky; concert-allegro, Scarlatti-Godowsky; intermezzos op. 118, No. 1, and op. 116, No. 4, Brahms; a barcarole and scherzo, Chopin; "La Vallee des Cloches," Ravel, and numbers by Cyril Scott, Alkan, Liszt and Isolde's "Liebestod," Wagner-Liszt.

Cecilia Society with Novelty at Season's First Concert

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees conductor, will give its first concert of the season Thursday evening at Symphony Hall. At this time Florent Schmitt's 46th Psalm will be sung for the first time in America. Mr Chadwick's Christmas cantata, "Noel," will complete the program. Schmitt's Psalm created a demonstration when sung at two Sunday Calonne concerts in Paris season before last.

The soloists at the concert will be Mrs Marie Sundelius, Mrs Bertha Cushing Child, William Wheeler and Reinald Werrenrath. John Marshall will be the organist, and there will be an orchestra. The Psalm is for orchestra chorus and soprano solo. "Noel" requires a quartet of singers with chorus and orchestra.

Beatrice Harrison, English 'Cellist, First Time Here

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the gifted young English 'cellist, who is making her first tour of America this season, is to give a recital in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 3.

Born of English-speaking parents in India she early showed signs of musical genius and at the age of 10 she won the gold medal offered by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music in London; about 4000 persons trying for the honor.

After studying at the Royal College under Whitehouse, the parents of the greatly gifted girl decided to send her to Germany, where she became the pupil of Hugo Becker, with whom she studied for a number of years and then astonished the entire musical world of Germany by capturing the Mendelssohn prize.

This was a great distinction for it was the first time this prize had been won by a 'cellist and it also was the first time it had been won by so young a student. Miss Harrison at the time was only 17. She is now 21.

Her program next Wednesday will begin with a sonata by Strauss; then will come Bach's suite, in G major; Boccherini's sonata, in A major, and the last number will be an "Elegie," by Faure, and "Papillons," by Hamilton Harty.

Maggie Teyte's Unusual Recital of Modern Songs

Miss Maggie Teyte will follow out a new idea at her song recital in Jordan Hall Thursday, Dec 18, at 3 o'clock, when she will devote the entire program to an exhibition of the latest creations in song, most of them which have been written in the last three years. Her first group will be French songs by Debussy, Hue and Chabrier. The "Villanelle of the Little Ducks" by Chabrier is one of the few specimens of real caricature in music.

[illegible] two pieces by [illegible]ndonal, [illegible]rpenter's "Silhouettes" and Schindler's song "Marian," written to a poem by George Meredith.

An Oriental atmosphere prevails through the third group which begins with a Chinese ode to words of Confucius, set to dainty music by Albert Roussel, a rising composer of France whose work is tinged with Oriental color through his long service in the Navy of French China.

Ignor Stravinsky, the most talked about composer of last Spring in Paris, where his ballet "La Sacre du Printemps" met with catcalls and enthusiasm equally divided will contribute a mystic song of the ancient Russian Flagellants called "The Sacred Dew," which both in subject and musical structure is a sketch of the above mentioned ballet. Finally Moussorgsky, the composer of Boris Gorounow, is represented by a humorous genre-picture "The Chattering Magpie" to words of Pushkin.

The last group which Miss Teyte will sing in German opens with two seldom heard numbers of Hugo Wolf and finishes with "The Jolly Hermit" by a young Polish composer, Karol Szymanowsky and a zephyr-lay by the Russian Bleichman.

Eight of the songs on the program will be sung in Boston for the first time.

Christmas "Messiah."

The Handel and Haydn Society will give its usual two performances of "The Messiah" Sunday evening, Dec 21, at 7:30 and Monday evening, Dec 22, at 7:45. The soloists for Sunday evening will be Miss Grace Kerns, Miss Adelaide Griggs, William W. Hicks and George H. Downing; those for the following performance, Mme Wilhelmina Wright Calvert, Miss Christine Miller, Wm. H. Pagdin and William Hinshaw.

HERALD.

DECEMBER 15. 1913.

BOSTON HEARS NEW PIANIST

Miss Eleanor Spencer in Sunday Concert with Mme. Rappold, Soprano.

MAKES GOOD IMPRESSION

Mme. Rappold Gives Spirited Performance and Pleases Fair-Sized Audience.

SYMPHONY HALL—Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano; Miss Eleanor Spencer, pianist; William Jananshek, accompanist. Program:

I.
Arabesque	Schumann
Novelette	Schumann
Miss Spencer.
II.
Clarchen's Lied	Schubert
Es blinkt der Thau	Rubinstein
Waldeinsamkeit	Reger
Zueignung	Strauss
Mme. Rappold.
III.
Variations Serieuses	Mendelssohn
Miss Spencer.
IV.
Chere Nuit	Bachelet
Als die alte Mutter	Dvorak
In quelle trine morbide	Puccini
Vissi d' arte	Puccini
Mme. Rappold.
V.
Waldesrauschen	Liszt
Soiree de Vienne	Schubert-Liszt
Miss Spencer.
VI.
Jean	Spross
Two Roses	Gilberte
Early Morning	Graham Peel
Oft have I seen the Swift Swallows	Dell' Acqua
Mme. Rappold.

Miss Spencer took the place originally allotted to Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The illness of Mr. De Gogorza had made the change necessary. It was Miss Spencer's first appearance in Boston. A native of Chicago, a pupil of William Mason, Leschititsky and Bauer, she was said to have played with great success in Europe and in New York city.

This is easily believed. Yesterday she made a very favorable impression upon an audience that was disposed to be critical. The two Schumann pieces, with which she opened the program, were sharply contrasted. The "Arabesque" was given with appropriate lightness and delicacy of touch. The "Novelette" was played with vigor, but without violence. The "Variations Serieuses" were effectively played; but Miss Spencer's greatest triumph came in her closing numbers, after playing which she was favored with two recalls. She is young and decidedly attractive.

Mme. Rappold is rightly described as a dramatic soprano. Dramatic power can be used with effect in concert as well as in opera. Mme. Rappold's style is strikingly different from that of Mme. Gadski, who sang here recently.

One can easily picture her in parts calling for the exhibition of strong emotion, anger or indignation. Her performance of yesterday was spirited. Of the technical excellence of her work it is unnecessary to speak, but, listening to her, one felt the pleasure and satisfaction that any piece of good workmanship will give. The English songs, as usual, stirred most applause. The last piece on the program, "Oft Have I Seen the Swift Swallows," was sung with extraordinary brilliancy, and a recall number was listened to with keen delight. There was a fair-sized audience.

[82]

LD. SATU

DECEMBER 20,

REHEARSAL IN SYMPHONY HALL

Orchestra Performs Pieces by Rachmaninoff, Mozart and Mendelssohn.

DR. MUCK AS CONDUCTOR

Skilful Execution of Concerto for Flute and Harp One Feature.

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 2	Rachmaninoff
Concerto for flute and harp	Mozart
Overture "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn

Rachmaninoff's Symphony was played for the fourth time within three years and a half, and it thus has had better fortune than the majority of modern works played at these concerts once and then put aside, or brought out only after a long interval. When this symphony was first heard it made an immediate impression, and one so favorable that the composer might have been disturbed. The music was then performed in a flamboyant manner, and the display of speed and force in the performance excited the nerves of the audience.

With each repetition the diffuseness is more and more apparent and the over-elaboration in treatment does harm to the musical thought. To dismiss a work as too long is not searching criticism, but a work may be so fascinating by charm of material and ingenuity of workmanship that the length is not observed.

Rachmaninoff thought leisurely and wrote with exasperating attention to detail. What is the line in "Measeure for Measure"? "This will last out a night in Russia, when nights are longest there." The introduction does not give the hearer the idea that it is an introduction; he begins to regard it as a movement in itself. The chief themes in the four movements do not have great distinction, broad and sweeping as they are. When they are most effective they remind one of Tschaikowsky, and there are mannerisms of that composer in the detail, in the orchestral dress of certain harmonic progressions, in the unwillingness to dismiss a phrase and the giving it to one group of instruments after another. Much of this music is purely decorative, music that Glazounoff might make—since he is now a creature of routine—music that has pomp and glitter, but no true vitality.

When this symphony is played today the Scherzo seems the most spontaneous movement. This does not speak well of a symphony as a work of art. The Adagio has fine moments, but it is intolerably spun out. The performance yesterday brought out in clearest light all that is best in the music, and there was greater admiration aroused for leader and orchestra than for the symphony itself.

Mozart wrote his concerto for flute and harp, two instruments that he held in abomination, for the Duke de Guines and his daughter. The father was a famous flute player; the daughter, according to Mozart's description, was a "magnificent" harpist. She took lessons of Mozart in composition. He soon found her stupid and lazy, but he was in bad humor that spring, and hardly anything pleased him in Paris. The duke was shabby in paying for lessons, and when the autumn came he had not paid for the concerto. Mozart's letters to his father about his relations with this noble family are more entertaining than the concerto, which has been played here at Symphony concerts and with piano instead of orchestra in chamber concerts. Two movements are sometimes performed, and two are enough. Even when the flutist and the harpist are as skilled virtuosos as Mr. Marquarre and Mr. Holy. For a few minutes the combination of instruments is charming and soothing, and there is a delightful old-world flavor; but such pleasure quickly palls.

When we hear the overtures to "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Fingal's Cave" and portions of the "First Walpurgis Night," we then know how narrowly Mendelssohn escaped being a great composer. If he had not been so carefully reared, flattered from his youth up! If he had not developed into a prig! If he had not been uniformly prosperous!

The program next week will be as follows: Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Juon, "Waechter-Weise"; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin (Mr. Noack); Berlioz, overture, "Rob Roy." The compositions by Ravel and Juon will be played here for the first time.

ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 20,

DOUBLE CONCERTO AT THE SYMPHONY

NUMBER WAS PLAYED WITH RARE BRILLIANCY

But Even Then Artistic Resources of Messrs. Maquarre and Holy Were Not Fully Displayed.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor, No. 2.
Mozart—Concerto for Harp and Flute.
Soloists, Messrs. Holy and Maquarre.
Mendelssohn—Overture. "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Rachmaninoff like a poultice came to heal the wounds of Strauss. After all the [illegible] tumult of Strauss's Festal Prelude of the week before, there seemed to be no dead or wounded left upon the field of battle, and many returned to music with new zest. Yet there was a time when Rachmaninoff was deemed very modern, but after what we have been through he seemed melodic and gentle.

Yet the Rachmaninoff E minor symphony is written for a large orchestra, and is not greatly addicted to tunes. It is not quite so impressive a work as the "Isle of the Dead" by the same composer. All the modern mystery is there, however, and one is expected to unravel the meaning of sighs and explosions, of tip-toeings and mutterings. But no inkling is given as to what these things mean. It has become the fashion for some recent composers (Mahler, for example) to tell a story in tones and leave the hearers to guess what it is all about.

Your true modern never finishes his long tale without presenting his contrapuntal credentials. Strauss, Mahler, Rachmaninoff, and many others, will always interrupt their tonal troubles long enough to give the auditor a fugue. The fugue in the Scherzo of this symphony is ascetic enough to be heard as penance during Lent, rather than at the Christmas season. But it has a most original subject, which is remarkable in these days when new fugal subjects are deemed impossible. There is a certain continuity attained in this work by thematic transferences from one movement to another. Like the finale of Brahms' C minor symphony, the finale of this Russian work is full of reminiscences of the earlier portions of the composition, but it is by no means such a masterpiece as the Brahms finale; the first movement is, on the whole, the most impressive and masterly. There are many thrills for the auditor in the first movement, from pianissimo shivers to fierce kettle-drum explosions. And, in parenthesis, we ought to say here that our kettle-drummer is an exceptional artist on this humble instrument. We wish that some time he might be rewarded by being allowed to play Tausch's Kettle-drum concerto, in which the kettle-drummer for once (with five kettle-drums), becomes the soloist of the orchestra. It would be more enjoyable than some modern works, and would be a curiosity in addition.

The Scherzo is, as already intimated, not a Scherzo, although a few dance-rhythms do bubble up in it. But the Adagio is very noble and carried up to an effective climax. This and especially the first movement, seem to us the best portions of the work. Of course it deals in woe and grief, or it would not be Russian, but it is a more dignified style of lamentation than we sometimes find in Rachmaninoff's teacher and model, Tschaikowsky. Undoubtedly this symphony is entitled to a high rank in modern music. One is by no means bored by hearing it again and again, and each successive time brings new beauties to light. Only the Finale seems fragmentary, and full of suggestions rather than of revelations, or of fulfilment. The performance was most dignified and lofty. Happy is the modern composer who has Dr. Muck and his orchestra as his interpreters. There was no intense enthusiasm over the work (although considerable applause), and we fear that this earnest and at times great composition will remain "Caviare to the general" for some time to come.

The Mozart Concerto seemed rather thin and diluted after such a broadly scored work, like a five o'clock tea after a wild Russian banquet, but it excited curiosity. It is a well-known fact that Mozart did not love the flute, and this concerto was put forth as a business proposition, musical notes searching for bank-notes. The story of the causes which led to the work were properly given by Mr. Hale in his interesting programme-book.

But we must remember also that both of the solo instruments of this concerto were in a more primitive state than they are now when the composition was written. The double-action pedal harp had not been even dreamed of at that time, and the single-action instrument was semi-diatonic in character. The flute also was confined to fewer keys than at present and became unmanageable if one modulated very much or went far away from the key of D. The Boehm flute came about a half-century later. If Mouquet, who wrote the excellent "Pipe of Pan" for the flute, would only go further in the orchestral direction we might begin to comprehend the possibilities of the under-rated instrument.

The resources of Mr. Holy's concert harp, and of Mr. Maquarre's Boehm flute, were therefore not fully displayed by any means, but the suavity of the music and its melodic grace was none the less charming. It was, however, too continuously sweet and it demanded a much smaller hall for its best effect. The cadenzas seemed comparatively modern, but the work is scarcely suited to the modern programmes. It is needless to state how perfectly Mr. Maquarre played. Every concert-goer knows what a true artist he is; [illegible] Mr. Holy, also showed [illegible]

In these days of constant programme-music the Mendelssohn overture may teach a lesson as to the limitations of picture-painting in instrumental music. The introduction pictures utter flatness upon the sea, such as Coleridge suggests when he wrote the lines:

"As idle as a painted ship,
Upon a painted ocean."

Goethe's poem is more majestic in its picture of utter stillness at sea (it inspired Beethoven and Schubert as well as Mendelssohn), but is often mistranslated as "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," whereupon the auditor who has no programme-book at once imagines a smiling sea and a ship crossing it. What kind of a fancy he wreathes around the long, long A of the strings we cannot imagine, but that many have utterly misinterpreted the composer's picture is undoubted and is a strong proof of the limitations of instrumental music in portraying definite things.

The performance of the work was eloquent. The heavy dulness of the torpid sea, the sudden puff of wind after a dead calm, the bos'n's whistle on the piccolo, the ship then moving on triumphantly to its happy port, the joy at the German equivalent for "Land Ho!" ("Schon seh' ich das Land") were all dramatically portrayed by Dr. Muck's reading. It is not so great a sea-scape as Mendelssohn's "Hebrides," nor so tuneful a one as his "Fair Melusina," but it is much superior to some of the sea-sick spells which some of the ultra-radicals have brought into music recently, and the trumpets blew their final blasts and the kettle-drummer banged with right good will as the wind-jammer came flying into port and tied up at the wharf, and the piece and the concert ended.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 20.

MUCK DOES JUSTICE TO SYMPHONY

Makes Rachmaninoff Interesting—Paderewski a Listener

BY OLIN DOWNES

Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, a concerto for harp and flute, in the performance of which the solo parts were taken by Messers. Holy, harpist, and Maquarre, flutist, of the orchestra, and finally, Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," made the programme of the 9th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MADE DEEP IMPRESSION

Rachmaninoff's symphony, introduced here by Mr. Fiedler in 1910, made a deep impression on Symphony audiences. It is, at least, a first rate second class work. Some of us did not take the pains to stay for Mendelssohn's mellifluous overture yesterday. May not the day come when this admirable symphony of Rachmaninoff will have as platitudinous a character as Mendelssohn's negligible overture? And what will be the relative valuation of the "Scotch" symphony and Rachmaninoff's music 50 years hence? The "Scotch" symphony, too, is a piece of admirable writing. It, too, is classic in form and romantic in feeling.

The singular thing about this symphony of Rachmaninoff's is its extreme conservatism. This work could have been written at least 30 years ago. There are pages of Tschaikowsky which are ultra-modern by the side of it, and in these days, when things are moving so fast for better or worse, Tschaikowsky has been dead for 20 years and Rachmaninoff is still a young man.

A Continuous Breath

But it is a good symphony. Above all, there is real development of a germinal idea. There is a long and continuous breath. There is nobility of proportion, a fine arrangement of climax, and an equally admirable and natural recurrence of moments of repose. Again, like Mendelssohn, the instrumentation is a constant delight to the ear, by reason of its clearness, richness and brilliancy. The ink has not sputtered. It has flowed from Rachmaninoff's pen. He had so many excellent ideas that his first movement, especially, is overloaded with detail. But perhaps this is hypercritical. Perhaps this is looking too far ahead. Let it be sufficient for the day that a modern composer shows the rarest mastery of the classical form, without, however, while adhering to classic formulas, so far forgetting his original intentions as to lose an iota of the sincerity and authenticity of his inspiration.

Learned From Germans

Rachmaninoff has learned from the Germans as well as from Tschaikowsky, his countryman—yet in this work he is specifically Russian—not bearishly so, not in the Tartar manner of more violent pages of Tschaikowsky, or with the extreme orientalism of the Caucasus, but in the curve of his melody, in his rhythms, in his harmonic dress, unmistakably a Russian, though [illegible] so civilized that an audience in the very middle of Germany could listen to this plausible and picturesque piece of music with pleasure and without misgivings.

---

Dr. Muck led an admirable performance. He made places where the music becomes thin or mediocre in its quality interesting and of a higher artistic value than could have been supposed, and he did complete justice to the very romantic mood of the music.

Paderewski a Listener

The audience listened with eager attention and applauded until the conductor called his men to their feet with him. To this symphony Mr. Ignace Paderewski was listening attentively, and appreciatively, back of the stage.

Mr. Maquarre displayed his art to the utmost advantage in Mozart's delightful concerto, and Mr. Holy played with marked musicianship and—to one wholly ignorant of the harp and its mechanism—with technical sureness and adequacy. The concerto is better than might have been supposed. The solo passages are usually idiomatic, for the instruments, in spite of the very elementary character of the harp of Mozart's time; the concerto is graceful and lively, and the slow movement has much very beautiful music. The soloists were recalled, and the conclusion of the concert was a festive one.

JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 20,

HARPIST MAKES SYMPHONY DEBUT

Europe's Celebrated Artist, Alfred Holy, Appears as Soloist.

Europe's most celebrated harpist, Alfred Holy, made his formal debut here yesterday as a member of the Symphony Orchestra. With Andre Maquarre, the leading flute player of the orchestra, he appeared as soloist in the performance of the Mozart concerto for flute and harp in C major, which has not been heard at these concerts for more than twenty years.

The music is gay and blithesome, after the manner that Mozart cultivated more successfully than any other composer has done, yet it suffers somewhat for the reason that the flute and the harp are not popular instruments, like the violin or the piano. A little of them is generally enough. Mozart himself cared little for either one of them, yet his music is always graceful and glowing with spontaneity.

The concerto proved exceptionally entertaining yesterday as a revelation of Mozart's melodic genius and of the brilliant virtuosity of the soloists. The most captious critic would not ask for a finer performance. The audience applauded Mr. Holy and Mr. Maquarre enthusiastically.

The orchestra received an ovation after its performance of Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which leads this week's program. The work itself is essentially lyrical and therefore popular. It is too long drawn out, but this defect was more than balanced yesterday by the beautiful playing of the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's tone poems, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," make up the final number on this melodious program.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

DECEMBER 20,

RACHMANINOFF'S SYMPHONY REPEATED

Noble Work Given Superb Performance.

Mozart Concerto Played in the Vein by Messrs Maquarre and Holy.

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor a performance yesterday afternoon that will live in the memory as one of surpassing emotional strength and beauty. The work was twice played here by Mr Fiedler. It lasts over an hour, and the natural conclusion is that it is too long. There are passages which might be eliminated or curtailed, but the composer's thought never seemed of more continuous vitality, more significant and compelling. Nor did the last movement—in which the wings of the composer or the zest of the hearer both often falter or decline—seem the one from which excisions should be made.

When Rachmaninoff visited this city, and at a Symphony concert appeared as a pianist in his own concerto and as a conductor of his "Isle of the Dead," it will be remembered how an artistic restraint, a repression, marked all his methods and stamped his personality. It was the interior, the hidden, the psychic beauty that moved him. Perhaps his own hand scarcely could have made his purposes and his thoughts [illegible] than they became yesterday [illegible]

The opening theme, as it was heard yesterday with its troubled harmony as a vaguely disturbing subconscious thought, might have been music from another world, strange, tireless in its restive searching, always seeking the answer, the fulfilment that never comes. Music of sombre, brooding seriousness, yet not weakly repining, not morbid, not pathological or banal as some pages of Tschaikowsky, although fleeting parallel formulas and colors are heard, even as there are allusions to Puccini. But the individuality of the work is unquestioned. Who else of the present-day writers of music invites men to the contemplation of the labyrinths, the unexplored wildernesses, the deserts and the gardens of the soul with such tranquility, with a calmness as near impersonal?

His thoughts are not above those who know drudgery and they are never sordid. They are expressed in no arbitrary or fixed relation to life, yet they are vital and stimulating to mind and emotion, with that elasticity and universality that determines the worth of all great art. Nor were these pages unduly illusive yesterday through the magic of a rendition that gave the semblance of merit where it did not inherently exist.

Had he been present, the composer must have recognized with gratitude the penetrating mind and spirit of his work, one which in the presence of the great unknown loves philosophy, but without sophistry or vagueness, humor and humanity, without flippancy or the commonplace, compassion, but without weakness or self-commiseration.

Mozart's concerto for flute and harp was played with a nice sense of its graces, its airy lightness and its clarity and elegance of form by Mr Maquarre, the first flute, and Mr Holy, the harpist of the orchestra. Mr Marquarre's tone and style, as always, were models of purity and taste, and Mr Holy won admiration by the fluency with which he played melodies of running passages. The cadenzas by the two instruments were as the discourse of two well-beloved companions. Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" closed the program.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

Y, DECEMBER 20,

Work First Presented Under Max Fiedler Wins Praise of House With Karl Muck Interpreting —Harp, Flute in Solo Piece

MENDELSSOHN HEARD

Presenting Rachmaninoff's symphony No. 2 in E minor, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp and Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its ninth public rehearsal Friday afternoon. The soloists were Mr. Maquarre, the flutist and Mr. Holy, the harpist of the orchestra.

The interest of audiences in musical programs in the holiday season is lukewarm. There may be a large attendance at a concert as there was at Symphony hall when the Rachmaninoff symphony was revived and yet there will not be the same enthusiasm for the performance as earlier and later in the season. The house at this time of the year takes the orchestra as it would take an entertainer. It does not give that impartial and critical heed which is usual with it.

It is the public that reads a symphony, not the conductor. And the credit of all musical performance finally belongs to the world that listens rather than to the men who manipulate the baton and the fiddlesticks. But the custom of musical folks is to give the director of an orchestra all the praise and all the blame for results. It is the custom of that folk also to compare one conductor with another and to give preference to this or that man's readings, just as though he was really responsible for them.

Any conductor who is asked whether he or the public is the interpreter will promptly respond that he is. He is sure of it. He proves it by explaining how he makes his men play a piece according to his individual study of it; by declaring that he would never let the people who sit in the auditorium influence him in the slightest. He avers that only inferior artists ever consult the preferences of their listeners.

Thus he get the whole question out of focus. The subtle thing we all know as the expression of the sentiment of a community through music could never be what this or that influential person or group of persons want said. It could not even be what a whole audience, even a regular subscription audience, like that of the Friday rehearsals want said. The rehearsal audience has the responsibility of reporting back to the community how public artistic feeling gets stated at the concerts. Its individual influence is not what guides interpretation any more than the conductor's is. And its indifferent holiday mood can have no substantial effect on the situation.

To fall in with the convenient formula of criticism and to discuss the perform-

[illegible]ance of the Rachmaninoff symphony as a product of the conductor's own thinking, listeners must confess that they find the Karl Muck year 1913 behind the Max Fiedler year 1910. The new technical methods of the orchestra do not favor understanding of the Russian composer. In 1910 the symphony in E minor was a vital picture of manners, a novel depicting the life of the men and women of modern days. It was a glowing document of the times. In 1913 it is a study in musical mechanics.

Expert mechanical engineers say that they can go into an industrial plant when the power is on and can tell by the vibration of the floors whether the engines are running with perfect smoothness and whether the machines are giving an efficient account of all the steam or electrical energy that is being expended on them. A musical engineer entering Symphony hall on Friday afternoon could tell that every department of tone in the orchestra was working without waste and precisely according to the layout of the notes on the pages of the book.

Is it musical interpretation, getting things in such systematic running order? Is it orchestral effect, having every bar of the music measured out correct to the millimeter? Perhaps so. Mechanical energy perfectly organized is an ideal of the period. Musical energy organized perfectly to the demands of time and tune well parallels the industrial ideal. This, too, may be defended as a document, though perhaps its name is ledger or earning sheet, instead of novel or essay.

HERALD, BOSTON,

DECEMBER 21, 1913.

CHRISTMAS SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck in making his program for the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra has followed the tradition established long ago by Mr. Gericke of putting on at least one work of popular nature. The work for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Ravel's Children's Suite, "Mother Goose." This will be its first performance by the Symphony Orchestra.

Another novelty will be "Watcherweise" by Paul Juon. Paul Juon is a Russian by birth, but for many years has been a resident of Berlin. He is known here chiefly by his chamber music. His symphonic poem "Waechterweise" is built on Danish folk songs. The other orchestral number will be the "Rob Roy" overture of Berlioz.

Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master of the orchestra, will play Mendelssohn's Concerto.

TITTA RUFFO

Titta Ruffo, the most sensational baritone of our time, will make his debut in Boston in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3:30 o'clock. Ruffo is the exception of the long accepted rule that a baritone may never hope to achieve the popular favor and the financial rewards which go to great tenors. There are only two singers before the public that receive larger fees than Ruffo—Caruso and Melba—for Ruffo's contract calls for payment of $2000 for every appearance whether it be in opera or in concert. The name of Ruffo has long been famous in Italy, South America and Russia, where the greater part of his career has been spent, and it was not until November, 1912, that he made his first appearance in this country. He was brought to America by the Chicago Opera Company and a millionaire of Philadelphia guaranteed his fee. He made his debut in Philadelphia as "Rigoletto," and afterwards sang "Hamlet" in New York, besides giving two concerts in the latter city. Later he sang in Chicago. No tenor has received greater applause and greater adoration from the general public. As he will not be heard in opera in Boston the musical public of this city must be content with his concert appearance, Jan. 11.

BAUER AND THIBAUD

It is 10 years since Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, made his only tour of America, at which time he gave a concert in Boston. Few violinists have made such a deep impression on their hearers as did this modest young Frenchman, and his return to America this year is regarded as an event of more than ordinary importance. Next Sunday, Dec. 28, he will appear in Symphony Hall at 3:30, associated with the justly admired pianist, Harold Bauer.

Mr. Thibaud is not merely the foremost French violinist of the day but is one of the most popular violinists in Europe. It is said of him that he has made French music popular in Berlin and German music popular in Paris. He is a native of Bordeaux, where he was born in 1880. A pupil of Marsick, he took the first prize in the Paris Conservatory in 1896, and while he was still in the conservatory he made famous the Concerts Rouges which, while he led the orchestra, were the prevailing fad of musical Paris. Later he went with Colonne as solo violinist.

The appearance of Harold Bauer in Boston is always a welcome event, and this will be his first concert here this season. The program will be as follows:

Sonata for Violin and Piano in A [illegible]
Messrs. Bauer and Thibaud.
Violin Soli:
Sarabande
Gigue
Chaconne ....Bach
Mr. Thibaud.
Piano Soli—Faschingsschwank..........Schumann
Mr. Bauer.
Sonata in A for Violin and Piano (Kreutzer), Op. 47..........Beethoven
Messrs. Bauer and Thibaud.

OPERA CONCERT

Mme. Alice Nielsen will appear in concert for the first time this season at the Boston Opera House tonight. She has been touring the continent and rejoined the Boston Opera Company only yesterday. She will have the aid of some of the best artists in the company and the orchestra of 75 players.

Overture, "Tannhaeuser"................Wagner
Orchestra.
Aria from "Huguenots"..............Meyerbeer
Mr. Mardones.
Aria from "Madame Butterfly"..........Puccini
Miss Nielsen.
Figaro's song from "Barber of Seville".Rossini
Mr. Fornari.
Aria from "Rigoletto"....................Verdi
"Peer Gynt" Suite No. 1..................Grieg
Orchestra.
Duet from "Linda di Chamounix"....Donizetti
Messrs. Mardones, Fornari.
Songs—
"The Lark Now Leaves His Watery Nest"
Parker
'Last Rose of Summer"...................Moore
'Leaves and the Wind"....................Leoni
'Fairy Pipers"..........................Brewer
Miss Nielsen.
Toreador song from "Carmen"..............Bizet
Mr. Mardones.
Sextet, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Mmes. Nielsen, Heyman, Messrs. Tanlongo, Mardones, Fornari, Giaccone.

SUNDAY POST,

DECEMBER 21,

Bauer and Thibaud at Symphony Hall

It is 10 years since Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, made his only tour of America, at which time he gave a concert in Boston. Few violinists have made such a deep impression on their hearers as did this modest young Frenchman, and his return to America this year is regarded as an event of more than ordinary importance. Next Sunday, Dec. 28, he will appear in Symphony Hall at 3:30, associated with the justly admired pianist, Harold Bauer.

The appearance of Harold Bauer in Boston is always a welcome event, and this will be his first concert here of the current season. Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud will play the lovely sonata of Cesar Franck in A and Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata." Each of them will play groups of short pieces. The programme is as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano in A.Cesar Franck
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud.
Violin soli ....Bach
Mr. Thibaud.
Piano solo, "Faschingsschwank"...Schumann
Mr. Bauer.
Sonata in A for violin and piano (Kreutzer), op. 47..............Beethoven
Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud.

CHRISTMAS SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck in making his programme for the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra has followed the tradition established long ago by Mr. Gericke of putting on at least one work of popular nature. The work in question to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Ravel's Children's Suite, "Mother Goose." This will be its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was played last winter at a concert in the Boston Opera House and was played also with much success in New York. Ravel belongs to the group of younger Frenchmen who for several years dominated the musical affairs of Paris.

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Children's suite, "Mother Goose"......Ravel
"Wachterweise" ....Paul Juon
Concerto for violin and orchestra.Mendelssohn
Overture, "Rob Roy"................Berlioz

TITTA RUFFO

Titta Ruffo, perhaps the most sensational baritone of our time, will make his debut in Boston in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11, at 3:30. Ruffo is the exception of the long-accepted rule that a baritone may never hope to achieve the popular favor and the financial rewards which go to great tenors. There are but two singers before the public who receive larger fees than Ruffo: Caruso and Melba; for Ruffo's contract calls for payment of $2000 for every performance, whether it be in opera or in concert. The name of Ruffo has long been famous in Italy, South America and Russia, where the greater part of his career has been spent, and it was not until November, 1912, that he made his first appearance in this country. He was brought to America by the Chicago Opera Company, a millionaire of Philadelphia having guaranteed his fee. He made his American debut in Philadelphia as Rigoletto and afterward sang Hamlet in New York, besides giving two concerts in the latter city. Later he sang in Chicago.

BAUER AND THIBAUD

Thibaud and Bauer Next Sun

Jacques Thibaud, the eminent F violinist, who has not visited B for 10 years, will appear next Su afternoon at Symphony Hall in co with Harold Bauer, the pianist. baud has established a high reput in Europe not only as violinist b conductor. The program will co Cesar Franck's and the "Kreu sonatas, Schumann's "Fasching wank" for piano and three piece Bach for violin.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

DECEMBER 21.

Dr Muck's Christmas Music

Christmas time is a leveler of ages. Pity to him who finds it uncovers no latent, lurking impulse or memory of childhood. Intervening, sober, adult years are no impediment, and all who would cherish the happiness of undimmed youth will recross the bridge during these days to the land of make-believe.

Dr Muck is going to help all honest souls who despite an untoward world would still believe in fairies, by playing Ravel's children's suite, "Mother Goose," at the week's Symphony concerts.

The five little pieces to be heard at this time originally were composed for piano (four hands) and for the diversion of two children—Mimi and Jean Godebski. At their first performance, which took place at a concert of the Independent Musical Society in Paris, in April, 1910, the pieces were interpreted by two little Misses, Mlles Christine Verger and Germaine Duramy, respectively 6 and 10.

Later Ravel rearranged the work as a short ballet, which was performed at the Theatre of Arts in January, two years ago. The characters were diverse and numerous—Fiorine, the Beauty; the Fairy, Prince Charming, the Green Serpent Laideronnette, the serving Empress of the Pagodes; the Beast, two gentlemen, maid of honor, two ladies of the bedchamber, Tom Thumb and his six brothers, three birds, three little negroes, and finally, Love.

In the orchestral version there will be five divisions.

1. "Parane of the Sleeping Beauty," but 20 measures long, based on the story of the princess who because of the old witch's curse fell asleep when she pricked her finger on the spindle of a spinning wheel and was awakened 100 years afterward by the kiss of the Prince Charming.

2. "Hop o' My Thumb," prefixed by a quotation from Perrault's tale in which little Tom expresses his dismay that the birds had eaten up all the crumbs that were to guide him and his little brothers out of the woods.

3. "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes," in which Laideronnette, who according to the Countess d'Aulnoy's story, was the daughter of a king and queen, and had been cursed by a wicked fairy and ordained to grow up the most hideous woman in the world; how she lived apart attended by a green serpent, who, after following her to sea to the island of the pagodes, strange little creatures whose bodies were made of diamonds, emeralds and precious stones, was restored to his human shape and Laideronnette given her beauty.

4. "Beauty and the Beast," from the familiar tale of the maiden who redeemed the prince from his sad condition, metamorphosed into a beast by her offer to marry him. The fifth and last division is called "The Fairy Garden."

Another novelty will be "Wachterweise," by Paul Juon.. Paul Juon is a Russian by birth, but for many years has been a resident of Berlin. He is known here chiefly by chamber music played by the Kneisel Quartet and the Longy Club. His swmphonic poem "Wachterweise" is built on Danish folk songs. The other orchestral number will be the "Rob Roy" Overture of Berlioz.

Sylvain Noack, the second cornet master of the orchestra, will make his annual appearance as soloist, playing the Mendelssohn Concerto. The program in its proper order is as follows: Ravel, Children's Suite, "Mother Goose"; Paul Juon, "Wachterweise"; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Berlioz, Overture, "Rob Roy."

"Messiah" Concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society

The annual performances of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society will be given in Symphony Hall this evening at 7.30 and tomorrow evening at 7:45. This work has been given by the society 127 times, and it continues to delight the chorus and attract large audiences, whose Christmas would not seem complete without its inspiration. The soloists at tonight's performance are Miss Grace Kerns, soprano; Miss Adelaide Griggs, alto; William W. Hicks, tenor, and George H. Downing, bass.

Tomorrow evening the soloists will be Mme Wilhelmina Wright Calvert, soprano; Miss Christine Miller, alto; William H. Padgin, tenor, and William Hinshaw, bass.

The other announcements for the season include Saint-Saens' oratorio, "Samson and Delilah," with Mme Jeanne Gerville Reache, Dan Beddoe, Earl Cartwright and Willard Flint, soloists. This will be given Sunday evening, Feb 8, 1914. Easter Sunday, April 12, Gounod's "Redemption" will be sung, Mrs Grace Bonner Williams, Miss Nora Burns, Lambert Murphy, Earl Cartwright and Oscar Hunting singing the principal parts.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 20,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DULL MOZART AND INTERESTING RACHMANINOFF

A Wearisome Revival of a Concerto for Flute and Harp—Dr. Muck's Justice to Mendelssohn's Sea-Pictures — The Russian Makes a Symphony Drama in Tones —The Purpose and the Means

FOR thirty minutes yesterday afternoon the audience at the Symphony Concert listened—or in many instances pretended to listen—to a concerto for flute, harp and small orchestra, written by Mozart, played in the solo parts by Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Holy of the band, and revived "for the first time at these concerts" in twenty years. Mozart wrote the piece to order during one of his visits to Paris for a nobleman who happened to play the flute and for his daughter who amused herself with the harp. He did not exhaust his invention in the devising of melodies for it. They are distinctly of the sort that the press agents of the musical plays call "whistle-y." He spent as few pains upon his development and manipulation of them. Enough that he adapted the music to the skill of the noble virtuosi and kept it well within the most agreeable range of the two instruments. Of course, Mr. Holy and Mr. Maquarre played the solo parts fluently and elegantly, with all the graces of technique and tone, limpid song and tinkling arabesque that the music asked. Yet almost every week, they give ampler and finer proof of their virtuosity with their instruments and of their intelligence and feeling with music, in the ordinary course of their work as the first harpist and the first flutist of the orchestra.

For years the public of the Symphony concerts has known Mr. Maquarre as the ablest flute player that any orchestra in America possesses. It is quickly discovering that Mr. Holy is no less a master of the harp. Deservedly the audience yesterday welcomed the two virtuosi with warm applause. If the concerto was revived to display their abilities, then was the revival superfluous. It is impossible to believe that such trivial and sterile music was resurrected on any theory of its intrinsic merit or interest. If, finally, the concerto was played as a diversion for the listeners, it failed unmistakably of its purpose. The audience yawned, fidgetted and fled under it; read the programme book that the learned programmist had foreseeingly filled with interesting miscellany, and even checked off lists of Christmas gifts. At the end the applause was the tepid clapping of relief. Not within long recollection has thick tedium so settled upon a Symphony Concert or precious time for real music been so wasted.

Those that endured to the end had their reward in Dr. Muck's "reading" of Mendelssohn's familiar overture of the sea. He did not let it pass as a mere repertory piece played in routine fashion; for Dr. Muck, having a troublesome artistic conscience, treats no music in that summary and easy-going way. No more did he regard the overture merely as an established classic to be set forth efficiently in clear and elastic integrity. Rather he played it as a piece of tone-picturing that a composer might have handed him the week before last and so playing it, gave it new vitality, restored it, as it were, to itself and made it as young and fresh again as all classics ought to be. Moreover, the overture is genuine tone-picturing in the contemporary fashion. These infatuated modernists who have forgotten that there were kings before Agamemnon—and also before themselves—will object that Mendelssohn has used only a modest orchestra and ventured no bizarre modulations even for the distant thirties [illegible] music. True, [illegible] in Debussyan h[illegible], by all means let him ply them. Mendelssohn's instrumental means in the overture, modest and conventional as they now seem, entirely accomplish his purpose, and were they multiplied ten-fold and made proportionately complex, they could do no more.

Old as the overture is, it answers to every test of contemporary tone-picturing even as Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture meets every exaction of modern dramatic preluding. The formal development and the pictorial expansion of the overture—the crucial test of such music—go hand in hand, neither hampering the other. The musical substance and the tonal delineation are equally clear, and the two pictures of the flat, still, languid sea and of the lively waters, stirred by the fair breeze, flecked by the sunshine and bearing the ship on her course, are vivid to the ear and stimulating to the fancy. They were the more so yesterday for the pace, the rhythm and the quality of tone that Dr. Muck brought to the music. For half its course, the overture seemed to move like the lazy, flaccid lapping of a windless sea. As the delirious Tristan "heard" the light so the serene listener yesterday "heard" the greatness of such water. Then through the second half of the piece, the music seemed to curl like the waves under a stirring breeze and a sunny sky. The ear felt the swish of the rushing water; the eye "heard" it blue and white. With Mendelssohn, conductor or orchestra were tone-painting and so restoring to itself a little and enduring masterpiece in its kind.

As those who mislike Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor will say, the conductor and the orchestra similarly glorified it through the hour and more of the concert that it filled. They did; but not as others will choose to believe, beyond its just deserts. For the time, the symphony hangs in a perilous limbo. As the music has become familiar by frequent repetition, the first excitement over it and admiration for it have inevitably lost their edge. On the other hand, it is still too near and novel to be measured dispassionately and its minor shortcomings differentiated from its major distinctions. In the fermenting interval between ardent discovery and searching appraisal its few and passing faults seem more conspicuous and ponderable than its many and enduring merits. Because it is lengthy, it is easy now to believe that it is prolix; because it is clad in the rich vesture of contemporary harmony and instrumentation, the ear can persuade itself that the music is overloaded with decoration; in the diverse interplay and struggle of the melodies, the momentary doubters discover tonal manipulation and not tonal drama; in the beginning, these melodies in themselves seized listening imaginations by their intrinsic beauty, individuality and power; now under six repetitions, they lay less hold upon them. Perhaps, here in Boston, the symphony has been too well liked for its own continuing good.

Over

[84]

Moods pass; but music remains, and there is enough in Rachmaninoff's symphony, as it still sounds in many ears, to justify it to his own generation and, may be, to generations to come. The impulse of the time is toward music that shall be drama in tones. Like d'Indy and Elgar, Rachmaninoff has discovered and seized the true dramatic possibilities of the symphony. No less than opera or "poem," it can be drama in tones, in which the personages are the composer's melodies and in which the movement and the action, the struggle and the suspense spring from their course through the music as his imagination orders it. He must follow the symphonic form in its freer usage, but Rachmaninoff, d'Indy and Elgar have each proved that it may not thwart such dramatic purpose. Rather its exactions put the composer to his mettle in his tonal drama and so concentrate and enhance it.

As Rachmaninoff's music introduces his personages—the themes—they have life and individuality on his stage of music. The chief personage of all—the recurring and finally conquering "motto theme"—is a believable and stirring protagonist of tonal drama. The course of these themes through the whole symphony or through the movements that they particularly animate—the separate "acts" as it were of the piece—is alive with conflict, suspense and dramatic march. The introduction and the first movement evolves the personages and begins the conflict of the drama; into the whirl of the scherzo contending characters—the chief contending character in the "motto theme"—vividly enter; it thrusts itself no less into the songs of the slow movement to add dramatic element to that which they already contain; the finale is sometimes lusty and sometimes lofty tonal contention. While through and above the whole symphony, hovers as in the classic tragedies, another personage that has no theme, but that seems gradually to descend upon each movement, and finally to extinguish it—the Fate of Rachmaninoff's tonal drama against which there is no struggling.

With similar instinct and imagination, Rachmaninoff, like a few other composers of our time. has felt and used the harmonic and instrumental possibilities of the symphony as quasi-dramatic music. Wagner in the theatre exemplified the resources of an intrinsically symphonic music— for what are his music-dramas but huge symphonic poems?—in the illuminating, the enforcing and the adorning of drama declaimed and visualized on the stage. To do such office is the purpose of the harmonic and instrumental vesture, of the procedure with interwoven, contrasting and conflicting themes, of the continuing melodic flood, with which he enriched music-drama. Rachmaninoff and his companions in the modernization of the symphony, have seen and utilized the possibilities of like method with their unstaged tonal dramas. They have perceived that, being unvisualized, it doubly needs such enrichment if it is to run its clear dramatic course and to make its vivid dramatic impression. Bruckner even saw this goal and struggled gropingly toward it, but he lacked more than one faculty necessary to the gaining of it.

Rachmaninoff and his fellows, deficient as they may be in other respects have come little short of this end. Even as music-drama uses the far-flung, slowly mounting, momentarily receding and finally breaking Wagnerian climax, so they do use it in the tonal drama of their symphonies. Rachmaninoff knows the accent that sharp and sudden progressions can lend to the speech of his tonal drama. His rich harmonic vesture clothes this speech in eloquence; his instrumentation makes it many-mouthed. And out of all these means and methods, assembled and fused, an atmosphere fill the symphony as distinct and individual as that of Wagnerian, Puccinesque or Straussian music-drama. Even his melodies have their flavor of opera. For like Tschaikowski and more than one composer of the north, he has felt the passionate sensuousness of Italian song and hankered for it. And what a foil its long uncoiling in the adagio makes to the leaping Russian rhythms of his scherzo and finale!

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 27,

CHRISTMAS PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Two Numbers Heard for First Time—Noack Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of music especially associated with Christmas time was offered at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," five childrens' pieces by Maurice Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), played for the first time here; Paul Juon's fantasy on Danish folk songs, "Vaegtervise," played also for the first time in Boston; Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Sylvain Noack, second concertmeister of the orchestra, as soloist, and Berlioz' overture to "Bob Roy."

INSPIRED CHRISTMAS MUSIC

Humperdinck's swollen orchestra has been a subject of manifold reproaches, for his orchestration is often thick and heavy, without sufficient brilliancy and clearness in polyphonic passages; but the somewhat clumsy orchestra need not blind us to the fact that this is of adorable freshness and naviette, of genuine and unexhaustible, melodic beauty and that the composer has translated into tones the spirit of German folk-lore as have few artists of any country. The prelude to "Hansel and Gretel" is so sincere and so genuinely inspired that it is music for all Christmases and all peoples.

There was afforded yesterday opportunity for instructive comparison. The orchestra of Ravel is a hundred times as clear and in good taste as the orchestra of Humperdinck, but the music of "La Mere l'Oye" is, thin, dry, and mannered by the side of the glorious melody of Humperdinck's score. A silk-gloved Christmas is Ravel's, a Christmas known only to fashionable children, and meaning little to them.

Nor is this music of ultra-sophistication highly original in its substance. One does not refer to the obvious Debussyism of the little piece, "Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes," for Debussy, like Ravel, went farther back, and experimented in Javanese tonalities when he wrote his piano piece, "Pagodes." Ravel is indebted to more than one modern Frenchman, and in particular—it is especially apparent in the music of beauty in the piece, "The Conversation of Beauty and the Beast"—to a man who has thus far escaped the music dictionaries, but to whom both Debussy and Ravel have in the past admitted their indebtedness. That man is Eric Satie.

Satie, one of the most fantastical characters in the modern musical world, has written certain pieces of genius, among them to be counted the "Gymnopedies." The shamelessness with which Ravel has helped himself, not only to Satie's singular harmonic scheme, but even to the exact rythm and the general melodic line of the first of the "Gymnopedies" is a great deal more than a coincidence. We confess we would rather hear the original piece, exquisitely orchestrated by Debussy, and played here some seasons ago by the Orchestral Club under the leadership of Mr. Georges Longy, than the imitation. Ravel's children were never taken in by the legend of Santa Claus. Beautiful as is the little "Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant," and beautiful, also, as is the following piece, the music of "Hop O' My Thumb," it is the beauty of artifice rather than inspired art. The music of Laideronnette is especially conspicuous for its bag of orchestral tricks. "Le Jardin Feerique" has moments that are charming. But some composers are so clever that you can never believe them.

Mr. Juon's fantasy admits of the services of many bells of pleasing and varied sonorities. It is a regular fantasy on several airs of Danish origin in the prevalent German manner—the announcement of themes, duly tagged, their development and their combination in a final sonorous period. It is music without originality.

But the event of this concert was Mr. Noack's playing of the Mendelssohn concerto. Nothing could have borne more convincing testimony to the qualities of a supreme musician. An interpretation which, first of all, took account of the classic character of the composition, and recognized, too, the specific qualities of Mendelssohn's inspiration. Never did this music degenerate into sentimentality, or, in the finale, into mere material for virtuoso display. Mr. Noack performed in an exceptionally clear and logical musical manner.

In the first movement there was the true spirit of the Mendelssohn allegro, as, with due allowance for the lyrical nature of the themes, the music sped on, without flagging, without losing the force of its current. [illegible] the slow movement was not mowied over. As soon as Mr. Noack commenced it was apparent that a performance of sterling qualities was in progress, and with each movement the conviction and the effect of his playing grew upon the hearer. There are virtuosi who are not musicians in the sound sense of the word; there are many musicians who would not easily become successful virtuosi; but Mr. Noack's performance was an admirable blend of the best qualities of both schools. His performance was, first of all, an honor to Mendelssohn, and secondly reflected infinite credit upon the sincerity and the ability of the musician-interpreter. No wonder there was hearty and long-sustained applause.

ADVERTISER.

DECEMBER 27,

A GOOD SOLOIST; A STRANGE SUITE

FEATURE THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

But With Mendelssohn and Berlioz to Balance Against Juon and Ravel.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Humperdinck—"Haensel and Gretel" Prelude.
Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye." Suite Enfantine.
Paul Juon—"Waechterweise."
Mendelssohn—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Sylvain Noack.
Berlioz—"Rob Roy" Overture.

Whenever Dr. Muck goes into the field of abstruse novelty (and he is forced to do this in these days when people ask "Is it new?" before they inquire "Is it good?") he always makes amends by giving something classical, solid, or conservative, beside the strange work, as a corrective, to neutralize any bad effects. Therefore, yesterday afternoon, we had Mendelssohn and a rather simple Berlioz overture to balance after Juon and Ravel, and the beautiful Humperdinck Prelude before them. The "Haensel and Gretel" Prelude was deliciously interpreted.

Who can unravel Ravel? We confess that we are puzzled at this upsetting of Mother Goose into French. We had expected something of the French charm of children's ballads here; something like "Au Clair de la Lune," or the "Pont d'Avignon" prettiness. We hoped for something like Schumann's "Scenes from Childhood," which another Frenchman (Godard) orchestrated so neatly, and which might be played at these concerts. But if these Esquisses Enfantines received their proper title they would be labelled "Scenes from Second Childhood." But since Richard Strauss paraded his monster baby, with full orchestral accompaniment, children in Music have not been as simple and artless as they once were.

"The Sleeping Beauty in the wood" and "Hop o' my thumb" were whispered in strictest confidence to the audience with Debussian ultra-delicacy of scoring. "Laideronnette" was not without beauty and was probably the most intelligible and popular of the suite, with its xylophonic effects.

In "Beauty and the Beast" at least one could hear the latter growl plainly enough upon the contra bassoon. The Fairy Garden with which the suite ended must have been situated at a very high altitude judging by the pitch of the tones. It had a good climax, but the whole set paled before the power of the Humperdinck prelude.

Paul Juon is a Russian who is plated with German silver. He is not as definitely Muscovite as many of his compatriots. The subject here is distinctly German in its first derivation, for the old Minnesingers gave many a "Waechterweise," a song of the watchman warning the lovers to separate as the dawn was approaching. This was a very different song from the "Alba" of the French Troubadours, in which the knightly singer woke his lady-love with bright and sometimes boisterous melody. Shakespeare's "Hark, Hark, the Lark," is a good example in English of this kind of song.

But Juon's Watchman's song was of a different mould. It was derived from a "Waechterweise" played by Danish chimes from a clock belfry. As the Danish music (like the Swedish) is very melodious, this work was more tuneful than some of Juon's compositions that we have heard. Although a little of contrapuntal work was displayed in it, there were more touches of part-song writing, almost like fragments of German "Maennerchoere." There were also some bits that suggested the Southern plantation, and might have been used in Dvorak's "New World" symphony; there was also much figure reiteration in the bass, almost a "basso ostinato," but on the whole the work was fragmentary, in spite of the excellent effect of the tubular bells used. Nevertheless we were glad to have a composer turn his attention to the sweet "Danske Volkvisor."

The 10-minute walk in the corridor, after Part I, promenaded us back to the days of very intelligible and tuneful music. After all Mendelssohn's Concerto is one of the very few violin concertos that is holding its own through all the changes of musical style. Beethoven's is far above it in grandeur, Brahms's concerto is far more abstruse, Bruch's is more passionate, but Mendelssohn's violin concerto still remains a favorite with those who draw the hairs of the horse across the bowels of the cat, and Mr. Sylvain Noack was an excellent interpreter of its clear and musicianly message.

The jealous composer peeps out occasionally in this work. Usually the violinist has a chance to give a brilliant cadenza in the coda of the first movement, near enough to the end that he may gather in much applause for his technical display. But Mendelssohn manages to force this personal bit into the middle of the movement, so that no applause for the artist is possible after it. Nevertheless, it was effectively done, as was also the more musical part of the first movement. The expressive slow movement was suavely given. One cannot give very powerful emotion to Mendelssohn's plaintive movements, since his grief and sorrow when placed beside the intensity of the moderns in this field shrink into nothing beyond a pair of black kid gloves and a lace handkerchief. But the dashing finale has more to say for itself, and here the abandon of Mr. Noack was commendable.

The intonation was always impeccable, even in the high positions, the few natural harmonies (there are no real passages in harmonics in this work) were full-toned, the skips, runs and flying staccato passages were effective, and everything was artistic, although more breadth of tone might have been welcome at times. Mr. Noack was many times recalled with great enthusiasm.

Berlioz is by no means at his best in the "Rob Roy" overture. Among the many who have attempted to use Scottish material in the large forms, only Mendelssohn has succeeded, and Beethoven, Schumann, Volkmann, Boieldieu, Bruch, Robert Franz, etc., have failed, at least in so far as reproducing the real Scottish flavor is concerned. To this list we may add the name of Berlioz. As well expect a Frenchman or a German to make good haggis as a good Scottish symphony or overture.

Berlioz perhaps thought that by using the tune of "Scots wha hae' " he was making assurance doubly sure, but there is something very Gaelic in that very old melody, with its quaint plagal scale formation, that will always elude the foreigner. Berlioz has simply shown skill in dismembering the ancient tune. He gives it in fragments that are no more Scotch than the Boulevard des Italiens. He mixes it up with his subordinate theme in a manner that suggests mingling Glenlivet and absinthe.

The subordinate theme is an old friend, being neither more nor less than the Childe Harold theme, but while the viola gives this in the famous symphony, the English horn has it here, although the familiar harp accompaniment is retained. But as the English horn is about as melancholy as the viola, the character of the pensive theme does not lose its brooding effect.

But there is as little of inspiration as of Scotch flavor in the overture. It is a good study to watch the development of figures of "Scots what hae," but that is all. The Berlioz of the Symphonie Fantastique, "Childe Harold," the Requiem, "Romeo and Juliet," or "The Damnation of Faust" is not present in this overture. Spite of the very good performance of the work, we could not get up any enthusiasm over its carefully prepared measures. There was nothing in them to suggest "Caledonia, stern and wild," or her great heroes.

OSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 27.

'MOTHER GOOSE' MUSIC

Ravel's Fairy Pieces Slight But Pleasing.

Juon Novelty—Mr Noack Soloist in Mendelssohn Concerto.

The program of the 10th Symphony rehearsal was as follows. Dr Muck conducted. Sylvain Moack was soloist.

Humperdinck...	Prelude to Haensel and Gretel
Ravel....................	Mother Goose Suite
Paul Juon..........	Watchman's Song Fantasy
Mendelssohn...	Concerto for Violin in E Minor
Berlioz..................	Overture to Rob Roy

The music of Ravel and Juon was played for the first time in Boston. Of the five "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel, four of them originally were writen for piano and for the edification of two children. When set into the larger and more colorful frame of the orchestra, they did not suffer the misfortune which attended Debussy's little suite, "The Children Corner," when arrayed in orchestral dress at the Opera House concerts several seasons ago. There were several numbers there which had fared better in the paler tints and pulsatile tone of the piano.

These little pieces by Ravel do not lose their character as miniatures by their rescoring. They were written to a program, not to be literal or photographic, but rather suggestive and pictorial. Such they are. It is not difficult to see the sleeping Beauty, an exquisite and dainty creature, as she might have been when awake and stepping through the stately pavane, or it may be, dreaming that she were. Neither was it difficult to see little Tom Thumb, full of melancholy and dire foreboding as the English horn pictured him, on his way through the forest, nor to see the birds alight like fairy thieves and carry the crumbs away. This is not music of sophistication laboring to caper lightly with childhood. There is the spirit of play and the pretty mysteries of fairy romance.

The imagination had aid also seeing the diminutive pagodes wag their droll little heads and to play upon all manner of fantastic miniature instruments. There were enchanting colors and sounds that could have been born only in the fairy world. There was due suggestion to the initiated of the green serpent and the princess.

Here the invention of the composer appears to have become more tenuous than some of the fairy lore. In the number of "The Beauty and the Beast" it was a very decorous and mild-voiced beast indeed that roared softly upon the double bassoon. The loan of Wagner's Fafner and a lusty Teutonic bellow or two would have been welcome. The final number, entitled "The Fairy Garden," is euphonious, but not highly imaginative.

any absorbing creative gifts. He confesses that a clock in Copenhagen instigated the present piece. Most clocks are noisy; this one has little sense of the nuances. Its own tune is four-cornered and six-sided like children's blocks. Instead of chosing more gracefully curved themes as subsidiaries, the composer added two more in geometrical progression; one of "Queen Dagmar" and one of "Knights in the Wood"—both and all of them angular and drearily obvious persons. All three themes get together at the close for a round of counterpoint and look like suffragette marching clubs, durably shod and with banners.

It was a pleasure to hear Humperdinck's prelude played with such euphony of tone, such pervading clearness of all instrumental detail, such sonority and fullness of climax without blare of brass.

Mr Moack has played with a more finely polished style than he did yesterday. His tone is not large, but it is always pure and expressive. The slow movement was not without its due sense of artificial elegance, of superficial grace and a pretty sentiment that hovers over the sentimental, but the purity of line sacrificed something to emphasis upon individual tones, and the last movement, while not without brilliance, tended to be flurried and without rhythmic authoritiveness.

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave to the Ravel music of their choicest art—imagination and lightness of touch. The feature of the Juon piece was the mellow, luscious and enveloping tone of the bells.

JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 27.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC LED BY DR. MUCK

Even the Symphony Orchestra can celebrate Christmas. Yesterday it played the prelude to "Haensel and Gretel," the fairy opera first heard in Germany just twenty years ago this week, and which since then has been sung all over the world; and after that came a French "Mother Goose" suite, by Joseph Maurice Ravel. The Humperdinck prelude has served several times to grace the Christmas Symphony program, but this is the first time the orchestra has performed any of Ravel's works.

The "Mother Goose" suite is a novelty so far as Boston is concerned, though it was heard in New York and also in Chicago a year ago. It embraces "The Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' my Thumb," "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes," "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "The Fairy Garden." It has a modern French flavor, which is still as caviar to the general public, but withal the music appeals strongly to the imagination. It might be described as a work that will probably be enjoyed hugely by the well brought up children of the year 1925. At present it is too subtle, too cerebral for the average youngster

More in the old-fashioned German style was "The Watchman's Song," another novelty on the program, a fantasy written by Paul Juon on some Danish folk-songs. The principal theme is the tune played by the Rathaus clock in Copenhagen.

Dr. Muck gave a sympathetic reading of all these selections.

Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the orchestra, played the Mendelssohn concerto in E-minor gracefully and with charming tone, and the audience applauded him warmly. Mr. Noack's modest yet polished artistry was doubly appreciated as an illustration of the virtuoso character of the orchestra itself. The concert ended with a performance of the "Rob Roy" overture by Berlioz.

HERALD. SATURDAY

DECEMBER 27.

REHEARSAL IN SYMPHONY HALL

Ravel's Poetic "Mother Goose" Music Played Here for the First Time.

EXQUISITE ORIGINAL FANCY

Fairy Tales Illustrated by Music—Juon's Fantasy "Made in Germany."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, was held in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Sylvain Noack, second concert master of the orchestra, was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"	Humperdinck
"My Mother Goose," five children's pieces	Ravel
Watchman's song, fantasy on Danish folk songs	Juon
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Rob Roy"	Berlioz

The compositions by Ravel and Juon were played for the first time in Boston. The suite by Ravel was composed originally for piano (four hands) and first performed in 1910 by two children. Afterward a ballet was made out of the pieces and produced at Paris about two years ago. The orchestral suite, however, was made from the piano pieces.

The music is of a [illegible] tical nature. The titles of the movements are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty; Hop-o' My Thumb; Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes; The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast; The Fairy Garden. There are mottoes taken from Perrault and other writers of fairy tales, for in France Mother Goose tells fairy tales and does not confine herself to nursery rhymes.

Ravel's music is of the most delicate texture, lace-work, with exquisite thoughts orchestrated as for the little orchestra of ivory instruments imagined by Jules Laforgue. Although to the eye the structure of the score is simple, the performance demands the utmost skill on the part of the players and the finest taste of an imaginative conductor. It would be hard to say which of the five movements is the most beautiful in fancy. The Pavane has a subtle, melancholy charm. "Hop o' My Thumb" is curiously rhythmed and strangely effective by means of orchestration. "Laideronnette" in the movement of a march is delightful and with the movement that follows, in the time of a slow waltz, and with a solo for the double bassoon representing the Beast, will no doubt have the most immediate popularity. In the ballet the Apotheosis was the Fairy Garden, and this movement, too, is most poetic. In this music there is pronounced individuality as well as a most refined fancy. Ravel here shows himself as something more than an acolyte in the temple of Debussy. The performance, which had been indefatigably rehearsed, was a triumph for the orchestra. Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for introducing this singularly beautiful composition, so appropriate to Christmas-tide.

Juon's fantasy on Danish folk songs is at least eight years old and of a very different character. This Russian composer has been thoroughly Germanized and in this composition he shows himself faithful, plodding as a workman in a German manufactory of Kapellmeister music. His themes are a tune played by a clock in Copenhagen and two folk songs. The tunes are not of special interest and they are laboriously treated in what is known as "the correct manner." The instrumentation is not distinguished by its brilliance.

Mr. Noack played Mendelssohn's chaste concerto in a happy vein, with the requisite clarity, smoothness, accuracy and taste. It was an honest and good performance and the hearty applause was well deserved.

Humperdinck's Prelude to the Gingerbread Witch opera was played with a nice sense of proportion. The overture by Berlioz, first performed a little over 80 years ago, is certainly old-fashioned in many ways, yet now and then there is the apparition of Berlioz the Genius. There are hints at the greater works of the master and not only in the theme that was soon afterwards used in the "Harold in Italy" symphony.

The program of next week will include Cesar Franck's Symphony and Mozart's Haffner Serenade. Miss Ruth Deyo will be the pianist in a performance of Bach's Concerto in F minor for piano and strings.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 28.

Bauer and Thibaud in Sunday Concert

What promises to be one of the most interesting concerts of the Sunday series in Symphony Hall will be given this afternoon by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud.

Harold Bauer needs no introduction to Boston for he has long been one of the welcome visitors in this city. It was a happy thought to associate these two artists in one program.

The concert will begin with Cesar Franck's sonata for violin and piano in A. This work has already taken its place among the great classics of musical literature and in the opinion of many it is Franck's greatest achievements. While it contains all the profound learning of the composer, it rises to an unusual height

Titto Ruffo Gets $2,000 a Performance

Titto Ruffo is to make his first appearance in Boston in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, January 11.

Ruffo is not only the highest paid baritone in the world, but of the singers now before the public only two receive higher fees, Caruco and Melba.

Every time Ruffo sings he receives $2,000, whether it is in the United States, Europe or South America. He is a member of the Chicago Opera Company, but is doing incidentally a limited amount of concert work.

Franck on the Next Symphony Program

Dr. Muck has not fully determined what the next Symphony program will be in its entirety. The symphony will be the beautiful work in D minor by Cesar Franck. This was last played here two years ago by Mr. Fiedler, and it has become one of the favorite works in the literature of the orchestra. The soloist will be Miss Ruth Deyo, an American pianist, who has played with the orchestra successfully in Cambridge and Providence. She will play Bach's Concerto No. 14 in F Minor.

SUN

DECEMBER 28.

BAUER AND THIBAUD

Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud are the soloists for the Sunday concert to be given this afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Thibaud made a profound impression when he played here on his only other visit to America 10 years ago. He is probably the foremost French violinist of today.

The concert will begin with Cesar Franck's Sonata for violin and piano in A. This work has already taken its place among the great classics of musical literature, and in the opinion of many it is Franck's greatest achievement. While it contains all the profound learning of the composer, it rises to an unusual height of melodic inspiration.

The final number on the programme will be another sonata, the famous "Kreutzer" sonata of Beethoven, in which Tolstoi discovered wickedness.

Mr. Thibaud will play three unaccompanied pieces by Bach, a Sarabande, Gigue and a famous Chaconne, while Mr. Bauer will play Schumann's fascinating carnival piece, "Faschingsschwank." The concert will begin at 3:30.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has not fully determined what the next Symphony programme will be in its entirety. The Symphony will be the beautiful work in D minor by Cesar Franck. This was last played here two years ago by Mr. Fiedler, and it has become one of the favorite works in the literature of the orchestra. The soloist will be Miss Ruth Deyo, an American pianist, who has played with the orchestra successfully in Cambridge and Providence. She will play Bach's Concerto No. 14 in F minor.

TITTA RUFFO

In the last third of a century Italy has given to the world two baritones who stand singularly alone among their contemporaries and who have enjoyed an amount of public favor which is supposed to be the exclusive property of great tenors. These are Battestini and Titta Ruffo. Battestini, now a man of 60, has never been in America despite the many efforts made to bring him here. Most of his career has been spent in Russia. His unquestioned successor is Titta Ruffo, who is to make his first appearance in Boston in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11. Ruffo is not only the highest paid baritone in the world but of the singers now before the public only two receive higher fees, Caruso and Melba. Every time Ruffo sings he receives $2000 whether it is in the United States, Europe or South America. He is a member of the Chicago Opera Company, but is doing incidentally a limited amount of concert work.

From all accounts Ruffo not only has a voice of supreme range and beauty, but is musical to a degree not often found in singers. Accounts have it also that he possesses an engaging personality, which in itself makes quick appeal to an audience. Wherever he has sung in this country he has stirred the public to outbreaks of extraordinary enthusiasm, and his appearance in Symphony Hall is eagerly awaited not merely by lovers of good music, but by those who are attracted by a new and unusual personality.

KREISLER'S SECOND RECITAL

The second recital of Fritz Kreisler will be given next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 4, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Kreisler begins with Handel and Bach, Handel being represented by a sonata in D major and Bach by an adagio and fugue in G minor for violin alone. Then he will play Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, and this will be followed by a group of pieces by Sulzer, Pugnani, Dittersdorf, Couperin and Tartini, men famous in the 18th century for their writings for the violin. One of his own transcriptions of "A Song Without Words" by Mendelssohn, Dvorak's "Canzonetta Indienne" and his own "Tambourin Chinois," complete the programme. The list of works in detail is as follows:

Sonata in D major	Handel
Adagio; allegro maestoso; larghetto; allegro.
Adagio and fugue in G minor (for violin alone)	J. S. Bach
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64	Mendelssohn
Allegro molto appassionato; andante; allegretto non troppo; allegro molto vivace.
Sarabande	Sulzer
Menuetto	Pugnani
Scherzo	Dittersdorf
La Precieuse	Couperin
Fugue	Tartini
Lied ohne Worte	Mendelssohn-Kreisler
Canzonetta Indienne	Dvorak
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler

EUGENE YSAYE

Eugene Ysaye, the celebrated Belgian violinist, is returning to America for a limited tour and will give a recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Jan. 18. The tickets for this recital go on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, Friday, Jan. 9.

SUNDAY HERALD,

DECEMBER 28,

BAUER AND THIBAUD

What promises to be one of the most interesting concerts of the Sunday series in Symphony Hall will be given this afternoon by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud. Both of these men are master artists and especial interest is shown in the return to Boston of Mr. Thibaud, who made so profound an impression when he played here on his only other visit to America 10 years ago. Thibaud is unquestionably the foremost French violinist. When he was here 10 years ago his playing was notable for its elegance and its tonal beauty. Since he was here he has become one of the most popular violinists in Europe. His popularity in Berlin and London is no less than it is in Paris. A serious artist, he is the admiration of his colleagues. Mr. Bauer needs no introduction to Boston, for he has long been one of the most welcome visitors in this city.

The concert will begin with Cesar Franck's sonata for violin and piano. This work has already taken its place among the great classics of musical literature and in the opinion of some it is Franck's greatest achievement. While it contains all the profound learning of the composer, it rises to an unusual height of melodic inspiration.

The final number on the program will be another sonata, the famous "Kreutzer" of Beethoven, in which Tolstol discovered such wickedness. Fortunately few others have discovered the same quality in this beautiful work.

Mr. Thibaud will play three unaccompanied pieces by Bach, a Sarabande, Gigue and the Chaconne, while Mr. Bauer will play Schumann's "Faschingsschwank." The concert will begin at half past three.

TITTA RUFFO

In the last third of a century Italy has given to the world two baritones who stand singularly alone among their contemporaries and who have enjoyed an amount of public favor supposed to be the exclusive property of great tenors. These are Battestini and Titta Ruffo. Battestini, now a man of 60, has never been in America, despite the many efforts made to bring him here. Most of his career has been spent in Russia. His unquestioned successor is

KREISLER'S 2D RECITAL

The second recital of Fritz Kreisler, which will be given next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 4, in Symphony Hall, should be as interesting and attractive as the first, three weeks ago. His program will include pieces of the classical period of which he is so fond and modern music. It will be as follows:

Sonata in D major	Handel
Adagio and Fugue in G minor (for violin alone)	J. S. Bach
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64	Mendelssohn
Sarabande	Sulzer
Menuetto	Pugnani
Scherzo	Dittersdorf
La Precieuse	Couperin
Fugue	Tartini
Lied ohne Worte	Mendelssohn-Kreisler
Canzonetta Indienne	Dvorak
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the Symphony concerts this week includes the magnificent symphony of Cesar Franck, which, not understood when it was performed here for the first time, is now one of the favorite works in the great repertory of the orchestra. The symphony will be followed by Bach's concerto in F minor for piano and strings. We find no record of a performance in Boston. The pianist will be Miss Ruth Deyo, an American, who has played with success this season in Cambridge and Providence and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The final number will be Mozart's Serenade written for the betrothal of Miss Haffner of Salzburg. Several movements of this work have been played twice at previous concerts.

[86]

MONITOR, BOSTON

DECEMBER 27,

Presenting the "Mother Goose" pieces of Ravel, the "Watchman's Song" of Juon, both works new to the Symphony concerts, the Humperdinck overture to "Haensel and Gretel," the Berlioz "Rob Roy" overture and the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its tenth public rehearsal Friday afternoon to a large house and considerable applause. Mr. Noack, second concertmaster of the orchestra, was the soloist.

Dr. Muck, doubtless the greatest humorist who ever interpreted music for the Boston public, proved as certain with the delicate and childlike fun of the French Ravel as he has proved with the satire of the German Strauss. His men, too, were sensitive to the amusing situations of the little comedy of Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb and the other characters in the little fairy pieces of the suite, and showed the restraint of practised orchestral actors by letting the house do the laughing.

That tragedy and comedy employ means of orchestral expression not much unlike is an artistic fact that causes the concert listener ever-recurring surprise. A little thinning out of the tone colors, a little reorganizing of the rhythms of the score of "Pelleas and Melisande" and you have "Mother Goose." In the same way you have to alter the degree of the instrumentation, not the tsyle, of the tone poem "Don Juan" to get "Till." Ravel and Debussy are one and the same man practically, testing a new method of orchestral writing, making it describe the life of the twentieth century. There is no more difference between them than there is between the laughing and the earnest Strauss. The serious thinker comes first, then the burlesquer. The music of the "Pelleas" interludes, and that of the Ravel child pieces are the sober and the gay side of the same story.

The Juon piece is a pretty essay on folk lore, and if it only belonged to some school instead of being a detached little piece without any particular nationality, something in enthusiastic praise of it might be remarked. It is a delightful travel sketch, a winning appreciation of Danish life by a Russian.

The Mendelssohn concerto, played by Mr. Noack, gave the house the pleasure it has given audiences in past seasons, and that it will continue to give while classic balance between beauty of tone and brilliancy of expression are valued. Mr. Noack was more subjective in his playing than are the professional soloists. He rather gave an exposition of the musical content of the work than interpreted it. But that was a valuable thing for his public. His tone is freer than it used to be. His execution is never bold, but it is faultless.

Miss Ruth Deyo, the pianist, will appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts of Jan. 2 and 3, playing Bach's concerto No. 14 in F minor. The principal orchestral work on the program of these concerts is the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor.

The orchestra gives the fourth of its Cambridge concerts in Sanders theater, Cambridge, on the evening of Jan. 15, with George Proctor, pianist, assisting.

* * *

Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist, are the artists in the concert which will be given at Symphony hall Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. They will present together the sonata in A by Cesar Franck and the Kreutzer sonata of Beethoven. Mr. Bauer will play Schumann's "Faschingsschwank" and Mr. Thibaud will play pieces by Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, gives his second recital in Symphony hall on the afternoon of Jan. 4, playing Handel's sonata in D major, Bach's adagio and fugue in G minor for violin alone, Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor and works of Sulzer, Pugnani, Dittersdorf, Couperin, Tartini, Mendelssohn-Kreisler, Dvorak and Kreisler.

* * *

The Kneisel quartet gives its third concert in Steinert hall on the evening of Jan. 6, presenting the Vincent d'Indy quartet in E major, op. 45.

* * *

Mme. Julia Culp, soprano, gives a song recital in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Jan. 9, singing four works of Schubert, five of Brahms, five of Loewe and four English folk songs. Her accompanist will be Coenrad V. Bos.

* * *

Mischa Elman, the violinist, gives a recital in Symphony hall on the afternoon of Jan. 10. He will present the Beethoven sonata in G major, op. 61; the Goldmark concerto, op. 28; the Vivaldi-Nachez concerto in G minor with organ and piano; arrangements of music by Chopin, Schumann and Gretry; and the Wieniawski polonaise in A major. Percy Kahn will be the pianist, Homer Humphrey the organist.

* * *

Titta Ruffo, the baritone, one of the distinguished artists booked for the Sunday afternoon series of concerts in Symphony hall, takes his turn as recital-giver on Jan. 11, singing for the first time in Boston.

* * *

Eugene Ysaye, the violinist, appears in Symphony hall at the Sunday afternoon concert of Jan. 18.

* * *

Miss Eleanor Spencer, the pianist who was Mme. Marie Rappold's associate artist in one of the Sunday afternoon recitals in Symphony hall, gives a program of her own in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Jan. 14.

* * *

A recital of piano music is announced to be given by Miss Ruth Deyo in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Jan. 22.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 27,

A Survey of the Work of Another Rising French Composer

By Philip Greeley Clapp

JUST as no religion can hold the attention and respect of the public without making use of a healthy, energetic devil, so every art must maintain at least one individual whose works, nay, whose very name and image, shock and alarm the faithful. In art, however, a certain difficulty usually arises; the artistic devil, being no abstraction but a human personality, cannot grow with his public's development fast enough to retain his devildom, and thus a creative artist who has force enough to be shocking at twenty-five is almost certain of being accounted respectable at fifty.

Less than ten years ago the modern French school in general and Debussy in particular were regarded hereabouts with marked disfavor. The new style was either dead wrong or—favorite evasion of the critical diplomat—a "new art"; it exemplified the reputed effeminacy of the French, and quite possibly their immorality; it was incompatible with what we had previously known, and therefore we must either reject it or begin our musical education all over again; in general, it meant a lot of trouble for somebody, and we did our best not to give it a chance. As a logical consequence of this attitude on our part a very small number of people, who really understood, and enjoyed the new style joined hands with a much larger number of hare-brained faddists, who never really understood anything, in the formation of a "modern French cult"; and then we were sure, according to the temper of our respective conservatisms, that the "new movement" had either killed itself or would soon kill everything else.

Today all that is changed. We have accepted either eagerly or passively, the ringleader, Debussy; the more thoughtful but less delicious d'Indy we have agreed to forget: on the whole the "school" does not frighten us, for most of us have found that we can enjoy its products, more or less, without sacrificing our enjoyment of more familiar music, and it is easier not to fight. There is even talk, now, of a "second generation," despite the fact that at least twenty-five years should elapse before we introduce such a term; fortunately, the "second generation" of the French school is not at all [illegible] even at home, so that we are safe in withholding reasons and dismissing them with the complacent "don't like it," which corresponds in the snobbery of art to that old social stand-by, the "not at home."

Like their forebears, however, this "second generation" seem to have vigor enough to be insistently expansive, and sooner or later we can hardly help hearing even here, a considerable number of their works. Recently we have heard one of Florent Schmitt's works and dismembered fragments of another; tonight we are to be reminded of Maurice Ravel, whose existence not even the uncertainty of the profession and the indifference of the public have been able wholly to concal from us.

In the Beginning

Joseph Maurice Ravel, better known as Maurice Ravel, was born in Ciboure, Lower Pyrenees, in 1875. I do not know whether the geographic proximity of this region to Spain affects the daily life of its inhabitants to any great degree, but certainly Ravel shows a leaning toward Spanish rhythms and color, and a facility with them which cannot be an acquired taste. Ravel received his technical training in Paris, where he studied with Pessart in harmony, with de Beriot in piano, with Gedalge in counterpoint, and with Fauré in composition. As a student in the Conservatory he received the second prix de Rome, thus proving himself not immune from some of the diseases of childhood. From the reticence of all his literary defenders concerning his private life we must assume that his career has been either without events or with far too many of them, unless we come instead to the astounding conclusions that, unlike ourselves, the European public is interested in a composer's works more than in his social and domestic personality. In 1910 a picture of him was published in which he seemed to be trying to atone for a certain scantiness of dress by wearing a full black beard; now his correct and proper appearance both in general and in particular implied that nowadays his model is not Bohemian, but English.

Exactly what composition of Ravel was first performed in Boston, and by whom, I am not sure, but probably the performance by the Kneisel Quartet on Dec. 4, 1906, of his string quartet, in F major, was the first occasion on which an important work of Ravel was presented to the Boston public. This quartet invites comparison with Debussy's in G minor, by the superficial resemblance of the two works in general scheme especially in the middle movements; there have been many suggestions that Ravel imitated Debussy in certain points of style and arrangement, and I know of no direct evidence to the contrary. Be that as it may, Ravel's quartet is individual enough to be judged on its own merits, and the imitation, if there is any, is so unessential as not to force itself upon the attention.

Early Pieces

The first movement is gentle, reflective, sympathetic, to a degree noble, and absolutely free from the conventional algebraic grinding relieved by animated scratching which usually fills the first movement of a string quartet; it is as new and yet as appropriate to the medium as, in its own medium, the first movement of Franck's violin and piano sonata must have seemed to its first hearers. Altogether, this first movement is one of the most satisfying pieces of work in the earlier period which Ravel has given us: the quartet should become a repertory work on the strength of its first movement alone, even if what followed were not more than worthy of repeated hearings; certainly no part of Debussy's quartet approaches it in loftiness of feeling combined with fluency of expression. The second and third movements are an interrelated scherzo and adagio, as in Debussy's quartet, and here Ravel falls behind Debussy; his scherzo is excellent, but not so brilliantly original as Debussy's, and his adagio, while sufficiently original, seems at times stiff and labored. Both Ravel's and Debussy's finales seem to me manufactured, and there is thus question merely of whose brand pleases one best.

Shortly after this quartet (1904), Ravel composed a sonatina (1905). This piece is not strikingly original, and it suffers from Fauré's fault of letting urbanity degenerate into triviality. The first movement and the minuet are pretty enough, and are warranted not to do any harm; not until the finale is there any suggestion that the music is written by a man with blood, bone and sinew, and even here there are moments when Miss Nancy seems to be admiring herself in a glass. It would not be fair, however, to give an impression that there are no moments of power and grasp in this little work; the use of a descending bass figure in the finale becomes at times almost dramatic, and the opening theme of the same movement is vigorous if not too original.

Piano Pieces

In a totally different class are the "Mirrors" (1906). These five piano pieces, which have called forth the praise of Arnold Bennett, are brilliantly successful instances of the modern impressionistic style; in comparison with them Debussy seems curiously and amusingly timid and conventional. They will probably not immediately endear themselves to the general public, for all but the last of them are wholly free from the kind of sentimentality which "goes" in any medium, however unfamiliar; but they are sure at last to come to their own, for they are preeminently sincere and vital, so that each new hearing reveals more and deeper meaning. The first piece, "Noctuelles," is vague and mysterious; there is an impression of elusive and changing shapes, then a quiet and pathetic but still evasive melody, then a return to the original atmosphere. The second, "Mourning Birds," one of the best in the collection, is an incredibly effective combination of a series of bird-calls into a plaintive and wailing piece of music. The third, "A Boat on the Ocean," is all swaying rhythm and high lights; it is pleasing and effective, but too long. The fourth, "Alborada del gracioso" (an "alborada" is the morning counterpart of a serenade; whether "gracioso" indicates the polite and gracious lover or is used in some colloquial sense, I do not know) is a stimulating example of Spanish rhythm; the middle portion, in which a long declamatory melody alternates with muttered dance rhythms and strange harmonies, is remarkable for its suggestion of the atmosphere of Spain by simple means. The last piece, "The Valley of Bells," is of exceptional beauty; there is a distict sound of bells tolling in different rhythms and pitches; then a broad and simple melody begins quietly, swells, dies away, and echoes of the bells end the piece.

A number of smaller piano pieces come down from these earlier days in Ravel's career, and several of them deserve mention. I will confine myself, however, to the "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," which is unique in music. The pavane is an old dance of very stately character; the name means "peacock." Ravel's adaptation of the rhythm and the formal repetitions of an old dance to the expression of mourning is daring, but it is in this instance the means of successfully portraying a peculiarly subtle psychological state. The composition begins with a gracious and charming melody in the major; but the effect of the careful, mincing, formal rhythm which accompanies it is to add a grave, almost wistful quality which both simply and with absolute definiteness portrays at once the whole complex range of emotions, from affectionate tenderness to bitterest grief, with which the image of the dead princess is associated in the thoughts of those who have lost her. The rest of the piece consists of phases of this initial idea, with alternating departures from it and returns to it, each return richer and more tender; at the close there is a sudden and curious loud open fifth, which seems to indicate both a stern resolution to put away the thoughts that have preceded, and the inevitable human inability wholly to do so. All in all, both as an example of psychological portrayal and simply as a beautiful piece of music, this little composition seems great indeed.

Newer Piano Works

In recent years, Ravel has issued two sets of piano pieces which are sure sooner or later to attract much attention. The first, "Gaspard de la Nuit," after prose poems by Aloysius Bertrand, is technically so difficult that it will probably not appeal to the average concert pianist, and we shall have to wait until the pianists with brains have exhausted various other attractive fields. The opening poem, "Ondine," describes how an undine invites a mortal to come and live with her in her submarine palace, and finally laughs and disappears from his view; over a long and pleasing melody, delicate passage work and figuration with much light and shade create a fantastic atmosphere of waves and enchantment; then, after a suitable climax, a swirling cadenza marks the disappearance of the nymph. The second sketch, "The Gibbet," deals with the imaginings of one who waits through the night under a gibbet; a repeated figure on one note suggests the creaking of the cord by which the corpse swings, and unearthly harmonic progressions beneath begin with mystery, and lead through monotony to horror. The last picture. "Scarbo," as an exciting sort of shadow dance; it tells of a familiar spirit which appears, and disappears in the moonlight. The whole set is brilliantly fantastical, phantasmagorical; it is conceived on a larger scale than Ravel's previous piano works, and shows greater grasp of his medium, with at once greater technical originality and more melodic attractiveness.

The other set is the "Valses nobles et sentimentales," consisting of eight short character-sketches in waltz form. The first is tumultuous, almost brutal in certain portions; the most dissonant chords are used in quick succession, to a strongly marked rhythm, the whole creating an impression of violent motion and glare much like that produced by Van Gogh's picture, "the Ballroom." Then follow five dances, each highly individualized and each different from all the others; through all of them runs a very feminine mixture of sentiment and humor, and each one takes its own mood with naive seriousness. In the seventh number less stress is laid upon individuality, and the centre of attention seems again to be the crowd as a whole; the eighth is entitled "epilogue," and consists of short thematic reminiscences of what has gone before, all introduced vaguely and as though remembered in a dream. The whole set is noteworthy for its vitality, its characterization and a certain hint of irony which shows here and there throughout the entire work.

The Songs

The songs of Ravel seem not to be unduly numerous; isolated ones have great merit, others less, but his whole procedure seems to be summarized in his harmonization of five Greek folk songs, his "Histoire Naturelles," and the three songs with orchestra, "Scheherazade." The Greek songs (1906) are said to be authentic, and the Greek text is printed with the French translation; only the harmony is Ravel's, and he has performed the difficult feat of enhancing instead of destroying the character of the songs without excluding wholly his own more sophisticated point of view. The first song, "Chanson de la Mariée," is one of the best; a simple and rhythmic accompaniment gradually becomes harmonically richer and richer without changing the rhythmic figuration, and the melody is at all times well set off. In the second, "Là-bas Vers l'Eglise," effective, but not obtrusive use is made of the Phrygian mode. The third, "Quel galant m'est comparable," is the simplest of the lot. The fourth, "Chanson des cueilleuses de lentisques," is very skilful; to a naturally beautiful melody of gently undulating character Ravel adds a simple, yet very atmospheric accompaniment. The last, "Tout gai!" is an agreeable trifle.

The "Histoires Naturelles" (1906) are remarkable in the extreme. The half sympathetic, half-ironical words of Jules Renard find in Ravel their most appropriate interpreter; for them Ravel has outdone himself in refinement of characterization. In the first, "Le Paon," the poet whimsically [illegible] should [illegible] happened yesterday, but the bride failed to appear, so the groom strutted magnificently about, looked longingly for his beloved, his feathers shining the more brilliantly for his passion, but she still was not to be seen, so he reluctantly paced about, still looking for her. Ravel's music admirably portrays the pride of the peacock, his longing, his search, his discouragement and his distrust; yet it is not overdone, and not for a moment is the hearer allowed to forget that these are not real emotions felt by the animal, but thoughts read into its actions by the poet. In the second "Le Grillon," poet and musician tell with quaint humor and voluminous detail how the cricket comes home, puts his house in order, rests, comes out again, shuts his door and turns the key, listens, departs and is at last silent; then there is a wonderful change of mood in the music as the poem in a simple couplet describes the peaceful night landscape outside. In the third, "Le Cygne," the poet tells how the swan sees reflections of the clouds in the water, dives for them, but never reaches them; this the music richly describes, and then suddenly changes vein completely as the poet exclaims, "but what am I saying? Whenever he dives, he hunts in the nutritious mud with his beak, and brings up a worm. He is growing fat as a goose." The fourth, "Le Martin Pêcheur," is very short, but it is full of descriptive suggestion. The last, "La Pintade," is brilliant and whimsical; it is perhaps not so fortunate as the three first, which it seems to be trying unduly hard to resemble.

The three "Sheherazade" songs (1911) for voice with orchestra are exceptionally fortunate instances of modern blending of vocal and instrumental media. The first, "Asie," is the longest; it is a highly atmospheric invocation of the spirit of Asia. In it Ravel makes good use of a device to which he has recently become more and more partial, namely, that of beginning very vaguely and with very little definite melody, gradually letting the music take form, and at last launching out into broad and melodious richness. There are successfully descriptive bits, but for the most part Ravel here confines himself to impressionism rather than realism. In the second, "La flute enchantée," an effect of mystery and delicacy predominates; the voice is more declamatory and less melodic, while a solo flute rhapsodizes freely. The last, "L'indifférent," is short; it consists of a beautiful melody of languorous character over a murmuring accompaniment.

Orchestral Works

Ravel's earliest work for orchestra alone seems to have been the "Rhapsodie espagnole" (1908), which has been heard in Boston at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, Jan. 26, 1910. The rhapsody is in four movements—"Prélude à la Nuit," "Malagueña," "Habanera," and "Feria"; the first three are relatively short and undeveloped, the last nearly as long as the other three put together. If Ravel is indebted to Debussy for some of the style and treatment of his quartet, certainly he discharges the debt in this rhapsody, for all through the work one finds forecasts of Debussy's "Iberia." The first movement, "Prélude à la Nuit," is exquisitely atmospheric, thanks largely to boldness in combining unusual groups of instruments. The "Malagueña" has a fine rhythm, and is full of what the outside world regards as Spanish local color; although lively, this movement still preserves the atmospheric qualities of the first. The "Habanera" is to me less interesting musically than the others; but it has this extraneous claim to attention, that it forecasts the mood, the rhythm and the general color, style, and treatment of the second movement ("Parfums de la Nuit") in Debussy's "Iberia." The last movement, "Feria," is very effective, and I mean no slight when I say that it is the kind of finale which other Frenchmen besides Ravel could have written. The orchestration of all the movements is typically modern and sufficiently novel; but the chief delight of the work is in its atmosphere.

Recently (1912) Ravel has issued another work for orchestra alone, a children's suite, "Ma Mère l'Oye" (Mother Goose). In this work his humor and imagination appear at their best and the suite is on the whole faithful to the spirit of childhood, although here and there one imagines that the children must be rather sophisticated. The first movement, "Pavane de la Belle au bois dormant," is very short; on a first hearing it must seem slight in significance; only on repetition is its full charm likely to appear. The second movement, "Petit Poucet" (Hop-o'-my-Thumb), catches graphically the impression of a small child lost in a silent and gloomy forest. The third movement, "Laideronette, Impératrice des Pagodes" (Milk-white, empress of the pagodas), is the most audacious of the lot; it describes with much Chinese color, the music which Milk-white heard when she stepped into the magic bath; it is a tour de force and is sure either to delight one or to make one angry. The fourth movement, "Les entretiens de la Belle et de la Bête" (the conversation of Beauty and the Beast) is a charming little waltz; one may question, however, how much an attemptedly realistic imitation of the growling voice of the beast adds to the effectiveness of the picture. The last, "Le jardin féerique," is a dignified and sonorous climax to the whole suite; the last two pages contain some novel orchestration which every student should carefully analyze.

"L'Heure Espagnole"

Ravel has thus far published two works for the stage, a short opera, "L'Heure Espagnole" and a ballet, "Daphnis et Chloë." It is unfortunate that contemporary European librettists cannot apparently take interest in devising clever characters and situations until or unless their imaginations are fired by something immoral; funny, as well as psychologically realistic, the text of "L'Heure Espagnole" certainly is, but the librettist has spoiled it (and incidentally rendered it impossible for the American stage) by dragging in disgusting remarks and ideas which cannot now be omitted without involving impossible changes in text and music, but which could have been left out of the origi-

[illegible] in the Empire—but in a land, [illegible]ber, in which it will never be conceded by the white race.

"And there remains Gandhi."

Comforts in London's New Zoo

Every animal from the gnu to the hippopotamus will be made to feel comfortably "at home" in London's new Zoo. Even the visitors will be given thrills and pleasures. For instance, they will find themselves separated from the bears by no bars at all, but only by a deep ditch, so that it will appear possible for the beasts to leap upon the visitors if they so desire. The new Zoo will be called "The Mappin Terraces," having been given to the city by the late J. Newton Mappin. The rock-loving sheep and goats will have mountains on which they can enjoy exercise, warm shelters from the wind and flat ground in front where they may come to be fed by the visitors. The bears, most of which have been confined in dismal prisons, will have spacious and varied exercising ground, baths and caves. As the sun moves round they will have shade under one or other of the radiating partitions, and in the hottest weather they will be able to retire into the ditch.

Visitors will be able to see the general panoramic effect of the terraces from the pavilion, the lowest terraces and the side terrace, the gaudy water fowl and deer below, the bears apparently free in the valleys of a mountain, and the sheep and goats on the distant peaks. It is estimated that nearly 5000 persons will be able to see something of the animals simultaneously, an incalculable boon in the small gardens on crowded days.

Near-Riots in Italy's Congress

Lively scenes have been transpiring in the Italian Chamber of late. The sitting had been taken up one day last week with a discussion on the right of one of the Roman members to hold his seat. The vote was by roll call, each member rising in his place and recording his vote as his name was read out. The Socialists wanted to discuss a motion to refer back and to mark their sense of grievance, all answering in unison as the name of each deputy a continuation of Ravel's former tendencies in orchestration, and as the piano reduction of the rest is a clear one, one can reconstruct the remainder of the work enough to discuss it critically as a whole. Throughout the whole ballet Ravel makes effective use of the hidden chorus, singing or humming without words, a device which appeals to modern French composers but which none of them have carried so far before. The plot is conventional and non-essential; Daphnis dances before Chloë and wins her love, but she is carried off by pirates, and he regains her only by appealing to the god Pan to rescue her. The opening hidden chorus and religious dance of the shepherds and shepherdesses is rich and melodious with a freedom from care which modern composers can seldom encompass without becoming trivial; it catches what we suppose to be the spirit of Greek art with distinct success. A secular dance which follows seems to avoid triviality much less successfully; but perhaps the orchestration which for this portion is not yet published, saves it. The grotesque dance of Dorcon, Daphnis's rival, is appropriately set to music; Daphnis's graceful dance is correspondingly pleasing. A short love scene, very richly harmonized, leads to a dance in which Lyceion tries without success to win Daphnis's affections from Chloë. The pirates appear, chase Chloë and capture her while Daphnis is hunting for her.

---

Now begins the beautiful excerpt of which a published orchestral score has been issued. Daphnis, discouraged by his failure to save Chloë from the pirates, lies unconscious before Pan's grotto. Gradually nymphs gather around him and dance; the orchestra, which has begun with a faint tremolo for divided strings suggestive of the murmuring of the trees in the otherwise silent landscape, gradually emerges first into rhythmic and then melodic clarity. The form of Pan appears, and Daphnis implores his aid; then all suddenly becomes dark. Behind the stage, at first very distant, is heard the unseen chorus in weird and indistinct chantings; gradually the voices draw nearer, and at last, after a great crescendo, the scene opens in the pirate's camp, and there is a long and violent dance of the pirates, in which all the more brutal devices of modern orchestration are graphically employed. At the close of this dance the published orchestral score ends. After this dance, Chloë dances, in the hope of regaining freedom, to graceful and gentle music. The pirates are all the more determined to keep her, when suddenly Pan's satyrs, assisted by a thunder storm on the stage and in the orchestra, appear on the scene and save the day. Complete darkness again covers the stage.

If what follows is as well scored as the published orchestral excerpt, it is the most beautiful episode in the entire ballet. Ravel begins vaguely and gradually builds up a melody, as he likes to do, when the orchestra has reached some fulness of tone, shepherds' pipes are heard on the stage, and the hidden voices add a murmuring figure; there is a long crescendo, with reminiscences of the pirate theme and the love theme, and finally a triumphant outburst of the whole orchestra and all the voices, now on the stage, as the lovers are reunited. The next dance, in which Daphnis and Chloë tell the legend of Pan and the nymph Syrinx, seems to me a bit dull musically. The final dance of rejoicing, in which all join, is long and brilliant; in merit it is second only to the music preceding the reunion of Daphnis and Chloë. The whole ballet is remarkable for fertility of inspiration and wealth and originality of treatment; out of a mass of brilliant but never obtrusive technical proficiency, I should select rhythmic variety and vitality and the daring use of the chorus in unusual and difficult harmonies as the most striking features of the treatment, but those who worry about what the future has in store for their ears may feel that the most essential merit of the work is the profusion of melody.

[illegible] and Pulmotor Is Used [illegible]

[illegible] so that a critical [illegible] may be made of what he has done, always with the understanding that such an estimate is no prophecy and does not pretend to say whether he will continue to grow in the present directions, suddenly broaden beyond them, or as suddenly deteriorate and "run dry."

A trait which one early notices in studying Ravel's work is an extraordinary facility and fluency of technique. In his earlier compositions this facility was noticeable chiefly as an almost diabolical cleverness in contriving endlessly interesting details, and it naturally led the careful reader to fear that Ravel would stop there, to spend the rest of his life in "playing smarty" within small limits. In the later songs, however, and in "Daphnis and Chloë" Ravel shows that he has grown to the stage of being able to think on a large scale and to make his music measure up to his conceptions. The mechanically fascinating but spiritually unsatisfying artful dodges of the finale of the quartet and one or two portions of the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" have given way to the structurally organic and emotionally warm, long flights of "Asie," "Le Paon," and the reunion scene in "Daphnis et Chloë." This is encouraging; when a clever man's breadth of vision keeps pace with his technical effervescence, we may expect much of him.

This leads to a direct product of this technical facility, that is, Ravel's uncommon originality of detail. Concerning this trait Mr. Calvocoress, remembered here as the analyst of d'Indy's second symphony, remarks: "I have tried to point out that a musician who thinks of specific ideas . . . will find the most valuable stimuli to creation. I have even been able to reach the conclusion that effort toward distinct and specific expression, such as any musician makes who is inspired by concrete ideas, leads perhaps better than anything else to originality and to felicity of invention; for such a musician will seek a very characteristic and appropriate means of expressing each one of his feelings, of translating each one of his impressions—he can find but one expression for each, and for each he will find one. He will never be willing to repeat himself, or to content himself with one and the same formula to express two different mental experiences. This is the reason why Mr. Maurice Ravel, like certain other young French composers, so abundantly uses novel means which his mind ceaselessly suggests to him, and which he needs in order to realize an adequate expression of what he feels and imagines." It is indeed noticeable that innovations are usually accepted in programme and dramatic music before they are accepted in symphonic music of the "purer" sort; but whether writing descriptive music makes a man original or being original makes a man write in a style where originality is not so severely frowned upon is another question.

Musical Irony

Much more important, however, than his technical proficiency or his originality, though to a great degree depending upon both of them for adequate expression, is Ravel's infusion of irony into the point of view of the composer of a piece of music. Instances of irony have occurred previously in music, but they have been only here and there; the medium has hitherto been too clumsy, and the irony has usually descended into caricature. One may or may not agree with the modern Frenchmen in introducing certain harmonies, melodies, rhythms, and atmospheric devices which we attribute to them, but there is no doubt that every new expansion of resource means expansion of scope, usually in unexpected ways, and certain it is that, for better or worse, the innovations which Debussy introduced as the medium for his superior brand of sentimentalism are now being used by Ravel to express an ironical point of view as far as possible removed from his predecessor's romantic preoccupation with his own solar plexus.

Naturally, this trait will not endear Ravel to those who feel that art must look upon life with the eyes of a school-girl. Devotees of the "happy ending," the "lump in the throat"; self-conscious coddlers of their emotions who construe every "feeling," no matter how unjustified, as a straight tip from the Almighty and eschew everything "intellectual" as cold and dry; suburban romanticists who live upon heroics, fair ladies, cardboard castles and Huyler's chocolates; morally lazy people who cannot bear to be alive unless they can be reassured by "leaders of thought" (heaven save the mark!) that 'tis love, assisted by soft soap, that makes the world go round: these—and not even a majority of them are found in the seminaries—will no doubt find Ravel "unsympathetic," perhaps, even—anathema of anathema!—"inhuman."

His "Inhumanity"

Very well; but has there not, perhaps, been a little more than enough of the other kind of thing in music? In all mentally mature countries the romantic novel has disappeared, except as a commercially exploited product openly designed to meet the limitations of uncultivated people, and the drama and poetry are following suit. In music, however, sentimentality, romanticism, mock heroics, and the emotions which one can spell with a capital have held almost undisputed sway; is there not need for a change?

Moreover, how "unsympathetic" and "inhuman" is Ravel's irony, in reality? Let Mr. Louis Laloy answer: "Maurice Ravel's thought is naturally restrained, keen, and disposed to see the humor in whatever stirs it up. . . . He sees at a glance the unexpected comic touch and the secret grimace hidden beneath the surface of everything. And this light irony, far from suppressing his emotion, stimulates it on the contrary and renders it more poignant; nothing more nearly approaches tears than this kind of smile, which after all is that of Cervantes and Dickens." Certainly this interpretation is justified by the "Pavane for a Dead Child"; equally certainly, no sentimentalist could have written the piece. I can find no cruelty in Ravel's irony; while in the the sentimentalist's [illegible] I usually find shallow-[illegible] Debussy; such [illegible] yet it is un[illegible] written more [illegible] a wider range, and he is [illegible] pleasanter to hear—at first. The new facilities of which both avail themselves are his invention, not Ravel's; one can imagine Debussy without Ravel, hardly Ravel without Debussy. Undoubtedly Debussy today is "greater," i. e., better entitled to general recognition, than Ravel today; yet Ravel is so successful in avoiding Debussy's worst fault, the introspective sentimentalist's necessarily limited outlook upon life, that I find it difficult not to herald Ravel as that composer who first proved that mature masculine ideas could be expressed in the modern French style. But of course I don't say anything so impolitic.

---

His Distinction

To sum up: Maurice Ravel uses Debussy's medium, which he expands by his originality and technical facility, to express ideas which are the product of perceptions at once sympathetic and keenly appreciative of ironical possibility. Until someone exploits the ironical possibilities of our own rag-time rhythms he will probably remain the foremost musical ironist. In other respects he has progressed from the finished expression of small ideas through the inadequate expression of larger ideas to the adequate expression of still larger ones. In that he is a successful innovator he is important; until he has produced several large works in which loftiness of conception is united with breadth of treatment he cannot be called great. In connection with this last matter, the long flights and the warmth and fertility of "Daphnis et Chloë" are more than encouraging.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud for the Sunday Afternoon Concert — Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor for the Next Pair of Symphony Concerts, with Miss Ruth Deyo as Soloist

Symphony Hall: The Symphony Concerts

FOR the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Mr. [illegible] has selected César Franck's only symphony, the magnificent Symphony in D minor, which has already been heard not a few times at these concerts. The work ranks as one of the most mature and noble symphonies of modern times. In it all Franck's personal genius gains fullest play, and the qualities of monotony and coldness which some feel in much of his music are here at their minimum. The work, though lasting some sixty minutes in performance, seems to be the inspiration of the man at its best, rarely sinking below its high level of nobility. Miss Ruth Deyo, a Boston pianist, who has played with the orchestra on tour, will at the coming concerts play Bach's short concerto, No. 14, in F minor, with accompaniment for strings only. Other pieces for the concerts have not been finally selected.

Symphony Hall: Bauer and Thibaud

On Sunday (tomorrow) afternoon, beginning at half-past three, will come the usual Sunday afternoon concert of the Symphony Hall series, interrupted last week because of the "Messiah" performance by the Händel and Haydn Society. The soloists will be Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. The latter was heard here some ten years ago on his only American tour previous to the present. At the time he was "rising"; now he has achieved wide reputation and serious respect in the European capitals, and comes as one of the foremost virtuosi of Europe. He will play three Bach pieces, unaccompanied, including the frequently heard Chaconne. Mr. Pauer will play Schumann's "other" Carnival pieces, the group entitled "Fashingsschwank." The rest of the programme will consist of two sonatas for violin and piano—the Sonato in A by César Franck, easily one of his masterpieces, and the Beethoven Kreutzer Sonata. The programme is decidedly a "heavy" one, but it is not ill arranged and has something "solid" and delightful to offer.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date DEC 24 1913

FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST,

To be Heard at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Next Tuesday,

The unique Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in Providence next Tuesday evening, Dec. 30. Kreisler may be said to have at last come into his own. There is no record in the history of music in this country which shows any success for a violinist equal to that this remarkable artist has enjoyed since he began his tour last October. Of all the instrumentalists who have come to America there is but one who has appealed and does appeal to a larger public and that is, of course, Paderewski. Kreisler seems to have placed the violin on a par with the piano as a favorite instrument with the general public. His modesty of demeanor, his exquisite art, and his sincerity of purpose make him a unique figure among his colleagues. At the Boston Symphony concert he will play the great Brahms Concerto.

Tickets go on sale at Seddon's news-stand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

Es 884

TRAVELER

DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Inasmuch as those who attend our Symphony concerts will have novelty, at least some of them, novelty they will get. It's a question, however, if many in the hall yesterday afternoon with any special desire to hear the five children's pieces by Ravel or Juon's "Watchman's Song" again very soon. They could not very well help wishing that there were novelties of real merit. Those played were interesting in a way, but once is enough.

Against this disappointment, however, there were the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto for violin charmingly played by Mr. Noack; the prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," by Humperdinck and the interesting if not entrancing "Rob Roy" overture of Berlioz.

Next week the program is to be Cesar Franck's symphony and Mozart's Haffner Serenade. Miss Ruth Deyo will be the pianist in a performance of Bach's concerto in F minor for piano and strings.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I. NOV 19 1913
Date
Esta 884

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT

Orchestra Played Superbly — Miss Ruth Deyo, Pianist, Heard with Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last evening at Infantry Hall the second concert of this season's series. The programme was longer than and at the same time being less interesting than at the glorious first concert. Attention was, however, held throughout by judicious arrangement of the numbers given and the evening passed as one of considerable brilliance.

The programme was as follows: Glazounov, symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55—(1) moderato maestoso; allegro; (2) scherzo; moderato; pochissimo meno mosso; (3) andante; (4) allegro maestoso; Smetama, overture to "The Bartered Bride;" Brahms, Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2 for pianoforte, Op. 83; (1) allegro non troppo; (2) allegro appasionato; (3) andante; (4) allegretto grazioso; Weber, "Jubel" overture.

It was the concerto which received the most attention last night, as well as the most applause, and deservedly so. It is one of Brahm's works that is seldom heard, due, no doubt, to its extreme length and austerity.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Ruth Deyo, a young American pianist of growing reputation in Germany, who was heard for the first time in Providence. The main feature of her playing was not her technique, although that was by no means lacking. It was an intelligence that is so often glaringly absent. The pianoforte part of the concerto is almost subordinate to the orchestral part, and while it may have suffered the more so on account of Miss [illegible] lack of masculine strength and [illegible] it was compensated for by [illegible] intelligence with which she [illegible] the pianoforte passages. Her entire grasp of passages of simultaneous contrasting themes was remarkable and her excellence in fine phrasing was notable even here. Her only short-coming indeed seemed to be in the strength, and the breadth and depth of tone which does not seem to be inherent in women pianists, although some have attained these qualities.

The orchestra did its part superbly as always. The andante movement was one of the finest exhibitions of sheer beauty [illegible].

The symphony selected for last evening's concert was the fifth of Glazounov. Its presence on the programme is another indication of Dr. Muck's policy of reviving many of the works which were given as novelties in his former period of conducting the Boston orchestra. This symphony was heard here for the first and only previous time [illegible] 1907. Its repetition was not entirely warranted, as it is not deeply impressive and as a vehicle for displaying the magnificent tone and the brilliancy of the orchestra, there are many better. Both the orchestra and the conductor were in a class above the music itself. The first movement, in which the brass choir particularly shone, presents [illegible] contrasts in color and tone; [illegible] is ingeniously light and fantastic, [illegible] conventionally melancholy [illegible] imagination or special attractiveness. [illegible] first three movements show [illegible], but only the contrapuntal [illegible] the composer, albeit sounding [illegible] times. The finale also is con[illegible] Russian music, a vigorous con[illegible] of rhythm and color ending in [illegible] blatant, hideous cacophony, for [illegible] Macbeth would certainly have re[illegible] the apt phrase "full of sound and [illegible] signifying nothing."

Between the austere classicism of the concerto, and the symphony, with its adherence to conventional ideas and ideals, [illegible] skillfully placed the overture to [illegible] "Bartered Bride." This is a [illegible] much lighter touch, which has [illegible] heard here on several former occasions. It is remarkably sparkling and vigorous, characteristicall[illegible] perfect in form and ingenuit[illegible]. Nothing could have been be[illegible] to fill in this place, and it wa[illegible] spirit of delicacy [illegible] concluded with [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 29.

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Feat of Finesse

ON Saturday evening as on Friday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony Concert was highly pleased with Dr. Muck's Franco-German miscellany. Again Mr. Noack won the deserved applause for the fine skill and the warm voice of the best violin-playing he has yet done in Boston. Again Humperdinck's and Juon's homely music gave hearty pleasure. Finally, Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces delighted a second audience no less than they had a first. Presumably the alert attention and the eager applause rewarded both the music and the performance, since so closely were they fused that the listening ear could hardly discriminate betwe[en] them. Whatever Dr. Muck may have fa[iled] to do with Franck's "Æolides" two mon[ths] ago, he gained with Ravel's pieces rarefied lightness of tone that most them exact. The music is written in fi[la]ments and in filaments was it played, [ex]cept and properly in the final scene "The Fairy Garden," where it is of stou[t] body. Fine and soft as was this to[ne] conductor and orchestra made it as vibr[ant] to rhythm and as mirror-like with h[ar]monic and instrumental color as thou[gh] it had been of twice or thrice its weig[ht] and volume. Ravel has written the f[ive] pieces as miniatures that should cont[ain] a hundred felicities of imagination and expression in little. Mr. Muck and the band played them no less in miniature and with no less perfections, adding their own to those that the composer imposed. Equally, they kept the remote, the wistful, the aerial quality of the music which was to add imagination to virtuosity. Seldom have both men and conductor done such a feat of fanciful finesse.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date [illegible]
Estab 84

Die beiden nächſten Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters finden am Abend des 8., reſp. am Nachmittag des 10. Januars ſtatt und bringen keinen Soliſten. Für den Donnerstag hat Dr. Muck ein klaſſiſches Programm aufgeſtellt, das aus drei kürzeren Symphonien von Haydn, Mozart und Beethoven beſtehen wird; am Samstag Nachmittag gelangt César Franck's D-Moll-Symphonie, Florentin Schmitt's „La Tragédie de Salome" (erſtmalig), und Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Caprice über ein ſpaniſches Thema" zur Wiedergabe.

EVENING TIMES.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

DECEMBER 31, 1913.

AUDIENCE THRILLED BY ART OF KREISLER

Violinist Charms by Brilliant Virtuosity at Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra series was played at Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening before the largest audience of the present season and one of the largest in the history of symphony concerts in Providence. This band of players, hailed by masters of music as one of the truly great orchestras of the world, is of course sufficient attraction in itself, but it is to be doubted if last night's large audience was assembled principally to hear the orchestra. The programme offered as a soloist a violinist who has reached the very front rank, who is undoubtedly one of the most eminent performers in the world and who ranks with the great violinists of all time.

Fritz Kreisler is rapidly reaching the point where critics of music merely discuss and wonder over his work rather than endeavor to make comparisons between him and his contemporary artists. A true virtuoso with technique of matchless brilliancy, combined with that soul for melody without which the most skilled performer cannot reach the hearts of his hearers, he has fairly swept the musical world before him in recent years. One year ago he played the stupendous Beethoven concerto at these concerts in a manner that made its most difficult passages seem like the simplest studies; last evening he chose the Brahms concerto in D-major, a work attempted only by the great, and worthy of the most profound genius that has ever drawn music from the violin.

This was the final number on a long programme, a programme that was never too brilliant, and indeed at times far below the best of Symphony concerts. Kreisler's magnificent art won the tribute of tumultuous applause, which he received with the unaffected calmness which since his first appearance in this country have been a pronounced characteristic.

---

symphony was Schubert's unfinished work, Otto Urack conducting because of the illness of Dr. Muck. It was received with appreciative applause, particularly the second movement, although the first seemed to drag somewhat, the players seeming to lack the inspiration brought out by the more experienced leadership of Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, however, has hosts of friends at local concerts, and he was heartily applauded at the close of the piece.

The other two works for orchestra were Lalo's overture to "The King of Is," and Bizet's suite from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne." Both were brilliantly played, the Bizet suite particularly.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, one of the greatest of woman pianists, will be the soloist at the next concert, which will be given Feb. 3.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City. DEC 27 1913
Date
Estab 4

Plans Classic Music Programme

At the request of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in this city Dr. Karl Muck has made a purely classical programme for the third concert, which will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music January 9. It comprises Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs and Beethoven's First Symphony. The soloists will be Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. In the Handel concerto the soloists will be Witek, violin; Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Wendler and Jaennicke, horn.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 1,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck and Minor Mozart—Two Possible and Deserving "Soloists"—Comparative Programmes—Annual Bruckner

DR. MUCK has rounded out the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday with the Serenade—or as we should say nowadays the Suite—that Mozart wrote as wedding music for the daughter of one of his patrons, the Salzburger, Haffner. Having begun the programme with Franck's symphony and continued it with a little concerto by Bach for piano and strings, his difficulty was to find a piece for ending that would not be at odds with this unusual middle item. Finally, he pitched upon the Haffner Serenade, forgetting perhaps that it is the fourth minor piece by Mozart to be played at the Symphony Concerts within six weeks. A fortnight ago, Mr. Holy and Mr. Maquarre disported themselves—but not their hearers—in Mozart's concerto for flute and harp. Three weeks earlier, in one of Mozart's concertos for violin, Mr. Kreisler glorified the music by his playing of it. A week before, Mozart's "Echo Music" for four small orchestras made a futile postlude to Mahler's mighty symphony. Minor Mozart—music that was written all in the day's work and without a thought on the composer's part that a twentieth century would call it classic—is well enough in its way. It has its tepid interest as a curiosity; it may serve the purposes of an exalting and animating virtuoso; and it may afford its own mild amusement. Not all of us were born, as a distinguished resident composer likes to say he was, "hating Mozart." But four pieces of his minor music in six successive pairs of concerts—to say nothing of a previous symphony of another kind—seems a rather large order of trifle. Dr. Muck should not forget Alice's saying about daily treacle. Some of his irreverent auditors, without the fear of institutions or classics before their eyes, have already recalled it.

As to Soloists

When the list of "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts was announced last autumn, the number of the singers and the virtuosi was smaller than usual, partly because the conductor and the manager wished to engage only "soloists" of the first rank and partly because more concerts by the orchestra unassisted seemed advisable. Incidentally the more room was left for occasional addition to the list, as the season disclosed virtuosi of the piano or the violin worthy of it or other considerations counselled it. Miss Deyo, the pianist, for example, has already been so added, though she was originally reserved for Cambridge and Providence only. Now, two other virtuosi clearly deserve an appearance at the Symphony Concerts. One is Mr. Thibaud, who has never played at them, who visits America at long intervals, and who gave clear proof last Sunday that he is a violinist of the first rank. Not a few who have heard him with orchestra in Europe in recent years will bear willing witness to his deserts. The other is Miss Harrison, indisputably the ablest and the most interesting violoncellist who has come to America in recent years, a virtuosa second only to Mr. Casals in command of her instrument and the music for it. Violoncellists, however eminent, the managers say, do not attract incidental hearers or whet the interest of regular audiences. The more reason, then, why the firmly established Symphony Concerts, devoted loyally to the art of music, should call Miss Harrison to them. It has done so more than once for virtuosi whose just deserts might have passed unheeded—for Mr. B[illegible] [illegible], the violinist, for example, [illegible]

Comparative Programmes

Franck's symphony is the outstanding item in Mr. Muck's programme for Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; but in all probability, Bach's concerto for piano and strings orchestra will then be played for the first times in Boston. In detail, the list of pieces is:

Symphony in D.............................Fra
Concerto in F minor for Piano and Strings..B
The Haffner Serenade.......................Moz
Soloist: Miss Deyo.

Each year at its first pair of concerts in January, the Chicago Orchestra honors the anniversary of the death of the conductor who founded it with a "Theodore Thomas Memorial Programme" drawn wholly from the music of Beethoven. This year it comprises the "Eroica" symphony, the overture to "Egmont" and a triple concerto for piano, violin, violoncello and orchestra.

In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski is making known for the first time in America the orchestral music of Roussel, who ranks with Schmitt in the newest generation of French composers. In full the conductor's programme is:

Pathetic Symphony ....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra..........Zeckwer
"The Rose City," from "Evocations".......Roussell
Overture to the Play "Ruy Blas"...Mendelssohn
Soloist: Mr. Zeckwer.

Minor Notes

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week while the orchestra is making one of its monthly journeys to New York and other cities southward. At the concerts of Jan. 16 and 17 Dr. Muck will accomplish his performance of a symphony by Bruckner—this time the unfinished ninth—and Mr. Bauer will play the piano part in Brahms's first concerto. The piece is seldom heard and Mr. Bauer usually excels himself in it.

In New York next week Dr. Muck will put three symphonies—one by Haydn, one by Mozart and one by Beethoven—into a single programme, a venture he has not made at home since he so carried three to Sanders Theatre at Cambridge at his very first concert there. Having so satisfied—or surfeited—the classicists, he will play Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" at the other concert that the Symphony Orchestra will give in New York.

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 3.

PROGRAMME GOOD AND CONSERVATIVE

FRANCK, BACH AND MOZART'S WORKS

No Modern Music—Miss Ruth Deyo Piano Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Bach—Concerto in F minor, Piano and Strings.
Soloist, Miss Ruth Deyo.
Mozart—Haffner Serenade.

Dr. Muck is showing his colors in the make-up of the Symphony programme. He gives the radicals among his audience all necessary novelties, and Rachmaninoff, Lendvai, Sibelius, Strauss, Bischoff, "et id genus omne," have been performed in a manner that has been phenomenally great. But he takes care to emphasize the fact that America needs to hear more of the classics, if there is to be a real educational value to the great Symphony concerts, and he not only is solicitous about giving the old masterpieces, but he takes care to place them near some of the modern experiments, so that what is sometimes a seductive poison, may at once have its antidote. We need to have much of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart and Haydn, and we need the moderns too, who have passed the experimental stage, composers such as Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and, mingled with these, the musical anarchists will do no harm.

But Cesar Franck belongs to these healthy moderns. Franck and Brahms are the true classicists of the end of the 19th century. And Cesar Franck's D minor symphony will never grow threadbare by repeated hearing. We have had it even two years ago, and frequently before then, at these concerts, but we welcomed it none-the-less yesterday afternoon.

There is no more plagiarism in a composer using a figure that others have employed before him, than there is in a clergyman's using a text that has been preached upon before. The treatment is the thing. It is merely interesting, therefore, to notice that the chief figure of the first movement of this powerful symphony is about the same as the fate-motive of Wagner, the "Muss-es-sein?" of a celebrated Beethoven sonata, and the most prominent figure in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The figure here is D, C-sharp, F, and it is announced in the introduction, at the very first.

Franck is the only modern rival of Brahms in interesting figure-treatment, and he has none of the asceticism or the prolixity of D'Indy in this field. This modest composer did not think it necessary to squeeze the last drop out of his lemons, and to continue his treatment of themes until his auditors felt old age creeping on. The brevity is remarkable in a modern symphony.

As the movement proceeds, a longer figure unfolds itself (12 notes), and this is intertwined most skillfully with the shorter one. It is an intellectual treat to follow these figures in their interweaving, and to notice the first reappearing in the finale. The canonic work evolved from this in the first movement is splendidly effective.

The work has but three movements, yet the essence of the four regular symphonic movements is there all the same, for a Scherzo effect is found within the slow [illegible]

TRAVELER

DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Inasmuch as those who attend our Symphony concerts will have novelty, at least some of them, novelty they will get. It's a question, however, if many left the hall yesterday afternoon with any special desire to hear the five children's pieces by Ravel or Juon's "Watchman's Song" again very soon. They could not very well help wishing that there were novelties of real merit. Those played were interesting in a way, but once is enough.

Against this disappointment, however, there were the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto for violin charmingly played by Mr. Noack; the prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," by Humperdinck and the interesting if not entrancing "Rob Roy" overture of Berlioz.

Next week the program is to be Cesar Franck's symphony and Mozart's Haffner Serenade. Miss Ruth Deyo will be the pianist in a performance of Bach's concerto in F minor for piano and strings.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT

884

Esta

Orchestra Played Superbly Miss Ruth Deyo, Pianis Heard with Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra sented last evening at Infantry Hal second concert of this season's se The programme was longer than at the same time being less interes than at the glorious first concert attention was, however, held throug by judicious arrangement of the n bers given and the evening passed one of considerable brilliance.

The programme was as follows: Glazounov, symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55—(1) moderato maestoso; allegro; (2) scherzo; moderato; pochissimo meno mosso; (3) andante; (4) allegro maestoso; Smetana, overture to "The Bartered Bride;" Brahms, Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2 for pianoforte, Op. 83; (1) allegro non troppo; (2) allegro appasionato; (3) andante; (4) allegretto grazioso; Weber, "Jubel" overture.

It was the concerto which received the most attention last night, as well as the most applause, and deservedly so. It is one of Brahms's works that is seldom heard, due, no doubt, to its extreme length and austerity.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Ruth Deyo, a young American pianist of growing reputation in Germany, who was heard for the first time in Providence. The main feature of her playing was not her technique, although that was by no means lacking. It was an intelligence that is so often glaringly absent. The pianoforte part of the concerto is almost subordinate to the orchestral part, and while it may have appeared the more so on account of Miss Deyo's lack of masculine strength and brilliancy, it was compensated for by the supreme intelligence with which she phrased the pianoforte passages. Her entire grasp of passages of simultaneous contrasting themes was remarkable and her excellence in fine phrasing was notable even here. Her only short-coming indeed seemed to be in the strength, and the breadth and depth of tone which does not seem to be inherent in women pianists, although some have attained these qualities.

The orchestra did its part superbly as always. The andante movement was one of the finest exhibitions of sheer beauty possible.

The symphony selected for last evening's concert was the fifth of Glazounov. Its presence on the programme is another indication of Dr. Muck's policy of reviving many of the works which were given as novelties in his former period of conducting the Boston orchestra. This symphony was heard here for the first and only previous time Jan. 8, 1907. Its repetition was not entirely warranted, as it is not deeply impressive and as a vehicle for displaying the magnificent tone and the brilliancy of the orchestra, there are many better. Both the orchestra and the conductor are in a class above the music itself. The first movement, in which the brass choir particularly shone, presents successive contrasts in color and tone; the scherzo is ingeniously light and fantastic, the andante conventionally melancholy without imagination or special attractiveness—these first three movements show little originality, but only the contrapuntal skill of the composer, albeit sounding [illegible] at times. The finale also is conventional Russian music, a vigorous confusion of rhythm and color ending in blaring, blatant, hideous cacophony, for which Macbeth would certainly have reserved the apt phrase "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Between the austere classicism of the concerto, and the symphony, with its adherence to conventional ideas and ideals, was skillfully placed the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." This is a work of a much lighter touch, which has been heard here on several former occasions. It is remarkably sparkling, spirited and vigorous, characteristically Bohemian, perfect in form and ingenuity of structure. Nothing could have been better chosen to fill in this place, and it was played in an admirable spirit of delicacy and romping fun.

The programme was concluded with [illegible]'s somewhat hackneyed "Jubilee" [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 29,

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Feat of Finesse

ON Saturday evening as on Friday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony Concert was highly pleased with Dr. Muck's Franco-German miscellany. Again Mr. Noack won the deserved applause for the fine skill and the warm voice of the best violin-playing he has yet done in Boston. Again Humperdinck's and Juon's homely music gave hearty pleasure. Finally, Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces delighted a second audience no less than they had a first. Presumably the alert attention and the eager applause rewarded both the music and the performance, sin so closely were they fused that the liste ing ear could hardly discriminate betwe them. Whatever Dr. Muck may have fa to do with Franck's "Æolides" two mon ago, he gained with Ravel's pieces rarefied lightness of tone that most them exact. The music is written in fil ments and in filaments was it played, cept and properly in the final scene "The Fairy Garden," where it is of stout body. Fine and soft as was this to conductor and orchestra made it as vibra to rhythm and as mirror-like with h monic and instrumental color as thou it had been of twice or thrice its weig and volume. Ravel has written the fi pieces as miniatures that should cont a hundred felicities of imagination and expression in little. Mr. Muck and the band played them no less in miniature and with no less perfections, adding their own to those that the composer imposed. Equally, they kept the remote, the wistful, the aerial quality of the music which was to add imagination to virtuosity. Seldom have both men and conductor done such a feat of fanciful finesse.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Estab 84

Die beiden nächſten Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters finden am Abend des 8., reſp. am Nachmittag des 10. Januars ſtatt und bringen keinen Soliſten. Für den Donnerstag hat Dr. Muck ein klaſſiſches Programm aufgeſtellt, das aus drei kürzeren Symphonien von Haydn, Mozart und Beethoven beſtehen wird; am Samstag Nachmittag gelangt César Franck's D-Moll-Symphonie, Florentin Schmitt's „La Tragédie de Salome" (erſtmalig), und Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Caprice über ein ſpaniſches Thema" zur Wiedergabe.

EVENING TIMES.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

DECEMBER 31, 1913.

AUDIENCE THRILLED BY ART OF KREISLER

Violinist Charms by Brilliant Virtuosity at Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra series was played at Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening before the largest audience of the present season and one of the largest in the history of symphony concerts in Providence. This band of players, hailed by masters of music as one of the truly great orchestras of the world, is of course sufficient attraction in itself, but it is to be doubted if last night's large audience was assembled principally to hear the orchestra. The programme offered as a soloist a violinist who has reached the very front rank, who is undoubtedly one of the most eminent performers in the world and who ranks with the great violinists of all time.

Fritz Kreisler is rapidly reaching the point where critics of music merely discuss and wonder over his work rather than endeavor to make comparisons between him and his contemporary artists. A true virtuoso with technique of matchless brilliancy, combined with that soul for melody without which the most skilled performer cannot reach the hearts of his hearers, he has fairly swept the musical world before him in recent years. One year ago he played the stupendous Beethoven concerto at these concerts in a manner that made its most difficult passages seem like the simplest studies; last evening he chose the Brahms concerto in D-major, a work attempted only by the great, and worthy of the most profound genius that has ever drawn music from the violin.

This was the final number on a long programme, a programme that was never too brilliant, and indeed at times far below the best of Symphony concerts. Kreisler's magnificent art won the tribute of tumultuous applause, which he received with the unaffected calmness which since his first appearance in this country have been a pronounced characteristic.

The symphony was Schubert's unfinished work, Otto Urack conducting because of the illness of Dr. Muck. It was received with appreciative applause, particularly the second movement, although the first seemed to drag somewhat, the players seeming to lack the inspiration brought out by the more experienced leadership of Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, however, has hosts of friends at local concerts, and he was heartily applauded a the close of the piece.

The other two works for orchestra were Lalo's overture to "The King of Is," and Bizet's suite from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne." Both were brilliantly played, the Bizet suite particularly.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, one of the greatest of woman pianists, will be the soloist at the next concert, which will be given Feb. 8.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
DEC 27 1913
Date

Estab 4

Plans Classic Music Programme

At the request of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in this city Dr. Karl Muck has made a purely classical programme for the third concert, which will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music January 9. It comprises Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs and Beethoven's First Symphony. The soloists will be Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. In the Handel concerto the soloists will be Witek, violin; Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Wendler and Jaennicke, horn.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 1,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck and Minor Mozart—Two Possible and Deserving "Soloists"—Comparative Programmes—Annual Bruckner

DR. MUCK has rounded out the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday with the Serenade—or as we should say nowadays the Suite—that Mozart wrote as wedding music for the daughter of one of his patrons, the Salzburger, Haffner. Having begun the programme with Franck's symphony and continued it with a little concerto by Bach for piano and strings, his difficulty was to find a piece for ending that would not be at odds with this unusual middle item. Finally, he pitched upon the Haffner Serenade, forgetting perhaps that it is the fourth minor piece by Mozart to be played at the Symphony Concerts within six weeks. A fortnight ago, Mr. Holy and Mr. Maquarre disported themselves—but not their hearers—in Mozart's concerto for flute and harp. Three weeks earlier, in one of Mozart's concertos for violin, Mr. Kreisler glorified the music by his playing of it. A week before, Mozart's "Echo Music" for four small orchestras made a futile postlude to Mahler's mighty symphony. Minor Mozart—music that was written all in the day's work and without a thought on the composer's part that a twentieth century would call it classic—is well enough in its way. It has its tepid interest as a curiosity; it may serve the purposes of an exalting and animating virtuoso; and it may afford its own mild amusement. Not all of us were born, as a distinguished resident composer likes to say he was, "hating Mozart." But four pieces of his minor music in six successive pairs of concerts—to say nothing of a previous symphony of another kind—seems a rather large order of trifle. Dr. Muck should not forget Alice's saying about daily treacle. Some of his irreverent auditors, without the fear of institutions or classics before their eyes, have already recalled it.

As to Soloists

When the list of "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts was announced last autumn, the number of the singers and the virtuosi was smaller than usual, partly because the conductor and the manager wished to engage only "soloists" of the first rank and partly because more concerts by the orchestra unassisted seemed advisable. Incidentally the more room was left for occasional addition to the list, as the season disclosed virtuosi of the piano or the violin worthy of it or other considerations counselled it. Miss Deyo, the pianist, for example, has already been so added, though she was originally reserved for Cambridge and Providence only. Now, two other virtuosi clearly deserve an appearance at the Symphony Concerts. One is Mr. Thibaud, who has never played at them, who visits America at long intervals, and who gave clear proof last Sunday that he is a violinist of the first rank. Not a few who have heard him, with orchestra in Europe in recent years will bear willing witness to his deserts. The other is Miss Harrison, indisputably the ablest and the most interesting violoncellist who has come to America in recent years, a virtuosa second only to Mr. Casals, in command of her instrument and the music for it. Violoncellists, however eminent, the managers say, do not attract incidental hearers or whet the interest of regular audiences. The more reason, then, why the firmly established Symphony Concerts, devoted loyally to the art of music, should call Miss Harrison to them. It has done so more than once for virtuosi whose just deserts might have passed unheeded—for Mr. Berber, the violinist, for example, in [illegible]

Comparative Programmes

Franck's symphony is the outstand item in Mr. Muck's programme for Symphony Concerts of Friday aftern and Saturday evening; but in all proba ity, Bach's concerto for piano and str orchestra will then be played for the f times in Boston. In detail, the list pieces is:

Symphony in D........................Fra
Concerto in F minor for Piano and Strings..B
The Haffner Serenade......................Moz
Soloist: Miss Deyo.

Each year at its first pair of conce in January, the Chicago Orchestra hon the anniversary of the death of the co ductor who founded it with a "Theodor Thomas Memorial Programme" draw wholly from the music of Beethoven. Th year it comprises the "Eroica" symphon the overture to "Egmont" and a tripl concerto for piano, violin, violoncello an orchestra.

In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski is making known for the first time in America the orchestral music of Roussel, who ranks with Schmitt in the newest generation of French composers. In full the conductor's programme is:

Pathetic Symphony ....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra........Zeckwer
"The Rose City," from "Evocations"......Roussell
Overture to the Play "Ruy Blas"...Mendelssohn
Soloist: Mr. Zeckwer.

Minor Notes

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week while the orchestra is making one of its monthly journeys to New York and other cities southward. At the concerts of Jan. 16 and 17 Dr. Muck will accomplish his performance of a symphony by Bruckner—this time the unfinished ninth—and Mr. Bauer will play the piano part in Brahms's first concerto. The piece is seldom heard and Mr. Bauer usually excels himself in it.

In New York next week Dr. Muck will put three symphonies—one by Haydn, one by Mozart and one by Beethoven—into a single programme, a venture he has not made at home since he so carried three to Sanders Theatre at Cambridge at his very first concert there. Having so satisfied—or surfeited—the classicists, he will pla Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" at the othe concert that the Symphony Orchestra wi give in New York.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 3,

PROGRAMME GOOD AND CONSERVATIVE

FRANCK, BACH AND MOZART'S WORKS

No Modern Music—Miss Ruth Deyo Piano Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Bach—Concerto in F minor, Piano and Strings.
Soloist, Miss Ruth Deyo.
Mozart—Haffner Serenade.

Dr. Muck is showing his colors in the make-up of the Symphony programme. He gives the radicals among his audience all necessary novelties, and Rachmaninoff, Lendvai, Sibelius, Strauss, Bischoff, "et id genus omne," have been performed in a manner that has been phenomenally great. But he takes care to emphasize the fact that America needs to hear more of the classics, if there is to be a real educational value to the great Symphony concerts, and he not only is solicitous about giving the old masterpieces, but he takes care to place them near some of the modern experiments, so that what is sometimes a seductive poison, may at once have its antidote. We need to have much of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart and Haydn, and we need the moderns too, who have passed the experimental stage, composers such as Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and, mingled with these, the musical anarchists will do no harm.

But Cesar Franck belongs to these healthy moderns. Franck and Brahms are the true classicists of the end of the 19th century. And Cesar Franck's D minor symphony will never grow threadbare by repeated hearing. We have had it even two years ago, and frequently before then, at these concerts, but we welcomed it none-the-less yesterday afternoon.

There is no more plagiarism in a composer using a figure that others have employed before him, than there is in a clergyman's using a text that has been preached upon before. The treatment is the thing. It is merely interesting, therefore, to notice that the chief figure of the first movement of this powerful symphony is about the same as the fate-motive of Wagner, the "Muss-es-sein?" of a celebrated Beethoven sonata, and the most prominent figure in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The figure here is D, C-sharp, F, and it is announced in the introduction, at the very first.

Franck is the only modern rival of Brahms in interesting figure-treatment, and he has none of the asceticism or the prolixity of D'Indy in this field. This modest composer did not think it necessary to squeeze the last drop out of his lemons, and to continue his treatment of themes until his auditors felt old age creeping on. The brevity is remarkable in a modern symphony.

As the movement proceeds, a longer figure unfolds itself (12 notes), and this is intertwined most skillfully with the shorter one. It is an intellectual treat to follow these figures in their interweaving, and to notice the first reappearing in the finale. The canonic work evolved from this in the first movement is splendidly effective.

The work has but three movements, yet the essence of the four regular symphonic movements is there all the same, for a Scherzo effect is found within the slow movement. The finale is grandly triumph- [illegible]

TRAVELER

DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Inasmuch as those who attend our Symphony concerts will have novelty, at least some of them, novelty they will get. Its a question, however, if many left the hall yesterday afternoon with any special desire to hear the five children's pieces by Ravel or Juon's "Watchman's Song" again very soon. They could not very well help wishing that there were novelties of real merit. Those played were interesting in a way, but once is enough.

Against this disappointment, however, there were the beautiful Mendelssohn concerto for violin charmingly played by Mr. Noack; t he prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," by Humperdinck and the interesting if not entrancing "Rob Roy" overture of Berlioz.

Next week the program is to be Cesar Franck's symphony and Mozart's Haffner Serenade. Miss Ruth Deyo will be the pianist in a performance of Bach's concerto in F minor for piano and strings.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Est

884

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT

Orchestra Played Superbly and Miss Ruth Deyo, Pianist, Heard with Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last evening at Infantry Hall the second concert of this season's series. The programme was longer than usual at the same time being less interesting than at the glorious first concert. The attention was, however, held throughout by judicious arrangement of the numbers given and the evening passed as one of considerable brilliance.

The programme was as follows: Glazounov, symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55—(1) moderato maestoso; allegro; (2) scherzo; moderato; pochissime meno mosso; (3) andante; (4) allegro maestoso; Smetama, overture to "The Bartered Bride;" Brahms, Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2 for pianoforte, Op. 83; (1) allegro non troppo; (2) allegro appasionato; (3) andante; (4) allegretto grazioso; Weber, "Jubel" overture.

It was the concerto which received the most attention last night, as well as the most applause, and deservedly so. It is one of Brahm's works that is seldom heard, due, no doubt, to its extreme length and austerity.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Ruth Deyo, a young American pianist of growing reputation in Germany, who was heard for the first time in Providence. The main feature of her playing was not her technique, although that was by no means lacking. It was an intelligence that is so often glaringly absent. The pianoforte part of the concerto is almost subordinate to the orchestral part, and while it may have appeared the more so on account of Miss Deyo's lack of masculine strength and brilliancy, it was compensated for by the supreme intelligence with which she phrased the pianoforte passages. Her entire grasp of passages of simultaneous contrasting themes was remarkable and her excellence in fine phrasing was notable even here. Her only short-coming indeed seemed to be in the strength, and the breadth and depth of tone which does not seem to be inherent in women pianists, although some have attained these qualities.

The orchestra did its part superbly as always. The andante movement was one of the finest exhibitions of sheer beauty possible.

The symphony selected for last evening's concert was the fifth of Glazounov. Its presence on the programme is another indication of Dr. Muck's policy of reviving many of the works which were given as novelties in his former period of conducting the Boston orchestra. This symphony was heard here for the first and only previous time Jan. 8, 1907. Its repetition was not entirely warranted, as it is not deeply impressive and as a vehicle for displaying the magnificant tone and the brilliancy of the orchestra, there are many better.

Both the orchestra and the conductor are in a class above the music itself. The first movement, in which the brass choir particularly shone, presents successive contrasts in color and tone; the scherzo is ingeniously light and fantastic, the andante conventionally melancholy without imagination or special attractiveness—these first three movements show little originality, but only the contrapuntal skill of the composer, albeit sounding [illegible] at times. The finale also is conventional Russian music, a vigorous confusion of rhythm and color ending in blaring, blatant, hideous cacophony, for which Macbeth would certainly have reserved the apt phrase "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Between the austere classicism of the concerto, and the symphony, with its adherence to conventional ideas and ideals, was skilfully placed the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." This is a work of a much lighter touch, which has been heard here on several former occasions. It is remarkably sparkling, spirited and vigorous, characteristically Bohemian, perfect in form and ingenuity of structure. Nothing could have been better chosen to fill in this place, and it was played in an admirable spirit of delicacy and romping fun.

The programme was concluded with eber's somewhat hackneyed "Jubilee"

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 29,

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Feat of Finesse

ON Saturday evening as on Friday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony Concert was highly pleased with Dr. Muck's Franco-German miscellany. Again Mr. Noack won the deserved applause for the fine skill and the warm voice of the best violin-playing he has yet done in Boston. Again Humperdinck's and Juon's homely music gave hearty pleasure. Finally, Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces delighted a second audience no less than they had a first. Presumably the alert attention and the eager applause rewarded both the music and the performance, since so closely were they fused that the listening ear could hardly discriminate between them. Whatever Dr. Muck may have failed to do with Franck's "Æolides" two months ago, he gained with Ravel's pieces the rarefied lightness of tone that most of them exact. The music is written in filaments and in filaments was it played, except and properly in the final scene of "The Fairy Garden," where it is of stouter body. Fine and soft as was this tone, conductor and orchestra made it as vibrant to rhythm and as mirror-like with harmonic and instrumental color as though it had been of twice or thrice its weight and volume. Ravel has written the five pieces as miniatures that should contain a hundred felicities of imagination and expression in little. Mr. Muck and the band played them no less in miniature and with no less perfections, adding their own to those that the composer imposed. Equally, they kept the remote, the wistful, the aerial quality of the music which was to add imagination to virtuosity. Seldom have both men and conductor done such a feat of fanciful finesse.

STAATSZEITUNG
New York City.

ie beiden nächſten Konzerte des Bor Symphonie-Orcheſters finden am nd des 8., reſp. am Nachmittag des anuars ſtatt und bringen keinen So-
n. Für den Donnerstag hat Dr.
ein klaſſiſches Programm aufgeſtellt, us drei kürzeren Symphonien von n Mozart und Beethoven beſtehen rd; am Samstag Nachmittag gelangt César Franck's D-Moll-Symphonie, Flo-rentin Schmitt's „La Tragédie de Salome" (erſtmalig), und Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Caprice über ein ſpaniſches Thema" zur Wiedergabe.

34

EVENING TIMES.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

DECEMBER 31, 1913.

AUDIENCE THRILLED BY ART OF KREISLER

Violinist Charms by Brilliant Virtuosity at Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra series was played at Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening before the largest audience of the present season and one of the largest in the history of symphony concerts in Providence. This band of players, hailed by masters of music as one of the truly great orchestras of the world, is of course sufficient attraction in itself, but it is to be doubted if last night's large audience was assembled principally to hear the orchestra. The programme offered as a soloist a violinist who has reached the very front rank, who is undoubtedly one of the most eminent performers in the world and who ranks with the great violinists of all time.

Fritz Kreisler is rapidly reaching the point where critics of music merely discuss and wonder over his work rather than endeavor to make comparisons between him and his contemporary artists. A true virtuoso with technique of matchless brilliancy, combined with that soul for melody without which the most skilled performer cannot reach the hearts of his hearers, he has fairly swept the musical world before him in recent years. One year ago he played the stupendous Beethoven concerto at these concerts in a manner that made its most difficult passages seem like the simplest studies; last evening he chose the Brahms concerto in D-major, a work attempted only by the great, and worthy of the most profound genius that has ever drawn music from the violin.

This was the final number on a long programme, a programme that was never too brilliant, and indeed at times far below the best of Symphony concerts. Kreisler's magnificent art won the tribute of tumultuous applause, which he received with the unaffected calmness which since his first appearance in this country have been a pronounced characteristic.

The symphony was Schubert's unfinished work, Otto Urack conducting because of the illness of Dr. Muck. It was received with appreciative applause, particularly the second movement, although the first seemed to drag somewhat, the players seeming to lack the inspiration brought out by the more experienced leadership of Dr. Muck. Mr. Urack, however, has hosts of friends at local concerts, and he was heartily applauded at the close of the piece.

The other two works for orchestra were Lalo's overture to "The King of Is," and Bizet's suite from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne." Both were brilliantly played, the Bizet suite particularly.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, one of the greatest of woman pianists, will be the soloist at the next concert, which will be given Feb. 8.

UNE
ew York City.

DEC 27 1913

lassic Music Programme

request of many subscribers to oston Symphony concerts in this Dr. Karl Muck has made a purely ical programme for the third con which will be given at the Brook Academy of Music January 9. It mprises Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs and Beethoven's First Symphony. The soloists will be Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. In the Handel concerto the soloists will be Witek, violin; Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Wendler and Jaennicke, horn.

4

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 1,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Dr. Muck and Minor Mozart—Two Possible and Deserving "Soloists"—Comparative Programmes—Annual Bruckner

DR. MUCK has rounded out the programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday with the Serenade—or as we should say nowadays the Suite—that Mozart wrote as wedding music for the daughter of one of his patrons, the Salzburger, Haffner. Having begun the programme with Franck's symphony and continued it with a little concerto by Bach for piano and strings, his difficulty was to find a piece for ending that would not be at odds with this unusual middle item. Finally, he pitched upon the Haffner Serenade, forgetting perhaps that it is the fourth minor piece by Mozart to be played at the Symphony Concerts within six weeks. A fortnight ago, Mr. Holy and Mr. Maquarre disported themselves—but not their hearers—in Mozart's concerto for flute and harp. Three weeks earlier, in one of Mozart's concertos for violin, Mr. Kreisler glorified the music by his playing of it. A week before, Mozart's "Echo Music" for four small orchestras made a futile postlude to Mahler's mighty symphony. Minor Mozart—music that was written all in the day's work and without a thought on the composer's part that a twentieth century would call it classic—is well enough in its way. It has its tepid interest as a curiosity; it may serve the purposes of an exalting and animating virtuoso; and it may afford its own mild amusement. Not all of us were born, as a distinguished resident composer likes to say he was, "hating Mozart." But four pieces of his minor music in six successive pairs of concerts—to say nothing of a previous symphony of another kind—seems a rather large order of trifle. Dr. Muck should not forget Alice's saying about daily treacle. Some of his irreverent auditors, without the fear of institutions or classics before their eyes, have already recalled it.

As to Soloists

When the list of "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts was announced last autumn, the number of the singers and the virtuosi was smaller than usual, partly because the conductor and the manager wished to engage only "soloists" of the first rank and partly because more concerts by the orchestra unassisted seemed advisable. Incidentally the more room was left for occasional addition to the list, as the season disclosed virtuosi of the piano or the violin worthy of it or other considerations counselled it. Miss Deyo, the pianist, for example, has already been so added, though she was originally reserved for Cambridge and Providence only. Now, two other virtuosi clearly deserve an appearance at the Symphony Concerts. One is Mr. Thibaud, who has never played at them, who visits America at long intervals, and who gave clear proof last Sunday that he is a violinist of the first rank. Not a few who have heard him with orchestra in Europe in recent years will bear willing witness to his deserts. The other is Miss Harrison, indisputably the ablest and the most interesting violoncellist who has come to America in recent years, a virtuosa second only to Mr. Casals, in command of her instrument and the music for it. Violoncellists, however eminent, the managers say, do not attract incidental hearers or whet the interest of regular audiences. The more reason, then, why the firmly established Symphony Concerts, devoted loyally to the art of music, should call Miss Harrison to them. It has done so more than once for virtuosi whose just deserts might have passed unheeded—for Mr. Ber-ber, the violinist, for example, in

Comparative Programmes

Franck's symphony is the outstand item in Mr. Muck's programme for Symphony Concerts of Friday aftern and Saturday evening; but in all proba ity, Bach's concerto for piano and str orchestra will then be played for the f times in Boston. In detail, the list pieces is:

Symphony in D.............................Fra
Concerto in F minor for Piano and Strings..B
The Haffner Serenade.......................Moz
Soloist: Miss Deyo.

Each year at its first pair of conce in January, the Chicago Orchestra hon the anniversary of the death of the co ductor who founded it with a "Theodor Thomas Memorial Programme" draw wholly from the music of Beethoven. Th year it comprises the "Eroica" symphon the overture to "Egmont" and a tripl concerto for piano, violin, violoncello an orchestra.

In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski is making known for the first time in America the orchestral music of Roussel, who ranks with Schmitt in the newest generation of French composers. In full the conductor's programme is:

Pathetic Symphony ....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra........Zeckwer
"The Rose City," from "Evocations"....Roussell
Overture to the Play "Ruy Blas"...Mendelssohn
Soloist: Mr. Zeckwer.

Minor Notes

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week while the orchestra is making one of its monthly journeys to New York and other cities southward. At the concerts of Jan. 16 and 17 Dr. Muck will accomplish his performance of a symphony by Bruckner—this time the unfinished ninth—and Mr. Bauer will play the piano part in Brahms's first concerto. The piece is seldom heard and Mr. Bauer usually excels himself in it.

In New York next week Dr. Muck will put three symphonies—one by Haydn, one by Mozart and one by Beethoven—into a single programme, a venture he has not made at home since he so carried three to Sanders Theatre at Cambridge at his very first concert there. Having so satisfied—or surfeited—the classicists, he will pla Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" at the othe concert that the Symphony Orchestra wi give in New York.

ADVERTISER.

JANUARY 3.

PROGRAMME GOOD AND CONSERVATIVE

FRANCK, BACH AND MOZART'S WORKS

No Modern Music—Miss Ruth Deyo Piano Soloist at This Week's Symphony Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Bach—Concerto in F minor, Piano and Strings.
Soloist, Miss Ruth Deyo.
Mozart—Haffner Serenade.

Dr. Muck is showing his colors in the make-up of the Symphony programme. He gives the radicals among his audience all necessary novelties, and Rachmaninoff, Lendvai, Sibelius, Strauss, Bischoff, "et id genus omne," have been performed in a manner that has been phenomenally great. But he takes care to emphasize the fact that America needs to hear more of the classics, if there is to be a real educational value to the great Symphony concerts, and he not only is solicitous about giving the old masterpieces, but he takes care to place them near some of the modern experiments, so that what is sometimes a seductive poison, may at once have its antidote. We need to have much of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart and Haydn, and we need the moderns too, who have passed the experimental stage, composers such as Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and, mingled with these, the musical anarchists will do no harm.

But Cesar Franck belongs to these healthy moderns. Franck and Brahms are the true classicists of the end of the 19th century. And Cesar Franck's D minor symphony will never grow threadbare by repeated hearing. We have had it even two years ago, and frequently before then, at these concerts, but we welcomed it none-the-less yesterday afternoon.

There is no more plagiarism in a composer using a figure that others have employed before him, than there is in a clergyman's using a text that has been preached upon before. The treatment is the thing. It is merely interesting, therefore, to notice that the chief figure of the first movement of this powerful symphony is about the same as the fate-motive of Wagner, the "Muss-es-sein?" of a celebrated Beethoven sonata, and the most prominent figure in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The figure here is D, C-sharp, F, and it is announced in the introduction, at the very first.

Franck is the only modern rival of Brahms in interesting figure-treatment, and he has none of the asceticism or the prolixity of D'Indy in this field. This modest composer did not think it necessary to squeeze the last drop out of his lemons, and to continue his treatment of themes until his auditors felt old age creeping on. The brevity is remarkable in a modern symphony.

As the movement proceeds, a longer figure unfolds itself (12 notes), and this is intertwined most skillfully with the shorter one. It is an intellectual treat to follow these figures in their interweaving, and to notice the first reappearing in the finale. The canonic work evolved from this in the first movement is splendidly effective.

The work has but three movements, yet the essence of the four regular symphonic movements is there all the same, for a Scherzo effect is found within the slow movement. The finale is grandly triumph

Throughout the [illegible] symphony one can [illegible] the surety of the composer. He is [illegible] struggling on like a poor after-dinner speaker, who goes on interminably because he cannot find a successful place to stop, but he delivers his message clearly and intelligibly, and with just the right proportion of emotion and intellectuality. The final movement is comparable to the Finale of Brahms' C minor symphony in its summing up of preceding material, and better than that work in its sense of Victory after struggle.

The second movement is somewhat dwarfed by the great power of the first and last movements, but here the delicate theme upon the English horn (finely played, too) deserves mention, and also the work of the French horn in the first two movements. Altogether this is a symphony that one cannot hear too often; each repetition seems to show forth new beauties even to the musician, and much more to the layman. There was much applause at the end of the work, the conductor was twice recalled, and the orchestra forced to rise in acknowledgment of the enthusiasm.

Bach's concerto for piano and strings was given for the first time in these concerts. It gave no great display of virtuosity to the soloist, in the modern sense, yet it had its difficulties too. There is a beautiful serenity in the ensemble work of Bach, when there was no attempt made to read more into it than the composer meant. Miss Ruth Deyo made an excellent impression both by her performance and her attractive stage presence. She played in an unaffected and very musicianly manner, with good attention to the ensemble, and conductor and soloist did not engage in a tug-of-war, as was recently done. The mysterious movement without a tempo mark was taken as an allegretto, a litt[le] quicker than what Handel would ha[ve] called "a tempo ordinario," which w[as] about right.

The first movement was much the best in this work, the short Largo and final Presto falling off greatly in interest. But Miss Deyo's conscientious work aroused much enthusiasm and she was heartily recalled again and again.

Mozart's Serenade (the "Haffner"—the origin of the name explained in the programme-book) brought the sedate proceedings to an end. Therefore there was no admixture of modern music—Franck belongs to the classics—in this concert. Perhaps Dr. Muck is insisting too strongly upon Mozart in recent programmes. An English devotee, some 75 years ago, wrote: "There is nothing perfect under the sun, except the compositions of Mozart," but we doubt if any modern auditors can share this extreme enthusiasm. With us the Mozart symphonies do not wear as well as those of Haydn, and his lesser instrumental works are still less perennial.

A Serenade, in the olden days, was a less ambitious, less developed Suite. So that in such a work very simple orchestration and briefly stated musical thoughts go hand in hand. After the intellectual feast that had preceded the auditor craved a little excitement. He did not get it. If there was any frenzy in the Mozart Serenade it escaped our notice. One felt somewhat as one does in church at—"Twelfthly, my dear brethren, —"

Yet there were beauties of thought and especially of instrumental execution too, in this music of Miss Haffner's wedding. Perhaps with a Salzburger banquet conjoined it might have been quite enjoyable. But given without the spread it was a trifle tepid and the concert seemed a little too orthodox.

BOSTON GLOBE—

JANUARY 3.

FRANCK'S SYMPHONY.

Noble Work Given Fitting Interpretation.

Miss Deyo Displays No Particular Distinction as Soloist.

The 11th Symphony rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon. Dr Muck conducted. The soloist was Miss Ruth Deyo. The program was as follows:

Franck........Symphony in D minor
J S Bach....Piano concerto in F minor
Mozart..Serenade in D major, Haffner

Cesar Franck's noble symphony and the inspired playing of it by Dr Muck and the orchestra were the features of the afternoon. Like Beethoven's choral symphony, certain pages from "Tristan and Isolde" as the prelude, the love music of the second act and of Isolde's renunciation in the last, like Siegfried's funeral music and certain pages from "The Messiah," this work of the humble Belgian, beloved by his pupils and the few who knew him, should be played with the true festival spirit, with the sincerity of dedication.

Had the concert ended yesterday at the close of the symphony and the audience departed it would have been with the undimmed and glowing impressions of one of the supreme musical experiences which Dr Muck and his players have given their hearers at any time. It was an hour in which men performing upon instruments of substance and reality were enabled to call up the illusion of spiritual things; to convey and recreate the lofty beauty of this music, as the composer in the quiet of his dreams may have heard the stars sing its themes together. There was the undaunted impulse of a simple, adoring, rejoicing heart, one filled with the sunlight of the heavens, one not devoid of the comfort of hope in unfathomable mystery or in blessed melancholy. Whoever could forget the haunting lovliness of the opening measures of plucked strings and the song of the English horn in the slow movement?

These pages reflect the winged aspiration and the serenity in repose of a soul which had communed with some less sordid and troubled world than ours. It is essentially music of the innermost recesses of the soul and to each hearer it may discover its own truth. Never more than yesterday was it apparent how great could be the sacrilege should profane hands uncover it or how little the written symbols upon the paper contain and expose its wealth of beauty.

[illegible] behest of a penetrating mind of fine sensibility and revenence. The fluid, splendidly proportioned, imaginatively and logically developed structure of the symphony ever will be a model for the analyst, nor will it be less majestic in such a performance, but here is music which transcends the gross and earthly, which is a greater service.

Notwithstanding her generous applause it scarcely could be to her playing that Miss Deyo attributed her appearance. She was not called upon to expose all of her gifts in the first movement, but the melody in the piano of the second had not proceeded far before she disclosed her lack of nuance, her inability to sing a phrase broadly and with dignity or to impart any quality of distinction to her style. It was ordinary playing not associated with soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mozart's serenade was composed for the wedding of a daughter of a wealthy patron of the young composer, a successful merchant and prominent citizen. The opening allegro with its characteristic Mozartean flourishes and formulas, which might have enlivened the wit at the marriage feast, is not unlike otherwise composed to order for an occasion. But the three movements which follow, beside exploiting the gifts of the first violin, both in tonal embroidery and in sustained song—admirably reproduced by Mr Witek yesterday—bring forward some writing in Mozart's finest vein, graceful, fertile in ideas, and dressed in the elegance of style that characterizes him. The final andante and adagio are less ingratiating. Dr Muck played the pieces with a light and facile touch, unfailing clarity and precision. There will be no concerts next week.

[B]OSTON POST,

JANUARY 3, 1914

SYMPHONY OF FRANCK PERFORMED

Grandeur of Work Made Compelling by Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES

In this city, at least, the great symphony of Cesar Franck had never stood out in such compelling grandeur as when performed by Dr. Muck and his men yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The work stands alone in symphonic literature. The heroic outlines, the dark coloring and the mystical aspiration of the music tower up like a Gothic cathedral in an age of scepticism and inquiry. And the symphony is built on bases that are as the foundations of the universe. Franck, pure in his faith, in the midst of Paris of the late 19th century, produced this marvel of genius.

NOBILITY EMPHASIZED

Not only in certain features of construction is this symphony unique. There is a wonderful union of the most sensitive feeling, feeling so subjectively expressed that not even the music of Robert Schumann carries a more intimate appeal, and a greatness of architecture, a virile and dramatic manner that is only paralleled among the masterpieces of symphonic composition. Tender, mythical, personal as he always is, Franck rises on the wings of his form, his cathedral of tone, until on a height he speaks as a prophet for all humanity. He could have inscribed on his title page, without sacriligiousness, a line from his beloved beatitudes, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

It was the beauty and the strength of the architecture, and the soaring nobility of the thought, that were especially emphasized by Dr. Muck yesterday. Some might have differed a little with his choice of tempi in the first movement. The pontifical majesty of the passage where the theme of the introduction is handled in a canonic manner by the brass could well have been taken a trifle slower. Some would have said also, that the main body of the movement could have gone a trifle faster, which would have been directly foreign to Dr. Muck's conception. And a faster pace would have been foreign to the breadth and the richness of the music. No symphonist ever achieved a more remarkable blend of the best characteristics of classic and modern music than Franck in this symphony, and Dr. Muck justly emphasized more than any conductor before him the classic qualities of the ground scheme of the work. Never had each section and each movement so cohered. The music was welded together so that it was entirely indivisible, from the first measure to the last.

Freedom of Tone Poem

Franck was in many respects indebted to Liszt—in none more so than in his "cyclic" employment of themes. Yet with the harmonic resources of Liszt at his command—a basis upon which Franck built a system of harmony that for subtlety of coloring and yet emphasis of tonality has no equal today—Franck mingled a command of counterpoint which was never Liszt's. Hence his music, with all its mezzo-tints, is rock-ribbed and of a continuous development and resource in the handling [illegible]

[illegible] genius of the future [illegible] symphony. And who has observed [illegible] nobly the balance between the classic and the modern styles?

The classic symphony, with separate movements and each movement with motives of its own; the romantic "tone-poem" and the metamorphoses of one or more motives within the confines of a single movement, are here superseded by a symphony built on basic themes which reappear in successive movements and which preserves the balance and proportion, the inexorable logic of the symphony, and the freedom and eloquence of the tone-poem and its continuous story.

Dramatic in Extreme

And how dramatic is the recurrence of these themes! Take the powerful phrase that opens and closes most mightily the first movement, and its reappearance at the end of the finale. It is whispered, first by woodwind instruments, then by string, over chords deeper than ever plummet sounded, chords peculiarly spaced and employed in a manner that has little precedent save in certain scores of Beethoven. Then, over a mysterious swinging bass the horns call tenderly, and the harp enters, and this theme, now a summons from the sky, is borne up on waves of tone, is answered by another theme of the first movement, and is finally lost in the triumphant fanfares that bring the movement to an end. It is as though the sky had opened, and the seraphim and the cherubim were seen on high. It has been said that the genius of Franck was not dramatic. As a matter of fact, there are hardly any passages in symphonic literature so dramatic as the first and last movements of this symphony. Contrasted are the strange whisperings of the middle movement—a movement which includes some of the tenderest music known to man, and a series of variations of singular and engrossing originality. And then the instrumentation! What composer developed an orchestral style more characteristic of his ideas? Franck's symphony, with its splendid basses and its sombre coloring, is like a great organ. Nor is the music without its touch of gorgeous pomp and ceremonial.

Puzzled by Its Coloring

The symphony is now familiar and one of the most admired compositions of the orchestral repertoire, although it is but ten years since Mr. Gericke introduced the work in Boston, and every reviewer and the great majority of hearers were then merely puzzled by its strange coloring and the striking originality of the harmonic scheme. Of all things, music is consumed quickest in the heat of its own flame; yet it is reasonable to believe that this masterwork of Franck's will be heard with the few masterpieces of each period that remain to interest and move future generations.

After the performance there was so much applause that Dr. Muck, returning to the stage for the third time, had his men rise with him in acknowledgment.

Miss Ruth Deyo then played a concerto by Bach in the key of F minor, for piano and strings. Miss Deyo acquitted herself of her task in a musicianly manner, although she makes constant and unnecessary use of her arms and wrists in playing, and she sacrificed herself in the cause of Bach.

Only in the slow movement of this piece has the piano very much of its own to say. For the remainder of the time it is almost always in unison with the strings, nor can it be said that the first movement of this concerto is especially interesting music. The occasion only lacked Mr. Arnold Dolmetch and his harpsichord. The slow movement of the concerto seemed to us the only movement that warranted exhumation. The concert came to an end with Mozart's Serenade.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 3,

SYMPHONY GIVEN MERITED OVATION

Dr. Muck Leads Masterly Performance of Cesar Franck Work.

Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which fairly divided with the Brahms symphony in C minor the distinction of being the finest symphonic composition of the past century, is the salient feature of this week's Symphony program.

The orchestra was honored with an ovation after its performance of the work yesterday. The interpretation was in every way worthy of the work justly described by Vincent d'Indy as "majestic, plastic and perfectly beautiful," beautiful from both the mundane and the mystical point of view, for it has themes that fill the ear agreeably and sonorously, and also themes of unearthly loveliness.

But aside from the freshness, originality and beauty of the thematic material, the Franck symphony has a majestic form comparable as a work of art to that of Rodin's massive and imaginative sculptures; yet it is a plastic majesty, full of life and grace.

Dr. Muck set all this beauty and vigor before the Symphony audience with unerring taste and skill, and he was faultlessly assisted by the orchestra. Each solo passage was of itself a thing of beauty in miniature. The leaders of the brass and wood wind sections quite surpassed themselves.

Alt[illegible] remembered as [illegible] events of the present [illegible] tion witnessed yesterday when it was over came as a matter of course. Nothing less would have been fitting. Without question it will be repeated tonight.

Ruth Deyo made her Boston debut as a Symphony soloist in the Bach concerto in F minor, for piano and string orchestra. She, too, was heartily applauded. There was much to admire in her style, which is that of a well- in her style, which is that of a mature, well-rounded musician, and in the virile, The Mozart serenade in D major ends the program.

HERALD.

JANUARY 3

REHEARSAL AT SYMPHONY HALL

Franck's Great Symphony in D Minor, Once Despised, Is Produced Gloriously.

NEVER SO NOBLY ELOQUENT

Piano Concerts by Bach Played for First Time Here by Miss Ruth Deyo.

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Ruth Deyo was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor..............Franck
Piano concerto in F minor, with strings, J. S. Bach
Serenade in D major, "Haffner"......Mozart

Mr. Paur as conductor of this orchestra was urged to bring out the symphony of Cesar Franck, but he answered that the music of Franck did not interest him. He probably knew the symphony only from the score. Not that he was prejudiced against modern music, for he was an enthusiastic admirer of Chabrier and Richard Strauss. When Mr. Gericke had the courage to produce the symphony in 1899 the music excited hot discussion. Some thought it morbid; some complained of its "ugliness"; others found it dull. One of the subscribers to the concerts from the beginning objected to the symphony on the ground that it was "immoral" and asked plaintively if something could not be done to prevent the performance of such "French" works. Nevertheless there was another performance that year; there were two in 1905, one in 1910, one in 1911, and when a benefit concert was arranged for Mr. Gericke the symphony was this once despised one by Franck.

Yesterday the performance, a glorious one, was enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Gericke's reading in past years was conspicuous for clarity and sense of proportion, and the performances were euphonious; but never did this music seem so profoundly emotional, so nobly eloquent, as it did yesterday. To dilate upon the masterly structure of the work or to point out strikingly pathetic or sublime pages would be a tardy and ridiculous discovery. This music of Franck is now acknowledged to be one of the greatest works in symphonic literature. There is a breadth of treatment, a contrapuntal skill, an incomparable development of the cyclic principle, that alone would give it high rank; but the musical thoughts themselves, the expression of emotion, the tender and ineffable beauty of the "song" themes, the outpourings of heroic faith—these make the symphony unique.

Bach's concerto was played for the first time at these concerts, and probably for the first time in Boston, if not in this country. It is undoubtedly a transcription of a violin concerto, which, with other works of Bach, was lost, and it may have been writen for performance at a concert of the Telemann Society in Leipsic, of which Bach was conductor, or for home enjoyment. (The indefatigable Bach, when he was not composing music, was playing or listening.)

This concerto is more a chamber-work than a piece for a great hall. The piano part often suggests a part for violin and is more suited to the genius of that instrument. Only in the second movement is there opportunity for judging the acquirements and the musical disposition of a pianist, and this opportunity is slight and fleeting. Much of the time in the first movement and in the finale the pianist's part goes with that of the first violins. This second movement, a Largo, has a quiet, contemplative beauty. It is music that is subjective, intimate. Miss Deyo, an American, who has played with success in Berlin, Leipsic and London, and this season with the Symphony Orchestra in out-of-town concerts, has a truly musical nature. In the Largo she desplayed an agreeable touch and fine taste; in the other movements there was the necessary rhythmic feeling. As she will soon give a recital and play compositions that should fully reveal her qualities, a more definite criticism may be deferred till then.

Six of the eight movements of the Serenade composed by Mozart for the wedding festivities of Elisabeth Haffner of Salzburg were performed. The greatest number of movements previously played here was five. Is the theory advanced by Messrs. Wyzewa and de Saint-Foix that Mozart swelled the Serenade by interpolating three movements of a little violin concerto, written a few days before, well-founded? They at least furnish variety. Flesh and blood in these days could hardly endure the whole Serenade, yet some yesterday were disappointed to find the [illegible]

[90]

Throughout the [illegible] symphony one can sense the surety of the composer. He is [illegible] struggling on like a poor after-dinner speaker, who goes on interminably because he cannot find a successful place to stop, but he delivers his message clearly and intelligibly, and with just the right proportion of emotion and intellectuality. The final movement is comparable to the Finale of Brahms' C minor symphony in its summing up of preceding material, and better than that work in its sense of Victory after struggle.

The second movement is somewhat dwarfed by the great power of the first and last movements, but here the delicate theme upon the English horn (finely played, too) deserves mention, and also the work of the French horn in the first two movements. Altogether this is a symphony that one cannot hear too often; each repetition seems to show forth new beauties even to the musician, and much more to the layman. There was much applause at the end of the work, the conductor was twice recalled, and the orchestra forced to rise in acknowledgment of the enthusiasm.

Bach's concerto for piano and strings was given for the first time in these concerts. It gave no great display of virtuosity to the soloist, in the modern sense, yet it had its difficulties too. There is a beautiful serenity in the ensemble work of Bach, when there was no attempt made to read more into it than the composer meant. Miss Ruth Deyo made an excellent impression both by her performance and her attractive stage presence. She played in an unaffected and very musicianly manner, with good attention to the ensemble, and conductor and soloist did not engage in a tug-of-war, as was recently done. The mysterious movement without a tempo mark was taken as an allegretto, a little quicker than what Handel would have called "a tempo ordinario," which was about right.

The first movement was much the best in this work, the short Largo and final Presto falling off greatly in interest. But Miss Deyo's conscientious work aroused much enthusiasm and she was heartily recalled again and again.

Mozart's Serenade (the "Haffner"—the origin of the name explained in the programme-book) brought the sedate proceedings to an end. Therefore there was no admixture of modern music—Franck belongs to the classics—in this concert. Perhaps Dr. Muck is insisting too strongly upon Mozart in recent programmes. An English devotee, some 75 years ago, wrote: "There is nothing perfect under the sun, except the compositions of Mozart," but we doubt if any modern auditors can share this extreme enthusiasm. With us the Mozart symphonies do not wear as well as those of Haydn, and his lesser instrumental works are still less perennial.

A Serenade, in the olden days, was a less ambitious, less developed Suite. So that in such a work very simple orchestration and briefly stated musical thoughts go hand in hand. After the intellectual feast that had preceded the auditor craved a little excitement. He did not get it. If there was any frenzy in the Mozart Serenade it escaped our notice. One felt somewhat as one does in church at—"Twelfthly, my dear brethren, ——"

Yet there were beauties of thought and especially of instrumental execution too, in this music of Miss Haffner's wedding. Perhaps with a Salzburger banquet conjoined it might have been quite enjoyable. But given without the spread it was a trifle tepid and the concert seemed a little too orthodox.

BOSTON GLOBE—

JANUARY 3.

FRANCK'S SYMPHONY.

Noble Work Given Fitting Interpretation.

Miss Deyo Displays No Particular Distinction as Soloist.

The 11th Symphony rehearsal took place yesterday afternoon. Dr Muck conducted. The soloist was Miss Ruth Deyo. The program was as follows:

Franck........Symphony in D minor
J S Bach....Piano concerto in F minor
Mozart..Serenade in D major, Haffner

Cesar Franck's noble symphony and the inspired playing of it by Dr Muck and the orchestra were the features of the afternoon. Like Beethoven's choral symphony, certain pages from "Tristan and Isolde", as the prelude, the love music of the second act and of Isolde's renunciation in the last, like Siegfried's funeral music and certain pages from "The Messiah," this work of the humble Belgian, beloved by his pupils and the few who knew him, should be played with the true festival spirit, with the sincerity of dedication.

Had the concert ended yesterday at the close of the symphony and the audience departed it would have been with the undimmed and glowing impressions of one of the supreme musical experiences which Dr Muck and his players have given their hearers at any time. It was an hour in which men performing upon instruments of substance and reality were enabled to call up the illusion of spiritual things; to convey and recreate the lofty beauty of this music, as the composer in the quiet of his dreams may have heard the stars sing its themes together. There was the undaunted impulse of a simple, adoring, rejoicing heart, one filled with the sunlight of the heavens, one not devoid of the comfort of hope in unfathomable mystery or in blessed melancholy. Whoever could forget the haunting lovliness of the opening measures of plucked strings and the song of the English horn in the slow movement?

These pages reflect the winged aspiration and the serenity in repose of a soul which had communed with some less sordid and troubled world than ours. It is essentially music of the innermost recesses of the soul and to each hearer it may discover its own truth. Never more than yesterday was it apparent how great could be the sacrilege should profane hands uncover it or how little the written symbols upon the paper contain and expose its wealth of beauty.

behest of a penetrating mind of fine sensibility and reverence. The fluid, splendidly proportioned, imaginatively and logically developed structure of the symphony ever will be a model for the analyst, nor will it be less majestic in such a performance, but here is music which transcends the gross and earthly, which is a greater service.

Notwithstanding her generous applause it scarcely could be to her playing that Miss Deyo attributed her appearance. She was not called upon to expose all of her gifts in the first movement, but the melody in the piano of the second had not proceeded far before she disclosed her lack of nuance, her inability to sing a phrase broadly and with dignity or to impart any quality of distinction to her style. It was ordinary playing not associated with soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mozart's serenade was composed for the wedding of a daughter of a wealthy patron of the young composer, a successful merchant and prominent citizen. The opening allegro with its characteristic Mozartean flourishes and formulas, which might have enlivened the wit at the marriage feast, is not unlike otherwise composed to order for an occasion. But the three movements which follow, beside exploiting the gifts of the first violin, both in tonal embroidery and in sustained song—admirably reproduced by Mr Witek yesterday—bring forward some writing in Mozart's finest vein, graceful, fertile in ideas, and dressed in the elegance of style that characterizes him. The final andante and adagio are less ingratiating. Dr Muck played the pieces with a light and facile touch, unfailing clarity and precision. There will be no concerts next week.

OSTON POST,

NUARY 3, 1914

SYMPHONY OF FRANCK PERFORMED

Grandeur of Work Made Compelling by Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES

In this city, at least, the great symphony of Cesar Franck had never stood out in such compelling grandeur as when performed by Dr. Muck and his men yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The work stands alone in symphonic literature. The heroic outlines, the dark coloring and the mystical aspiration of the music tower up like a Gothic cathedral in an age of scepticism and inquiry. And the symphony is built on bases that are as the foundations of the universe. Franck, pure in his faith, in the midst of Paris of the late 19th century, produced this marvel of genius.

NOBILITY EMPHASIZED

Not only in certain features of construction is this symphony unique. There is a wonderful union of the most sensitive feeling, feeling so subjectively expressed that not even the music of Robert Schumann carries a more intimate appeal, and a greatness of architecture, a virile and dramatic manner that is only paralleled among the masterpieces of symphonic composition. Tender, mythical, personal as he always is, Franck rises on the wings of his form, his cathedral of tone, until on a height he speaks as a prophet for all humanity. He could have inscribed on his title page, without sacriligiousness, a line from his beloved beatitudes, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

It was the beauty and the strength of the architecture, and the soaring nobility of the thought, that were especially emphasized by Dr. Muck yesterday. Some might have differed a little with his choice of tempi in the first movement. The pontifical majesty of the passage where the theme of the introduction is handled in a canonic manner by the brass could well have been taken a trifle slower. Some would have said also, that the main body of the movement could have gone a trifle faster, which would have been directly foreign to Dr. Muck's conception. And a faster pace would have been foreign to the breadth and the richness of the music. No symphonist ever achieved a more remarkable blend of the best characteristics of classic and modern music than Franck in this symphony, and Dr. Muck justly emphasized more than any conductor before him the classic qualities of the ground scheme of the work. Never had each section and each movement so cohered. The music was welded together so that it was entirely indivisible, from the first measure to the last.

Freedom of Tone Poem

Franck was in many respects indebted to Liszt—in none more so than in his "cyclic" employment of themes. Yet with the harmonic resources of Liszt at his command—a basis upon which Franck built a system of harmony that for subtlety of coloring and yet emphasis of tonality has no equal today—Franck mingled a command of counterpoint which was never Liszt's. Hence his music, with all its mezzo-tints, is rock-ribbed and of a continuous development and resource in the handling [illegible]

[illegible] genius of [illegible] And who has [illegible] nobly the balance between [illegible] classic and the modern styles?

The classic symphony, with separate movements and each movement with motives of its own; the romantic "tone-poem" and the metamorphoses of one or more motives within the confines of a single movement, are here superseded by a symphony built on basic themes which reappear in successive movements and which preserves the balance and proportion, the inexorable logic of the symphony, and the freedom and eloquence of the tone-poem and its continuous story.

Dramatic in Extreme

And how dramatic is the recurrence of these themes! Take the powerful phrase that opens and closes most mightily the first movement, and its reappearance at the end of the finale. It is whispered, first by woodwind instruments, then by string, over chords deeper than ever plummet sounded, chords peculiarly spaced and employed in a manner that has little precedent save in certain scores of Beethoven. Then, over a mysterious swinging bass the horns call tenderly, and the harp enters, and this theme, now a summons from the sky, is borne up on waves of tone, is answered by another theme of the first movement, and is finally lost in the triumphant fanfares that bring the movement to an end. It is as though the sky had opened, and the seraphim and the cherubim were seen on high. It has been said that the genius of Franck was not dramatic. As a matter of fact, there are hardly any passages in symphonic literature so dramatic as the first and last movements of this symphony. Contrasted are the strange whisperings of the middle movement—a movement which includes some of the tenderest music known to man, and a series of variations of singular and engrossing originality. And then the instrumentation! What composer developed an orchestral style more characteristic of his ideas? Franck's symphony, with its splendid basses and its sombre coloring, is like a great organ. Nor is the music without its touch of gorgeous pomp and ceremonial.

Puzzled by Its Coloring

The symphony is now familiar and one of the most admired compositions of the orchestral repertoire, although it is but ten years since Mr. Gericke introduced the work in Boston, and every reviewer and the great majority of hearers were then merely puzzled by its strange coloring and the striking originality of the harmonic scheme. Of all things, music is consumed quickest in the heat of its own flame; yet it is reasonable to believe that this masterwork of Franck's will be heard with the few masterpieces of each period that remain to interest and move future generations.

After the performance there was so much applause that Dr. Muck, returning to the stage for the third time, had his men rise with him in acknowledgment.

Miss Ruth Deyo then played a concerto by Bach in the key of F minor, for piano and strings. Miss Deyo acquitted herself of her task in a musicianly manner, although she makes constant and unnecessary use of her arms and wrists in playing, and she sacrificed herself in the cause of Bach. Only in the slow movement of this piece has the piano very much of its own to say. For the remainder of the time it is almost always in unison with the strings, nor can it be said that the first movement of this concerto is especially interesting music. The occasion only lacked Mr. Arnold Dolmetch and his harpsichord. The slow movement of the concerto seemed to us the only movement that warranted exhumation. The concert came to an end with Mozart's Serenade.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 3.

SYMPHONY GIVEN MERITED OVATION

Dr. Muck Leads Masterly Performance of Cesar Franck Work.

Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which fairly divided with the Brahms symphony in C minor the distinction of being the finest symphonic composition of the past century, is the salient feature of this week's Symphony program.

The orchestra was honored with an ovation after its performance of the work yesterday. The interpretation was in every way worthy of the work justly described by Vincent d'Indy as "majestic, plastic and perfectly beautiful," beautiful from both the mundane and the mystical point of view, for it has themes that fill the ear agreeably and sonorously, and also themes of unearthly loveliness.

But aside from the freshness, originality and beauty of the thematic material, the Franck symphony has a majestic form comparable as a work of art to that of Rodin's massive and imaginative sculptures; yet it is a plastic majesty, full of life and grace.

Dr. Muck set all this beauty and vigor before the Symphony audience with unerring taste and skill, and he was faultlessly assisted by the orchestra. Each solo passage was of itself a thing of beauty in miniature. The leaders of the brass and wood wind sections quite surpassed themselves.

[illegible] remembered as [illegible] events of the present [illegible] tion witnessed yesterday when [illegible] over came as a matter of course. Nothing less would have been fitting. Without question it will be repeated tonight.

Ruth Deyo made her Boston debut as a Symphony soloist in the Bach concerto in F minor, for piano and string orchestra. She, too, was heartily applauded. There was much to admire in her style, which is that of a well-rounded musician, and in the virile, n her style, which is that of a mature, The Mozart serenade in D major ends the program.

HERALD.

JANUARY 3

REHEARSAL AT SYMPHONY HALL

Franck's Great Symphony in D Minor, Once Despised, Is Produced Gloriously.

NEVER SO NOBLY ELOQUENT

Piano Concerts by Bach Played for First Time Here by Miss Ruth Deyo.

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Ruth Deyo was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D minor.............Franck
Piano concerto in F minor, with strings, J. S. Bach
Serenade in D major, "Haffner".....Mozart

Mr. Paur as conductor of this orchestra was urged to bring out the symphony of Cesar Franck, but he answered that the music of Franck did not interest him. He probably knew the symphony only from the score. Not that he was prejudiced against modern music, for he was an enthusiastic admirer of Chabrier and Richard Strauss. When Mr. Gericke had the courage to produce the symphony in 1899 the music excited hot discussion. Some thought it morbid; some complained of its "ugliness"; others found it dull. One of the subscribers to the concerts from the beginning objected to the symphony on the ground that it was "immoral" and asked plaintively if something could not be done to prevent the performance of such "French" works. Nevertheless there was another performance that year; there were two in 1905, one in 1910, one in 1911, and when a benefit concert was arranged for Mr. Gericke the symphony was this once despised one by Franck.

Yesterday the performance, a glorious one, was enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Gericke's reading in past years was conspicuous for clarity and sense of proportion, and the performances were euphonious; but never did this music seem so profoundly emotional, so nobly eloquent, as it did yesterday. To dilate upon the masterly structure of the work or to point out strikingly pathetic or sublime pages would be a tardy and ridiculous discovery. This music of Franck is now acknowledged to be one of the greatest works in symphonic literature. There is a breadth of treatment, a contrapuntal skill, an incomparable development of the cyclic principle, that alone would give it high rank; but the musical thoughts themselves, the expression of emotion, the tender and ineffable beauty of the "song" themes, the outpourings of heroic faith—these make the symphony unique.

Bach's concerto was played for the first time at these concerts, and probably for the first time in Boston, if not in this country. It is undoubtedly a transcription of a violin concerto, which, with other works of Bach, was lost, and it may have been writen for performance at a concert of the Telemann Society in Leipsic, of which Bach was conductor, or for home enjoyment. (The indefatigable Bach, when he was not composing music, was playing or listening.)

This concerto is more a chamber-work than a piece for a great hall. The piano part often suggests a part for violin and is more suited to the genius of that instrument. Only in the second movement is there opportunity for judging the acquirements and the musical disposition of a pianist, and this opportunity is slight and fleeting. Much of the time in the first movement and in the finale the pianist's part goes with that of the first violins. This second movement, a Largo, has a quiet, contemplative beauty. It is music that is subjective, intimate. Miss Deyo, an American, who has played with success in Berlin, Leipsic and London, and this season with the Symphony Orchestra in out-of-town concerts, has a truly musical nature. In the Largo she desplayed an agreeable touch and fine taste; in the other movements there was the necessary rhythmic feeling. As she will soon give a recital and play compositions that should fully reveal her qualities, a more definite criticism may be deferred till then.

Six of the eight movements of the Serenade composed by Mozart for the wedding festivities of Elisabeth Haffner of Salzburg were performed. The greatest number of movements previously played here was five. Is the theory advanced by Messrs. Wyzewa and Saint-Foix that Mozart swelled the Serenade by interpolating three movements of a little violin concerto, written a few days before, well-founded? They at least furnish variety. Flesh and blood in these days would hardly endure the whole Serenade

MONITOR, BOSTON

JANUARY 3,

Karl Muck and His Men Interpret Orchestral Piece by Master of Late Nineteenth Century French Group of Composers

MISS DEYO SOLOIST

Presenting Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor as its principal number, and introducing to the Boston public an American pianist, Miss Ruth Deyo, as soloist in a Bach concerto new to the repertory, the Symphony orchestra gave its eleventh public rehearsal on Friday afternoon to much applause. The program was as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; concerto in F minor for piano and strings, Bach; "Haliner" serenade in D major, Mozart.

One of the sincerest epochs in symphonic music was that in which Franck, Brahms and Tschaikowsky wrote. These composers were conscious of having in their possession vast resources of tone color unknown to their predecessors; they were aware of having at their command orchestras of ability for combining tones and for interweaving themes far surpassing that of the Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann orchestras. They knew, too, that their public was more receptive to detailed musical statement and argument than the public of any preceding period. Yet with all their opportunities for reckless expenditure of color, with all their freedom to start symphonic music on a period of ornate, diffuse and wasteful thematic expression, they clung to the simple formulas of the classic masters.

The interest of the symphonies of these representatives of French, German and Russian musical thinking lies perhaps in the conflict between resources and form which they had to decide. The one who gave his conscience the most latitude and who allowed color some advantage over form was Tschaikowsky. The result was to his benefit; for in his masterpiece, the "Pathetic" symphony, he produced a work which his epoch accepted as its truest orchestral document. The composer who tethered his conscience the shortest was Franck. The result to him was not the enthusiastic approval of his contemporaries, but the growing approval of aftertime. His work is now a vital document of his period, not because giving an accurate external picture of it, like the Tschaikowsky piece, but because of telling its unattained aspiration. Putting the Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Franck symphonies beside the Beethoven nine for comparison, we might say that Brahms with his C minor parallels the third symphony of Beethoven, Tschaikowsky with his "Pathetic" parallels the fifth and Franck with his D minor, the ninth.

The great Brahms symphony, like Beethoven's "Eroica," yields up its meaning to those who study it closely. It surrenders to earnest intellectual scrutiny. There is much that is sublime about it, but there is little that is prophetic. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" and Beethoven's fifth are pictures of the times of their writers, as veritable portrayals of late nineteenth Muscovite and early nineteenth century Viennese society as if novelists had penned them. But the Franck symphony is neither a merely intellectual nor a pictorial type. Its appeal is not to the academic or to the social in us. Its hold on our imaginations is like that of Beethoven's choral symphony. It is music that describes its day, yet looks forward.

Such a work is a problem in interpretation for the most gifted conductor. It is sure to be interesting to hear, however, under almost any kind of reading that is at all sympathetic. Even if some listeners of Friday think that Dr. Muck brought only a musician's admiration and a thorough drill-caster's preparation to the performance of the composition, they must admit that it made a selection of extraordinary interest on the program. Dr. Muck is always so interesting in a symphony having a touch of humor in it, that we are likely to get into the habit of waiting for the passage of comedy or of satire to come; and when, as in the Franck piece, no scherzo develops, we may easily make the mistake of blaming him instead of the composer.

Miss Deyo, the pianist, was in a more difficult situation with the Bach concerto than she would have been with a modern work, because the string orchestra, following literally the solo instrument, tended to smother her tone. Doubtless this piece should be treated as chamber music instead of symphony concert music; for as presented by Dr. Muck it produced an uncertain effect. The old comp[illegible]osition itself is interesting [illegible] be viewed for modern entertainment, but the question of a proper arrangement is indeed perplexing. No judgment of any value could be made of Miss Deyo's ability as an interpreter of piano music. Her technical equipment seemed to be of a thor ghly modern kind. Her tone was llow and individual and seemed to e that communicative quality which sential in an artist who expects to the highest concert honors.

Mozart piece gave Mr. Witek, the tmaster, some solo passages which formed with admirable taste. It estion whether the incidental vio o is not more satisfactory from hest artistic standpoint than a the concerto order. Mr. Witek's ites of playing in the serenade l more musical idea than any r of virtuoso display there has he rehearsals this season.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 3,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRANCK, MOZART AGAIN AND A TINY CONCERTO

Miss Deyo Comes and Goes Discreetly in Its Solo Part—Mozart's Serenade as It Was and Is—To Crown the Concert, Franck's Master Symphony

FRANCK'S symphony began Dr. Muck's programme yesterday afternoon; Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," six of its eight divisions long ended. Between symphony and suite Miss Ruth Deyo played the solo part in a little concerto by Bach for pianoforte and strings, heard in public probably for the first time in America. In all probability it is a transcription of one of Bach's violin concertos; beyon any doubt it is of his small and routine music. It is barely interesting and it is hardly amusing in the good French sense of the word. It runs in three short movements; the pace is quick; and the whole piece requires barely fifteen minutes for performance. At first the piano is merely fused with the strings and has no individuality of its own; in the slow movement it sings in small-voiced and gently melancholy song; in the finale, again, it becomes scarcely more than another and ornamenting instrument in the little orchestra. Throughout it is elementary and undistinguished music. Miss Deyo played the new part, where it could be separated from the rest of the music, intelligently, discreetly and skilfully. She did not try to make it sound as anything but the simple, running, clear-voiced music that it was; in the slow movement she brought to it a pleasant delicacy of touch and an amiable feeling for its little song. But she did more with the music than a hundred pianists could and should do. The audiences listened contentedly and applauded politely. In a quarter of an hour concerto and pianist had come and gone.

A stranger in the audience would probably have wondered why both were included in a Symphony Concert and being informed, might have wondered yet more why they had made their little and whirling eddy in the musico-social life of this town. He might have heard how Miss Deyo has ardent champions that have shed their august praise upon her and striven womanfully but not always tactfully to advance her fortunes. He might have heard how others, resenting these proceduresand various circumstance that attended them were prepared to draw doughty swords in defence of the Symphony Concerts from musico-social influences. He might have heard gossip and rumor, to surfeit, and he must surely have smiled and smiled again at the outcome. There was not the smallest occasion for the drawing of the doughty swords; there was no more for the sounding of the august praises. A little concerto fifteen minutes long; a skilful, intelligent and sensitive playing of the little piano part in it; and scarcely one the wiser for it about Miss Deyo's real qualities as a pianist. It would be absurd to judge her a quarter of an hour at the Symphony Concerts; and as absurd to make a momentous event of it. Dr. Muck, as Mme. Bahr-Mildenburg used to say at Baireuth, is an artiste man.

As Bach's concerto was intrinsically chamber music, so was the suite that Mozart wrote for the Haffner wedding intrinsically household music that bears only a little better translation out of its place and time. The burghers of Salgburg, in the eighteenth century,, of whom the rich and patronizing Haffner was one, liked long festivities and counted music one of the sources of pleasure to be distributed through them. They commissioned serenades, of their favorite and obligated composers, and the composers wrote them lengthily and in many divisions. Thus could the music be spread over the whole afternoon; and thus could serve as accompaniment and intermezzo to feasting—also lengthy in burgher households—to little ceremonies and even to languid talk. Possibly the composers suspected that their audiences would not listen very closely to it; possibly they wrote it half-consciously as a part of the background, like the tapestried stuff and the garlanded flowers, for the festivity. When the guests listened, they were pleased at what they caught and perhaps bade the composer to their table, the rest passed unheeded. There was once an incorrigible English "précieux" who had a little orchestra play bits of this same "Haffner Serenade," between paragraph while he read aloud Pater's description of such burghers life in [illegible] the old wainscoted and [illegible] ected as the

As a concert piece in this year of 1914, formally played in a big hall by a big orchestra, the "Haffner Serenade" is another thing. Reduced from its eight divisions to six and perhaps cut a little along the way it has its lengths wherein Mozart was following the necessities of such an occasional piece or obeying the academic prescriptions for it. All the brightness of tone, all the adroit euphonies, all the fine shadings and elastic accents that Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought to it could not save some of the divisions from tedium. Then, like sun out of smooth, dull and passing cloud, quickly shone the bright Mozartean melody ,in all its elegance of form and all its grace of adorning figure and arabesque. Then the music was good to hear; then it had an aristocratic flavor that lifted it out of burgler housemolds; and then it was easy to understand why the commentators make so much of it as of a new and ripe Mozart capable of making set forms hear his joy of living and set free his ardor of song. And in the second divisions, Mr. Witeh was "soloist," too, much as Miss Deyo had been in her concerto.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Da
DEC 27 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Teresa Carreno, the greatest of women pianists, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7. She will play the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven.

As the last concert was classical Dr. Muck has made the third program modern in content. He will play the splendid second symphony of the Russian Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Est , 1884

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 28 1913

CARRENO, SOLOIST, AT NEXT SYMPHONY

TERESA CARRENO, one of the greatest of women pianists, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 7. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

As the last concert [illegible] al. Dr. Muck has made the third [illegible] modern in content. He will [illegible] splendid second symphony of the [illegible] Sergei Rachmaninoff, which [illegible] a deep impression when played here a few years ago by Mr. Fiedler.

Esta 884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Terisa Carreno, the eminent pianist, will be the soloist at the second recital given in the series of the Y. M. H. A. season at Witherspoon Hall on Saturday evening, January 3. The magic of Carreno's art has awakened deep emotions in young, middle-aged and in the elderly music lovers. As a pianist, she is without a peer among the players of her own sex, and when compared to the players of the sterner sex she loses nothing, for, behold what Carreno does! Her playing has sure technique, none surer; a tone of velvety, bell-like beauty, and when it comes to delivery, it matters not what the composition may be, her art transcends all, and every listener is thrilled.

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 5, will present as soloist Madame Teresa Carreno, who to-day, as for thirty years past, is the greatest of women pianists and one of the really great pianists of the world.

In accordance with Dr. Muck's general scheme of alternating his programs this concert will be strictly classical. There will be two symphonies, one by Haydn and one by Mozart and Madame Carreno will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

* * *

Esta 1884

TERESA CARRENO

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

Teresa Carreno.

She will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Monday, January 5.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 5, will present as soloist Madame Teresa Carreno, who today, as for 30 years past, is the greatest of women pianists and one of the really great pianists of the world.

In accordance with Doctor Muck's general scheme of alternating his programs this concert will be strictly classical. There will be two symphonies, one by Haydn and one by Mozart, and Madame Carreno will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

* * *

Establis 1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

At the request of many of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in this city Dr. Karl Muck has made a purely classical programme for the third concert which will be given Friday evening, Jan. 9, at the Academy of Music. It is a programme for unusual beauty, comprising Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs and Beethoven's first symphony. The soloists will be Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. In the Handel concerto the solo players will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns.

Establisl

MONITOR, BOSTON

JANUARY 3,

Karl Muck and His Men Interpret Orchestral Piece by Master of Late Nineteenth Century French Group of Composers

MISS DEYO SOLOIST

Presenting Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor as its principal number, and introducing to the Boston public an American pianist, Miss Ruth Deyo, as soloist in a Bach concerto new to the repertory, the Symphony orchestra gave its eleventh public rehearsal on Friday afternoon to much applause. The program was as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; concerto in F minor for piano and strings, Bach; "Haliner" serenade in D major, Mozart.

One of the sincerest epochs in symphonic music was that in which Franck, Brahms and Tschaikowsky wrote. These composers were conscious of having in their possession vast resources of tone color unknown to their predecessors; they were aware of having at their command orchestras of ability for combining tones and for interweaving themes far surpassing that of the Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann orchestras. They knew, too, that their public was more receptive to detailed musical statement and argument than the public of any preceding period. Yet with all their opportunities for reckless expenditure of color, with all their freedom to start symphonic music on a period of ornate, diffuse and wasteful thematic expression, they clung to the simple formulas of the classic masters.

The interest of the symphonies of these representatives of French, German and Russian musical thinking lies perhaps in the conflict between resources and form which they had to decide. The one who gave his conscience the most latitude and who allowed color some advantage over form was Tschaikowsky. The result was to his benefit; for in his masterpiece, the "Pathetic" symphony, he produced a work which his epoch accepted as its truest orchestral document. The composer who tethered his conscience the shortest was Franck. The result to him was not the enthusiastic approval of his contemporaries, but the growing approval of aftertime. His work is now a vital document of his period, not because giving an accurate external picture of it, like the Tschaikowsky piece, but because of telling its unattained aspiration. Putting the Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Franck symphonies beside the Beethoven nine for comparison, we might say that Brahms with his C minor parallels the third symphony of Beethoven, Tschaikowsky with his "Pathetic" parallels the fifth and Franck with his D minor, the ninth.

The great Brahms symphony, like Beethoven's "Eroica," yields up its meaning to those who study it closely. It surrenders to earnest intellectual scrutiny. There is much that is sublime about it, but there is little that is prophetic. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" and Beethoven's fifth are pictures of the times of their writers, as veritable portrayals of late nineteenth Muscovite and early nineteenth century Viennese society as if novelists had penned them. But the Franck symphony is neither a merely intellectual nor a pictorial type. Its appeal is not to the academic or to the social in us. Its hold on our imaginations is like that of Beethoven's choral symphony. It is music that describes its day, yet looks forward.

Such a work is a problem in interpretation for the most gifted conductor. It is sure to be interesting to hear, however, under almost any kind of reading that is at all sympathetic. Even if some listeners of Friday think that Dr. Muck brought only a musician's admiration and a thorough drill-caster's preparation to the performance of the composition, they must admit that it made a selection of extraordinary interest on the program. Dr. Muck is always so interesting in a symphony having a touch of humor in it, that we are likely to get into the habit of waiting for the passage of comedy or of satire to come; and when, as in the Franck piece, no scherzo develops, we may easily make the mistake of blaming him instead of the composer.

Miss Deyo, the pianist, was in a more difficult situation with the Bach concerto than she would have been with a modern work, because the string orchestra, following literally the solo instrument, tended to smother her tone. Doubtless this piece should be treated as chamber music instead of symphony concert music; for as presented by Dr. Muck it produced an uncertain effect. The old composition itself is interesting [illegible] to be viewed for modern entertainment, but the question of a proper arrangement is indeed perplexing. No judgment of any value could be made of Miss Deyo's ability as an interpreter of piano music. Her technical equipment seemed to be of a thor-ghly modern kind. Her tone was llow and individual and seemed to e that communicative quality which sential in an artist who expects to he highest concert honors.

Mozart piece gave Mr. Witek, the tmaster, some solo passages which formed with admirable taste. It estion whether the incidental vio-o is not more satisfactory from hest artistic standpoint than a the concerto order. Mr. Witek's tes of playing in the serenade d more musical idea than any r of virtuoso display there has he rehearsals this season.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 3,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FRANCK, MOZART AGAIN AND A TINY CONCERTO

Miss Deyo Comes and Goes Discreetly in Its Solo Part—Mozart's Serenade as It Was and Is—To Crown the Concert, Franck's Master Symphony

FRANCK'S symphony began Dr. Muck's programme yesterday afternoon; Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," six of its eight divisions long ended. Between symphony and suite Miss Ruth Deyo played the solo part in a little concerto by Bach for pianoforte and strings, heard in public probably for the first time in America. In all probability it is a transcription of one of Bach's violin concertos; beyon any doubt it is of his small and routine music. It is barely interesting and it is hardly amusing in the good French sense of the word. It runs in three short movements; the pace is quick; and the whole piece requires barely fifteen minutes for performance. At first the piano is merely fused with the strings and has no individuality of its own; in the slow movement it sings in small-voiced and gently melancholy song; in the finale, again, it becomes scarcely more than another and ornamenting instrument in the little orchestra. Throughout it is elementary and undistinguished music. Miss Deyo played the new part, where it could be separated from the rest of the music, intelligently, discreetly and skilfully. She did not try to make it sound as anything but the simple, running, clear-voiced music that it was; in the slow movement she brought to it a pleasant delicacy of touch and an amiable feeling for its little song. But she did more with the music than a hundred pianists could and should do. The audiences listened contentedly and applauded politely. In a quarter of an hour concerto and pianist had come and gone.

A stranger in the audience would probably have wondered why both were included in a Symphony Concert and being informed, might have wondered yet more why they had made their little and whirling eddy in the musico-social life of this town. He might have heard how Miss Deyo has ardent champions that have shed their august praise upon her and striven womanfully but not always tactfully to advance her fortunes. He might have heard how others, resenting these proceduresand various circumstance that attended them were prepared to draw doughty swords in defence of the Symphony Concerts from musico-social influences. He might have heard gossip and rumor, to surfeit, and he must surely have smiled and smiled again at the outcome. There was not the smallest occasion for the drawing of the doughty swords; there was no more for the sounding of the august praises. A little concerto fifteen minutes long; a skilful, intelligent and sensitive playing of the little piano part in it; and scarcely one the wiser for it about Miss Deyo's real qualities as a pianist. It would be absurd to judge her a quarter of an hour at the Symphony Concerts; and as absurd to make a momentous event of it. Dr. Muck, as Mme. Bahr-Mildenburg used to say at Baireuth, is an artiste man.

As Bach's concerto was intrinsically chamber music, so was the suite that Mozart wrote for the Haffner wedding intrinsically household music that bears only a little better translation out of its place and time. The burghers of Salgburg, in the eighteenth century,, of whom the rich and patronizing Haffner was one, liked long festivities and counted music one of the sources of pleasure to be distributed through them. They commissioned serenades, of their favorite and obligated composers, and the composers wrote them lengthily and in many divisions. Thus could the music be spread over the whole afternoon; and thus could serve as accompaniment and intermezzo to feasting—also lengthy in burgher households—to little ceremonies and even to languid talk. Possibly the composers suspected that their audiences would not listen very closely to it; possibly they wrote it half-consciously as a part of the background, like the tapestried stuff and the garlanded flowers, for the festivity. When the guests listened, they were pleased at what they caught and perhaps bade the composer to their table, the rest passed unheeded. There was once an incorrigible English "precieux" who had a little orchestra play bits of this same "Haffner Serenade," between paragraph while he read aloud Pater's description of such burghers life in [illegible] old [illegible]oted and [illegible]cted as the

As a concert piece in this year of 1914, formally played in a big hall by a big orchestra, the "Haffner Serenade" is another thing. Reduced from its eight divisions to six and perhaps cut a little along the way it has its lengths wherein Mozart was following the necessities of such an occasional piece or obeying the academic prescriptions for it. All the brightness of tone, all the adroit euphonies, all the fine shadings and elastic accents that Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought to it could not save some of the divisions from tedium. Then, like sun out of smooth, dull and passing cloud, quickly shone the bright Mozartean melody ,in all its elegance of form and all its grace of adorning figure and arabesque. Then the music was good to hear; then it had an aristocratic flavor that lifted it out of burgler housemolds; and then it was easy to understand why the commentators make so much of it as of a new and ripe Mozart capable of making set forms hear his joy of living and set free his ardor of song. And in the second divisions, Mr. Witeh was "soloist," too, much as Miss Deyo had been in her concerto.

From EVG. STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Dat DEC 27 1913

Est , 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Teresa Carreno, the greatest of women pianists, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7. She will play the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven.

As the last concert was classical Dr. Muck has made the third program modern in content. He will play the splendid second symphony of the Russian Sergei Rachmaninoff.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 28 1913

ARRENO, SOLOIST, NEXT SYMPHONY

SA CARRENO, one of the greatest of women pianists, will be the soloist the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 7. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

As the last concert was classical. Dr. Muck has made the third program modern in content. He will play the splendid second symphony of the Russian Sergei Rachmaninoff, which made such a deep impression when played here a few years ago by Mr. Fiedler.

1/13

884

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 28 191

Esta 1884

Terisa Carreno, the eminent [illegible] will be the soloist at the se[illegible] given in the series of the Y[illegible]r- season at Witherspoon Ha[illegible]gic day evening, January 3. [illegible] of Carreno's art has awakened deep emotions in young, middle-aged and in the elderly music lovers. As a pianist, she is without a peer among the players of her own sex, and when compared to the players of the sterner sex she loses nothing, for, behold what Carreno does! Her playing has sure technique, none surer; a tone of velvety, bell-like beauty, and when it comes to delivery, it matters not what the composition may be, her art transcends all, and every listener is thrilled.

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 5, will present as soloist Madame Teresa Carreno, who to-day, as for thirty years past, is the greatest of women pianists and one of the really great pianists of the world.

In accordance with Dr. Muck's general scheme of alternating his programs, this concert will be strictly classical. There will be two symphonies, one by Haydn and one by Mozart and Madame Carreno will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

* * *

TERESA CARRENO

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia

Date

Establis 884

Teresa Carreno.

She will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Monday, January 5.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 5, will present as soloist Madame Teresa Carreno, who today, as for 30 years past, is the greatest of women pianists and one of the really great pianists of the world.

In accordance with Doctor Muck's general scheme of alternating his programs this concert will be strictly classical. There will be two symphonies, one by Haydn and one by Mozart, and Madame Carreno will play the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

*

From STANDARD UNION

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Establis

At the request of many of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in this city Dr. Karl Muck has made a purely classical programme for the third concert which will be given Friday evening, Jan. 9, at the Academy of Music. It is a programme for unusual beauty, comprising Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs and Beethoven's first symphony. The soloists will be Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. In the Handel concerto the solo players will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes, and Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns.

Monitor

GLOBE

JANUARY 11.

Beatrice Harrison, Cellist, and Mr Werrenrath in Recital

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English cellist, who made such a favorable impression at her first appearance here several weeks ago, will give a joint recital with Reinald Werrenrath, the baritone, at Jordan Hall, Thursday afternoon, at 3. The concert will be given for the benefit of the Tau Beta Beta scholarship fund of Brookline. The program will be as follows:

Adagio et Minuetto ....Haydn-Piatti
Miss Harrison.
(a) O Wusst Ich Doch (Brahms), (b) Lau Der Welt (Grieg), (c) Schlupfwinkel (Frank La Forge, (d) Auf Wachtposten (Hans Hermann), Mr Werrenrath.
Waldesruhe ....Dvorak
Miss Harrison.
(a) Why Does Azure Deck the Sky? (F. Morris Class), (b) Witch Woman (Deems Taylor), (c) Little Gray Home in the West, (d) Little Ringers (Hermann Lohr), Mr Werrenrath.
(a) Adagio (Schumann), (b) Orientale (Cesar Cui), (c) Vito (Popper), Miss Harrison.

Miss Eleanor Spencer, Pianist, In Recital Wednesday Afternoon

Miss Eleanor Spencer, the young American pianist who made a favorable impression at Symphony Hall a few weeks ago when at a few hours' notice she appeared in concert with Mme Rappold, in the absence of Emilio de Gogorza, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. She has prepared an interesting program as follows:

Organ fantasie and fugue, G minor. .Bach-Liszt
Rhapsodie, opus 79, No. 2, G minor. . . .Brahms
Two intermezzi, opus 117, Nos. 1 and 2.Brahms
Capriccio, opus 76, No. 2, B minor.....Brahms
Sonate, B minor, opus 58, No. 111; allegro maestoso; scherzo, molto vivace; largo, finale, presto ma non tanto ....Chopin
Etude, G-flat major (octave)..........Chopin
Reverie ....Debussy
Danse Negre ....Cyril Scott
Three etudes, opus 8, Nos. 1, 10, 12. .Scriabine

Harold Bauer, Soloist at the Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck's annual offering of a Bruckner sympony is set for this week when he will play the ninth or "Unfinished" symphony of the great Austrian master. This ninth symphony of Bruckner's has appeared but twice on the Boston programs of the orchestra, in 1904 when Mr Gericke played it and in the Fall of 1907 when Dr Muck performed it. The Bruckner symphony will occupy the first part of the program.

The second part will be devoted to Brahm's concerto for pinaforte in D minor, No. 1, opus 15. The soloist will be Harold Bauer. This cencerto has been played but once at a Symphony concert here, and then by Mr Bauer in the Fall of 1900.

Parker Memorial Hall Sunday Afternoon Concerts

The Sunday afternoon concerts at Parker Memorial Hall, in the South End, will begin their sixth season on Sunday, Jan 11. The concerts are run under the auspices of the South End House and Hale House, two settlements of that part of the city, and are managed by Ordway Tead.

The announcements are as follows: Jan 11, George Harris Jr, tenor, and Hildegarde Lasell, soprano; Jan 18, singers from the Boston Opera House; Jan 25, the American String Quartet; Feb 1, Havrah Hubbard in an "Opera Talk" of "Mme Butterfly," with dramatic reading and piano accompaniment; Feb 8, Felix Fox, pianist, and Leon Van Vliet, cellist; Feb 22, Arthur Foote, the composer, in a talk upon "Early Music in the United States," followed by a recital by Miss Edith Bullard, soprano; March 1, Mrs Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Ella Kalova Ondricek, violinist.

All concerts will commence at 4 o'clock. Tickets for a single concert will be 15 cents; those for the series 75 cents. The concerts will be given in Parker Memorial Hall, 53 Berkeley, corner Appleton sts.

Philharmonic Orchestra.

The second concert of the new Boston Philharmonic Society, Charles Frank conductor, will occur at the St James Theatre at 3 this afternoon. Raymond Allen Simonds, as soloist, will sing "In Native Worth," from Haydn's "Creation," and the "Birth of Dawn," by Leoni. The orchestra's chief number will be a movement from Beethoven's Eroica symphony, and other numbers on the program are Meyerbeer's Coronation March from "The Prophet" overture to "Mignon," Haydn's serenade for string quartet, Luigini's Egyptian ballet and an American sket, "Dort unten im Suden" (Down South).

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

The fourth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. The soloist will be George Proctor, who will play the little known concerto in C sharp minor of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The symphony will be Franck's in D minor, the performance of which was the sensation of the last Symphony concerts. This will come first on the program. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" and Berlioz' "Rob Roy" overture.

Ysaye Next Sunday.

This is almost as much a year of violinists as last season. Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman have already been heard here. Next Sunday afternoon the great Ysaye, who is returning to America for a brief tour, will give his first recital of the season. Last year Ysaye played in Boston a number of times and fully reestablished his favor with the public. He showed that his skill and musicianship are yet transcendent.

This year, as last, he will have the invaluable assistance of Camille Decreus, the accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's, in D major. As Mr Noack of our own orchestra and Mr Kreisler have just played the Mendelssohn Concerto, it will be interesting to see what the great Belgian does with it. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

Soprano Applauded by Recital Audience for Her Interpretation of Works From German and Old English Repertories

BRAHMS HONORS WON

Opening the recital season for the second half year, Mme. Julia Culp appeared in Jordan hall on Friday afternoon singing songs of Schubert, Brahms and Loewe and a group of English folk songs before an audience that almost filled the floor and balcony seats. An enthusiastic afternoon song recital house is a rare thing to record. It points back generally to good work done the previous season. Such extraordinary approval is flattering to the artist who wins it. At the same time it means that the public is going to demand greater performance than ever before. Perhaps none of the touring musicians who have found themselves in this situation this season have lived up to public expectation better than Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. He won approval of the first order a year ago and he has done work this season that not only kept up the former standard but in some points surpassed it. He was especially careful to return with additions to his repertory that would give his listeners a surprise.

Mme. Culp returns with almost the same things to say about herself as formerly, so far as repertory goes. She proved herself a great Brahms singer last season. She still holds her own in the familiar pieces of the Brahms repertory. Perhaps no singer surpasses her as an interpreter of that repertory through pure singing tone. There have been added to her technical equipment certain striking effects, most markworthy among which is the melting of the vocal tone into the piano tone at the conclusion of phrases. This has become a special contrivance in her exclusive control and it will serve her well until other singers get to imitating it.

Mme. Culp may be called an imitator of herself in the use of it, inasmuch as she often resorts to it for no particular interpretative reason. She is greatly aided by her accompanist, Mr. Bos, in gaining this effect. Its cleverness is indisputable. Its sincerity, or more accurately, perhaps, its necessity, in many places may be called in question.

The soprano is inclined to rejoice overmuch in her significant tone and to emphasize the melodic value of her songs out of proportion to their word value. Nevertheless she delivers the text with perfect articulation and with a precision in the vowel sounds that is surprising. She seems, indeed, to have developed a marvelous song technique and not yet to have found what is best to do with it. She has apparently vast interpretative ability in reserve. Putting this to service, she may in another season bring out something epoch-making in recital work.

* * *

JOURNAL—
JANUARY 12.

TITTA RUFFO, $2000 barytone, who gave a concert in Boston yesterday.

[illegible] Barytone, Is Heard In Symphony Hall

By E. F. Harkins.

BOSTON saw for the first time yesterday at Symphony Hall the highest-paid barytone of all time, the hero of three continents, Titta Ruffo, whose real name is Ruffo Titta.

Ruffo receives $2000 a performance, which is more than twice the sum paid to any other barytone now in this vocal paradise of ours; but does he sing with twice the effect they have made here from time to time? He was at some disadvantage yesterday for two reasons. First, he is at his best in opera, being pre-eminently a singer of dramatic style and instinct. Second, Symphony Hall does not favor a soloist when the enormous stage is barren of spectators and when the hall is not filled. There were scores of vacant seats yesterday; but then these $2000 soloists compel high prices all around. That is one reason why the Eastern opera companies are loath to engage the thrice-famous Tuscan.

Voice High Pitched

Ruffo may command three times $2000 next season, but unless he sings better than he sang yesterday he will never eclipse memories of several other barytones who have visited Boston even during the past ten years, to go back no further. He has a high-pitched, virile voice that sounds best between C below the staff and high G. Below C his tones are comparatively feeble. Nor was he always true to pitch.

His high notes are extraordinarily broad and resonant, and he takes especial delight in singing these notes. He is like the traditional tenore robusto in that respect. Evidently his great reputation rests more upon these ringing, thrilling tones around the top of the staff than upon his style, which was ragged yesterday; but allowance must again be made for his surroundings. He belongs primarily on the operatic stage.

Ruffo is young, fine-looking, swarthy, well-built, with a naive way. He was frankly delighted at the friendly reception the audience gave him. He bowed low and often, like Paderewski; he nodded this way and that, as if to acquaintances; and once, he ran off the stage in true Latin fashion, full of joy and excitement. The audience took almost as much pleasure in his unaffected simplicity as it did in his singing. Besides, he was generous with encores.

Sings Brilliantly

The "Largo al Factotum" aria from "Il Barbiere di Seviglia," the prologue from "I Pagliacci," and the "Brindisi" aria from Thomas's "Hamlet" were the principal pieces on his program. He sang these brilliantly, in his own peculiar style. In the first two he gave glimpses of the operatic gifts for which he was distinguished long before a Philadelphia millionaire made a sensation out of him. He also put much dramatic expression into some of the popular Italian songs he sang; nor did he forget to use the dry "white" tones that give intensity of feeling to the style of the later Italian singers.

The audience applauded and shouted and showed as much excitement as he did himself. It was on good terms with him, so that he took the liberty once to leave the stage for a moment to adjust his collar, which worried him, as he explained to the crowd with pantomime.

Florence Hinkle, soprano, and William Morse Rummel, violinist, also took part in the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD,
JANUARY 11,

CONCERTS AND RECITALS

Titta Ruffo.

Boston will have its first opportunity to hear this sensational Italian baritone at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon. He will be assisted by Florence Hinkle, soprano, and William Morse Rummel, violinist. Mr. Ruffo will sing the prologue from "Pagliacci," the Largo al Factotum from "The Barber of Seville," a group of Italian and Spanish songs and the "Brindisi" aria from Thomas's "Hamlet." Miss Hinkle will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from "Tosca" and "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise." Mr. Rummel will play selections by Pugnani, Couperin, Faure and Sarasate, the first two arranged by Kreisler.

Opera House Concert.

Mme. Tetrazzini will be the chief attraction at the regular concert at the Boston Opera House tomorrow evening. She will sing Aria of Ophelia from Thomas's "Hamlet," Cavatina from "I Pescatori di Perle" and a group of songs. Mr. Blanchart will sing Romanza from "Dinorah" and "La Mia Bandiera," by Rotoli. Mr. Wransky will be heard in an aria from "Robert the Devil" and a group of Polish songs. Miss Edna Gunnar Peterson of Chicago, pianist, will play selections from Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff and Paganini-Liszt. As usual, the orchestra will be heard in two numbers.

Eleanor Spencer.

This young pianist, who made her first Boston appearance with Marie Rappold as a substitute for Gogorza a short time ago in Symphony Hall, will be heard in a recital all her own at Jordan Hall, next Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 14. Her program is as follows: Organ Fantasie and Fugue, G minor, Bach-Liszt; Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, G minor, Two Intermezzi, op. 117, Nos. 1 and 2; Capriccio, op. 76, No. 2, B minor, Brahms; Sonate, B minor, op. 58, No. 111, Etude, G-flat major (Octave), Chopin; Reverie, Debussy; [illegible] Cyril Scott; Three [illegible] and 3, Scriabine.

[92]

[illegible] The symphony was played by the orchestra in Boston in 1904 under Mr. Gericke and has been repeated but once since, in 1907, under Dr. Muck. The second part of next week's program will consist of Brahm's piano concerto in D minor, No. 1, Opus 15, played by Harold Bauer.

On Thursday evening at the fourth concert of the season in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the soloist will be Mr. George Proctor, who will play the little known concerto in C sharp minor of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The orchestral numbers will be Franck's symphony in D minor, Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Berlioz's "Rob Roy" overture.

Eugene Ysaye.

This brilliant violinist, following Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman, will make his first Boston appearance of the season at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 18. As last year he will be assisted by Camille Decreus, the accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr. Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's in D minor. As Mr. Noack of our own orchestra and Mr. Kreisler have just played the Mendelssohn Concerto it will be interesting to see what the great Belgian does with it. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

SUNDAY POST
JANUARY 11.

EUGENE YSAYE

Next Sunday afternoon Ysaye, who is returning to America for a brief tour, will give his first recital of the season. This year, as last, he will have the assistance of Camille Decreus, the very accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr. Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's in D minor. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

Next Symphony Programme

Dr. Muck's annual offering of a Bruckner symphony is set for the coming week when he will play the Ninth or "Unfinished" symphony of the Austrian master. This ninth symphony of Bruckner's has appeared but twice on the Boston programmes of the orchestra, in 1904 when Mr. Gericke played it and in the fall of 1907 when Dr. Muck performed it. The second part of the programme will be devoted to Brahms' Concerto for Pianoforte in D Minor, No. 1, Opus 15. The soloist will be Mr. Harold Bauer. This concerto has been played but once at a Symphony concert here and then by Mr. Bauer in the fall of 1900.

Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp

Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp will appear in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 25. This will be Carreno's first appearance in Boston this season and Miss Culp will, of course, sing other songs than those she presented at her recital the past week.

THE LONGY CLUB

The Longy Club will give its second concert of chamber music for wind instruments is Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 22. There will be four numbers, including a Suite by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the first flute of the Symphony Orchestra. The work is for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons. The other numbers will be by Flament, d'Indy and Dvorak.

ALEXANDER BLOCH

Mr. Alexander Bloch, violinist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 21, at 3 o'clock. His programme will include Handel's Sonata in E Major; Vitali's Chaconne for violin and organ, and two groups of short pieces.

[illegible]NDAY GLOBE

JANUARY 11.

Beatrice Harrison, Cellist, and Mr Werrenrath in Recital

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English cellist, who made such a favorable impression at her first appearance here several weeks ago, will give a joint recital with Reinald Werrenrath, the baritone, at Jordan Hall, Thursday afternoon, at 3. The concert will be given for the benefit of the Tau Beta Beta scholarship fund of Brookline.

The program will be as follows:

Adagio et Minuetto ....Haydn-Piatti
Miss Harrison.
(a) O Wusst Ich Doch (Brahms), (b) Lauf Der Welt (Grieg), (c) Schlupfwinkel (Frank La Forge, (d) Auf Wachtposten (Hans Hermann), Mr Werrenrath.
Waldesruhe ....Dvorak
Miss Harrison.
(a) Why Does Azure Deck the Sky? (F. Morris Class), (b) Witch Woman (Deems Taylor), (c) Little Gray Home in the West, (d) Little Ringers (Hermann Lohr), Mr Werrenrath.
(a) Adagio (Schumann), (b) Orientale (Cesar Cui), (c) Vito (Popper), Miss Harrison.

Miss Eleanor Spencer, Pianist, In Recital Wednesday Afternoon

Miss Eleanor Spencer, the young American pianist who made a favorable impression at Symphony Hall a few weeks ago when at a few hours' notice she appeared in concert with Mme Rappold, in the absence of Emilio de Gogorza, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. She has prepared an interesting program as follows:

Organ fantasie and fugue, G minor..Bach-Liszt
Rhapsodie, opus 79, No. 2, G minor....Brahms
Two intermezzi, opus 117, Nos. 1 and 2.Brahms
Capriccio, opus 76, No. 2, B minor.....Brahms
Sonate, B minor, opus 58, No. 111; allegro maestoso; scherzo, molto vivace; largo, finale, presto ma non tanto ....Chopin
Etude, G-flat major (octave)..........Chopin
Reverie ....Chopin
Danse Negre ....Debussy
..................................Cyril Scott
Three etudes, opus 8, Nos. 1, 10, 12..Scriabine

Harold Bauer, Soloist at the Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck's annual offering of a Bruckner sympony is set for this week when he will play the ninth or "Unfinished" symphony of the great Austrian master. This ninth symphony of Bruckner's has appeared but twice on the Boston programs of the orchestra, in 1904 when Mr Gericke played it and in the Fall of 1907 when Dr Muck performed it. The Bruckner symphony will occupy the first part of the program.

The second part will be devoted to Brahm's concerto for pinaforte in D minor, No. 1, opus 15. The soloist will be Harold Bauer. This cencerto has been played but once at a Symphony concert here, and then by Mr Bauer in the Fall of 1900.

Parker Memorial Hall Sunday Afternoon Concerts

The Sunday afternoon concerts at Parker Memorial Hall, in the South End, will begin their sixth season on Sunday, Jan 11. The concerts are run under the auspices of the South End House and Hale House, two settlements of that part of the city, and are managed by Ordway Tead.

The announcements are as follows: Jan 11, George Harris Jr, tenor, and Hildegarde Lasell, soprano; Jan 18, singers from the Boston Opera House; Jan 25, the American String Quartet; Feb 1, Havrah Hubbard in an "Opera Talk" of "Mme Butterfly," with dramatic reading and piano accompaniment; Feb 8, Felix Fox, pianist, and Leon Van Vliet, cellist; Feb 22, Arthur Foote, the composer, in a talk upon "Early Music in the United States," followed by a recital by Miss Edith Bullard, soprano; March 1, Mrs Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Ella Kalova Ondricek, violinist.

All concerts will commence at 4 o'clock. Tickets for a single concert will be 15 cents; those for the series 75 cents. The concerts will be given in Parker Memorial Hall, 53 Berkeley, corner Appleton sts.

Philharmonic Orchestra.

The second concert of the new Boston Philharmonic Society, Charles Frank conductor, will occur at the St James Theatre at 3 this afternoon. Raymond Allen Simonds, as soloist, will sing "In Native Worth," from Haydn's "Creation," and the "Birth of Dawn," by Leoni. The orchestra's chief number will be a movement from Beethoven's Eroica symphony, and other numbers on the program are Meyerbeer's Coronation March from "The Prophet" overture to "Mignon," Haydn's serenade for string quartet, Luigini's Egyptian ballet and an American sket, "Dort unten im Suden" (Down South).

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

The fourth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. The soloist will be George Proctor, who will play the little known concerto in C sharp minor of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The symphony will be Franck's in D minor, the performance of which was the sensation of the last Symphony concerts. This will come first on the program. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" and Berlioz' "Rob Roy" overture.

Ysaye Next Sunday.

This is almost as much a year of violinists as last season. Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman have already been heard here. Next Sunday afternoon the great Ysaye, who is returning to America for a brief tour, will give his first recital of the season. Last year Ysaye played in Boston a number of times and fully reestablished his favor with the public. He showed that his skill and musicianship are yet transcendent.

This year, as last, he will have the invaluable assistance of Camille Decreus, the accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's, in D major. As Mr Noack of our own orchestra and Mr Kreisler have just played the Mendelssohn Concerto, it will be interesting to see what the great Belgian does with it. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

Soprano Applauded by Recital Audience for Her Interpretation of Works From German and Old English Repertories

BRAHMS HONORS WON

Opening the recital season for the second half year, Mme. Julia Culp appeared in Jordan hall on Friday afternoon singing songs of Schubert, Brahms and Loewe and a group of English folk songs before an audience that almost filled the floor and balcony seats. An enthusiastic afternoon song recital house is a rare thing to record. It points back generally to good work done the previous season. Such extraordinary approval is flattering to the artist who wins it. At the same time it means that the public is going to demand greater performance than ever before. Perhaps none of the touring musicians who have found themselves in this situation this season have lived up to public expectation better than Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. He won approval of the first order a year ago and he has done work this season that not only kept up the former standard but in some points surpassed it. He was especially careful to return with additions to his repertory that would give his listeners a surprise.

Mme. Culp returns with almost the same things to say about herself as formerly, so far as repertory goes. She proved herself a great Brahms singer last season. She still holds her own in the familiar pieces of the Brahms repertory. Perhaps no singer surpasses her as an interpreter of that repertory through pure singing tone. There have been added to her technical equipment certain striking effects, most markworthy among which is the melting of the vocal tone into the piano tone at the conclusion of phrases. This has become a special contrivance in her exclusive control and it will serve her well until other singers get to imitating it.

Mme. Culp may be called an imitator of herself in the use of it, inasmuch as she often resorts to it for no particular interpretative reason. She is greatly aided by her accompanist, Mr. Bos, in gaining this effect. Its cleverness is indisputable. Its sincerity, or more accurately, perhaps, its necessity, in many places may be called in question.

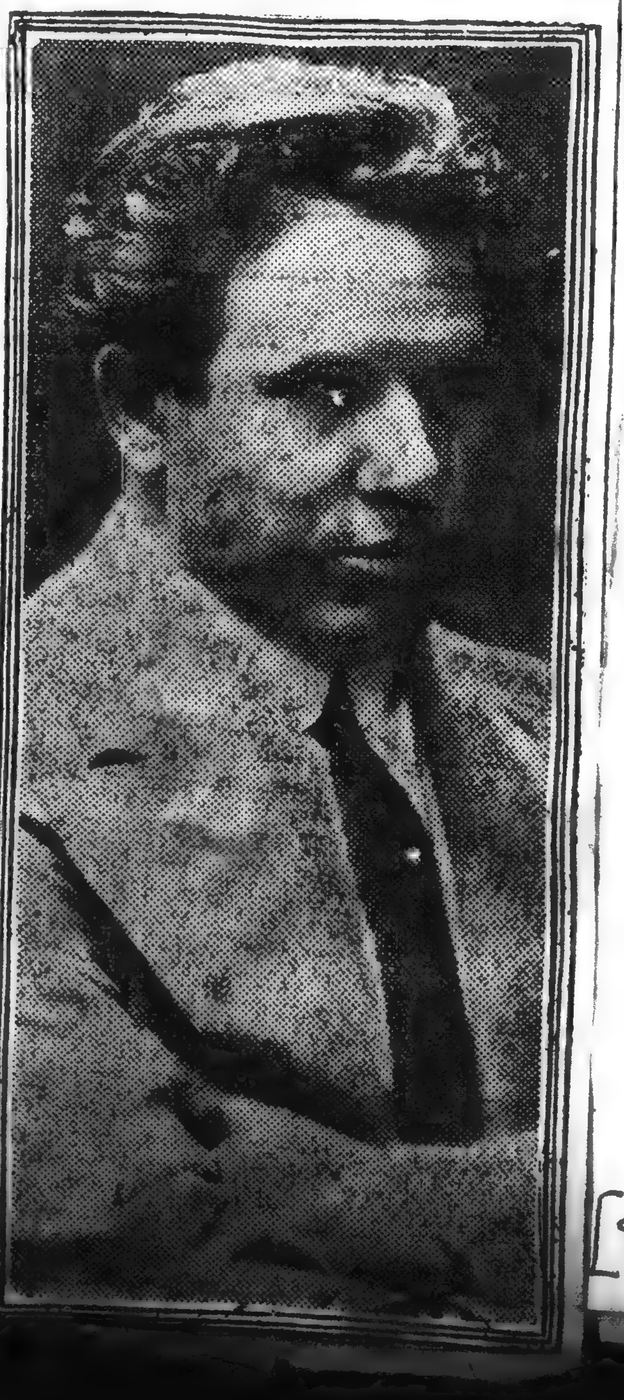
The soprano is inclined to rejoice overmuch in her significant tone and to emphasize the melodic value of her songs out of proportion to their word value. Nevertheless she delivers the text with perfect articulation and with a precision in the vowel sounds that is surprising. She seems, indeed, to have developed a marvelous song technique and not yet to have found what is best to do with it. She has apparently vast interpretative ability in reserve. Putting this to service, she may in another season bring out something epoch-making in recital work.

* * *

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 12.

TITTA RUFFO, $2000 barytone, who gave a concert in Boston yesterday.



Titta Ruffo, Noted Barytone, Is Heard In Symphony Hall

By E. F. Harkins.

BOSTON saw for the first time yesterday at Symphony Hall the highest-paid barytone of all time, the hero of three continents, Titta Ruffo, whose real name is Ruffo Titta.

Ruffo receives $2000 a performance, which is more than twice the sum paid to any other barytone now in this vocal paradise of ours; but does he sing with twice the effect they have made here from time to time? He was at some disadvantage yesterday for two reasons. First, he is at his best in opera, being pre-eminently a singer of dramatic style and instinct. Second, Symphony Hall does not favor a soloist when the enormous stage is barren of spectators and when the hall is not filled. There were scores of vacant seats yesterday; but then these $2000 soloists compel high prices all around. That is one reason why the Eastern opera companies are loath to engage the thrice-famous Tuscan.

Voice High Pitched

Ruffo may command three times $2000 next season, but unless he sings better than he sang yesterday he will never eclipse memories of several other barytones who have visited Boston even during the past ten years, to go back no further. He has a high-pitched, virile voice that sounds best between C below the staff and high G. Below C his tones are comparatively feeble. Nor was he always true to pitch.

His high notes are extraordinarily broad and resonant, and he takes especial delight in singing these notes. He is like the traditional tenore robusto in that respect. Evidently his great reputation rests more upon these ringing, thrilling tones around the top of the staff than upon his style, which was ragged yesterday; but allowance must again be made for his surroundings. He belongs primarily on the operatic stage.

Ruffo is young, fine-looking, swarthy, well-built, with a naive way. He was frankly delighted at the friendly reception the audience gave him. He bowed low and often, like Paderewski; he nodded this way and that, as if to acquaintances; and once, he ran off the stage in true Latin fashion, full of joy and excitement. The audience took almost as much pleasure in his unaffected simplicity as it did in his singing. Besides, he was generous with encores.

Sings Brilliantly

The "Largo al Factotum" aria from "Il Barbiere di Seviglia," the prologue from "I Pagliacci," and the "Brindisi" aria from Thomas's "Hamlet" were the principal pieces on his program. He sang these brilliantly, in his own peculiar style. In the first two he gave glimpses of the operatic gifts for which he was distinguished long before a Philadelphia millionaire made a sensation out of him. He also put much dramatic expression into some of the popular Italian songs he sang; nor did he forget to use the dry "white" tones that give intensity of feeling to the style of the later Italian singers.

The audience applauded and shouted and showed as much excitement as he did himself. It was on good terms with him, so that he took the liberty once to leave the stage for a moment to adjust his collar, which worried him, as he explained to the crowd with pantomime.

Florence Hinkle, soprano, and William Morse Rummel, violinist, also took part in the concert.

SUNDAY HERALD,

JANUARY 11,

CONCERTS AND RECITALS

Titta Ruffo.

Boston will have its first opportunity to hear this sensational Italian baritone at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon. He will be assisted by Florence Hinkle, soprano, and William Morse Rummel, violinist. Mr. Ruffo will sing the prologue from "Pagliacci," the Largo al Factotum from "The Barber of Seville," a group of Italian and Spanish songs and the "Brindisi" aria from Thomas's "Hamlet." Miss Hinkle will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from "Tosca" and "Depuis le Jour" from "Louise." Mr. Rummel will play selections by Pugnani, Couperin, Faure and Sarasate, the first two arranged by Kreisler.

Opera House Concert.

Mme. Tetrazzini will be the chief attraction at the regular concert at the Boston Opera House tomorrow evening. She will sing Aria of Ophelia from Thomas's "Hamlet," Cavatina from "I Pescatori di Perle" and a group of songs. Mr. Blanchart will sing Romanza from "Dinorah" and "La Mia Bandiera," by Rotoli. Mr. Wransky will be heard in an aria from "Robert the Devil" and a group of Polish songs. Miss Edna Gunnar Peterson of Chicago, pianist, will play selections from Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff and Paganini-Liszt. As usual, the orchestra will be heard in two numbers.

Eleanor Spencer.

This young pianist, who made her first Boston appearance with Marie Rappold as a substitute for Gogorza a short time ago in Symphony Hall, will be heard in a recital all her own at Jordan Hall, next Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 14. Her program is as follows: Organ Fantasie and Fugue, G minor, Bach-Liszt; Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, G minor, Two Intermezzi, op. 117, Nos. 1 and 2; Capriccio, op. 76, No. 2, B minor, Brahms; Sonate, B minor, op. 58, No. 111, Etude, G-flat major (Octave), Chopin; Reverie, Debussy; [illegible] Negre, Cyril Scott; Three [illegible] d 3, Scriabine.

[illegible] Bruckner's [illegible] "Unfinished," symphony w[illegible] part of Dr. Muck's pro[illegible] Friday afternoon and S[illegible] evening. The symphony was first played by the orchestra in Boston in 1904 under Mr. Gericke and has been repeated but once since, in 1907, under Dr. Muck. The second part of next week's program will consist of Brahm's piano concerto in D minor, No. 1, Opus 15, played by Harold Bauer.

On Thursday evening at the fourth concert of the season in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the soloist will be Mr. George Proctor, who will play the little known concerto in C sharp minor of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The orchestral numbers will be Franck's symphony in D minor, Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Berlioz's "Rob Roy" overture.

Eugene Ysaye.

This brilliant violinist, following Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman, will make his first Boston appearance of the season at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 18. As last year he will be assisted by Camille Decreus, the accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr. Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's in D minor. As Mr. Noack of our own orchestra and Mr. Kreisler have just played the Mendelssohn Concerto it will be interesting to see what the great Belgian does with it. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

SUNDAY POST

JANUARY 11.

EUGENE YSAYE

Next Sunday afternoon Ysaye, who is returning to America for a brief tour, will give his first recital of the season. This year, as last, he will have the assistance of Camille Decreus, the very accomplished Belgian pianist. Together they will play Faure's Sonata in A major. Mr. Ysaye will play two concertos, Mendelssohn's and Wieniawski's in D minor. He will also play an air by Handel and Saint-Saens' "Havanaise."

Next Symphony Programme

Dr. Muck's annual offering of a Bruckner symphony is set for the coming week when he will play the Ninth or "Unfinished" symphony of the Austrian master. This ninth symphony of Bruckner's has appeared but twice on the Boston programmes of the orchestra, in 1904 when Mr. Gericke played it and in the fall of 1907 when Dr. Muck performed it. The second part of the programme will be devoted to Brahms' Concerto for Pianoforte in D Minor, No. 1, Opus 15. The soloist will be Mr. Harold Bauer. This concerto has been played but once at a Symphony concert here and then by Mr. Bauer in the fall of 1900.

Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp

Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp will appear in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 25. This will be Carreno's first appearance in Boston this season and Miss Culp will, of course, sing other songs than those she presented at her recital the past week.

THE LONGY CLUB

The Longy Club will give its second concert of chamber music for wind instruments is Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 22. There will be four numbers, including a Suite by Mr. Andre Maquarre, the first flute of the Symphony Orchestra. The work is for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons. The other numbers will be by Flament, d'Indy and Dvorak.

ALEXANDER BLOCH

Mr. Alexander Bloch, violinist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 21, at 3 o'clock. His programme will include Handel's Sonata in E Major; Vitali's Chaconne for violin and organ, and two groups of short pieces.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914

Establish

CONCERTS and CONCERT GOERS

by CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

TERESA CARREÑO.
JULIA CULP.
BEATRICE HARRISON
EUGENE YSAYE

To-day, to-night and in the we to come, we shall hear other concert "stars," and, wedged betw them, younger and less famous ar ists, at recitals, some of which the themselves have organized.

Of still more interest were— most—the wonderful concerts of t bygone week arranged by Dr. Muc and the great Boston Orchestra. Th attitude of those who had the good fortune to attend the performances he contrasted classic and mod- programmes drawn up by Dr. : would have impressed many ous opera "patrons" as devout e degree of humor. While the nians, on Thursday night, l Haydn and Mozart and Bee- n, one could have heard almost 'overbial pin drop—as one can, ly, in the Salt Lake City nacle. And the attention of dience was as hushed on Sat- afternoon, when our visitors Florent Schmitt's most recent effort and the D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

At the functions of our own Philharmonic and Symphony societies the public, to be sure, is just a trifle less religious in its bearing. But it is decorous and respectful.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 4 1914

Establi 84

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 9, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, has arranged a programme entirely classical and one which contains many delights. The programme contains two short symphonies, and two concertos. The first number will be Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 6, called the Paukenschlag," or "Surprise" Symphony. This is one of the most delightful works of "Papa" Haydn. This will be followed by Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, Mr. Maquarre playing the solo flute and Alfred Holy the solo harp.

This will be Brooklyn's first opportunity to hear Mr. Holy, who is generally acknowledged to be one of the greatest harpists of the world.

The second half of the programme will be devoted to Handel's fascinating Concerto for strings and two wind chours. The solo instruments in this will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes; and Mr. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns. The final number will be the Symphony in C major by Beethoven.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 1914

Establi

DR. MUCK'S MEN PLAY DELIGHTFULLY

Boston Orchestra Gives Charming Concert Without Soloists or Other Distractions.

There was nothing in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's able direction, in Carnegie Hall, to attract interest except music loved for its own sake. No soloist, no novelty, nothing unusual or designed for effect was present to mar or detract from the enjoyment of the playing of the orchestra. The programme was severely classical, being devoted to the music of three composers, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Many concertgoers have not yet come to like the modern music which is gradually putting Haydn and Mozart, although hardly Beethoven, in the background so far as frequency of hearing is concerned, if not in actual popularity. To these such a concert as that presented by Dr. Muck last night is like an oasis in a desert, and even to the followers of modern music the music of old masters, when played as the Boston Symphony plays it, cannot be replaced by Strauss, Reger or Debussy.

The Haydn number was his symphony in D major and it was played with precision. One of the most interesting of Mozart's symphonies is the one in E flat major, and it was heard last night. There were many things to enjoy in Dr. Muck's reading and in the playing of the men, but in the andante movement the string section furnished the most beautiful work of the performance.

Beethoven's First Symphony is so rarely heard that it can almost be classed as a novelty, and as such it is well worth hearing. It cannot be said it gave the pleasure last night that the Seventh did earlier in the season when presented by the same orchestra, but it is Beethoven, nevertheless, and it was played with the same care and finished elegance that have marked the playing of the greater works of the same composer by the same orchestra.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914

Est 884

NEW YORK, January 8.

CRASHING DISSONANCES.

Are They Only Fashionable or Really Enjoyed?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: Do people really love the crashing dissonances of a hundred instruments of various kinds in such productions as the symphony in E minor by Rachmaninoff, as recently given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or do they simply go there because it is the thing to do?

The playing must have been perfect, to judge by the rhythmic precision of motions made by the performers. But I sat in the first row from the orchestra, and about all that I could get out of it was a confused blare of sounds without a meaning.

As I gazed and tried to catch the melodies and to understand it all, it seemed to me that the whole orchestra was one huge automaton actuated in some way by machinery below the stage, and through my eyes I became hypnotized by the machinelike motion of the arms of the violinists going back and forth, and the fingering and sawing of the bass viols and cellos, and I seemed to fall into a sort of trance or daze, when crash would come a terrific volume of indistinguishable sounds and almost cause me to collapse. Whether others got such an impression I know not, but I assure you that, with the smell of sperm oil coming up through the ventilation screens at the front of the stage to make the thing more real, one could hardly escape the idea that this whole affair was some great mechanical contrivance for hypnotizing the audience with a complicated scheme of mechanical motion driven by some tremendous engine whose squeakings and wheezings and crashings were synchronously adjusted thereto.

With the subsequent renderings of Mozart and Mendelssohn it seemed entirely different, beautiful, in fact. But Rachmaninoff! No more for me.

EMILE PICKHARDT.
ISLINGTON, Mass., January 6.

New York's Greatness and Sadness.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914
Establish

CONCERTS and CONCERT GOERS

by CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

MME. JULIA CULP.
TERESA CARRENO.
BEATRICE HARRISON
EUGENE YSAYE

To-day, to-nigh and in the w to come, we sh l hear other co cert "stars," an , wedged betw them, younger nd less famous ar- ists, at recitals, some of which the themselves have organized.

Of still more interest were— most—the wonderful concerts of t bygone week arranged by Dr. Muc nd the great Boston Orchestra. Th attitude of those who had the good fortune to attend the performances of the contrasted classic and modern programmes drawn up by Dr. Muck would have impressed many frivolous opera "patrons" as devout to the degree of humor. While the Bostonians, on Thursday night, played Haydn and Mozart and Beethoven, one could have heard almost the proverbial pin drop—as one can, literally, in the Salt Lake City Tabernacle. And the attention of the audience was as hushed on Saturday afternoon, when our visitors played Florent Schmitt's most recent effort and the D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

At the functions of our own Philharmonic and Symphony societies the public, to be ure, is just a trifle less religious in ts bearing. But it decorous and respectful.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 4 1914
Establi

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 9, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, has arranged a programme entirely classical and one which contains many delights. 84 The programme contains two short symphonies, and two concertos. The first number will be Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 6, called the Paukenschlag," or "Surprise" Symphony. This is one of the most delightful works of "Papa" Haydn. This will be followed by Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, Mr. Maquarre playing the solo flute and Alfred Holy the solo harp.

This will be Brooklyn's first opportunity to hear Mr. Holy, who is generally acknowledged to be one of the greatest harpists of the world.

The second half of the programme will be devoted to Handel's fascinating Concerto for strings and two wind chours. The solo instruments in this will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes; and Mr. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns. The final number will be the Symphony in C major by Beethoven.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 1914
Establi

DR. MUCK'S MEN PLAY DELIGHTFULLY

Boston Orchestra Gives Charming Concert Without Soloists or Other Distractions.

There was nothing in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's able direction, in Carnegie Hall, to attract interest except music loved for its own sake. No soloist, no novelty, nothing unusual or designed for effect was present to mar or detract from the enjoyment of the playing of the orchestra. The programme was severely classical, being devoted to the music of three composers, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Many concertgoers have not yet come to like the modern music which is gradually putting Haydn and Mozart, although hardly Beethoven, in the background so far as frequency of hearing is concerned, if not in actual popularity. To these such a concert as that presented by Dr. Muck last night is like an oasis in a desert, and even to the followers of modern music the music of old masters, when played as the Boston Symphony plays it, cannot be replaced by Strauss, Reger or Debussy.

The Haydn number was his symphony in D major and it was played with precision. One of the most interesting of Mozart's symphonies is the one in E flat major, and it was heard last night. There were many things to enjoy in Dr. Muck's reading and in the playing of the men, but in the andante movement the string section furnished the most beautiful work of the performance.

Beethoven's First Symphony is so rarely heard that it can almost be classed as a novelty, and as such it is well worth hearing. It cannot be said it gave the pleasure last night that the Seventh did earlier in the season when presented by the same orchestra, but it is Beethoven, nevertheless, and it was played with the same care and finished elegance that hav marked the playing of the greater wor of the same composer by the same chestra.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Dat NEW YORK, January 8. JAN 9
Est

CRASHING DISSONANCE

Are They Only Fashionable or Enjoyed?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—S people really love the crashing nances of a hundred instruments ous kinds in such productions as the phony in E minor by Rachmaninoff, as recently given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or do they simply go there because it is the thing to do?

The playing must have been perfect, to judge by the rhythmic precision of motions made by the performers. But I sat in the first row from the orchestra, and about all that I could get out of it was a confused blare of sounds without a meaning.

As I gazed and tried to catch the melodies and to understand it all, it seemed to me that the whole orchestra was one huge automaton actuated in some way by machinery below the stage, and through my eyes I became hypnotized by the machinelike motion of the arms of the violinists going back and forth, and the fingering and sawing of the bass viols and cellos, and I seemed to fall into a sort of trance or daze, when crash would come a terrific volume of indistinguishable sounds and almost cause me to collapse. Whether others got such an impression I know not, but I assure you that, with the smell of sperm oil coming up through the ventilation screens at the front of the stage to make the thing more real, one could hardly escape the idea that this whole affair was some great mechanical contrivance for hypnotizing the audience with a complicated scheme of mechanical motion driven by some tremendous engine whose squeakings and wheezings and crashings were synchronously adjusted thereto.

With the subsequent renderings of Mozart and Mendelssohn it seemed entirely different, beautiful, in fact. But Rachmaninoff! No more for me.

EMILE PICKHARDT.
ISLINGTON, Mass., January 6.

New York's Greatness and Sadness.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 - 1914
Establish

PACKED HOUSE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Soloists Dispensed with in Carnegie Hall Concert.

DR. CARL MUCK NOT IN HIS BEST MOOD

Has Trouble Hushing Conversation of Restless Hearers. Programme Classic.

How little the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs the assistance of soloists which almost every other organization of the kind in America must have in order to stimulate the interest of the public and benefit the box office was shown once more last night in Carnegie Hall when the famous aggregation of virtuosi and their distinguished leader, Dr. Carl Muck, played to a capacity house, though they had dispensed with all stellar glory except their own.

That Dr. Muck had arranged a programme of uncompromisingly classic works, presenting nothing new, nothing startling, nothing exotic, impressionistic or futuristic, served to emphasize the hold the great orchestra has on lovers of good music. In these days of sensationalism, however, it is refreshing, indeed, to turn back to the works of the periwigged masters and such performances as were heard last night of Haydn's symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2), Mozart's in E flat major (K. 543) and Beethoven's in C major, made the listener wonder whether the advancing years, after all, bring as much progress as some philosopher's would have us believe they do.

It would serve little purpose to take up in detail at this time the proceedings of the evening. Every one knows what to expect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the baton of Dr. Muck holds sway, and any concertgoer who could not visit Carnegie Hall last night may imagine easily what he missed.

It can hardly be said, to be sure, that the famous German kapellmeister was in his best mood. His conducting lacked some of its usual zest, and one felt the result in the playing of the orchestra.

However, the buzz of voices between movements must have been exceedingly disconcerting to Dr. Muck's nerves. He had no little trouble in hushing the noise whenever the proper time for silence had come. In fact on one occasion he was induced to turn a frowning face toward the restless audience; on another to gaze reprovingly at a woman in the first tier of boxes who was indulging her conversational inclinations very audibly.

MAX SMITH.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914
Esta 884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Played.

A trio of symphonies made up the programme for the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last night in Carnegie Hall. Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were the composers of the symphonies and their respective works heard were: Symphony in D major, No. 2; symphony, E flat major, and symphony No. 1 in C major.

In putting forward these three compositions Dr. Muck certainly paid a tribute of high honor to the trend and taste of New York city's musical public. Three classic symphonies, pure and simple, at one hearing unite in forming a mould in concert literature chaste indeed in its form, and one seldom ventured in the giving.

The interest attending their performance was large. The familiar and flattering conditions that prevail at the concerts given here by the Bostonian band were again evidenced in full force.

Perhaps the best general summary of the evening's proceedings can be made at once through remarks quoted in the programme notes by Philip Hale, which Hadyn entered in his diary in 1795, after attending a London concert at which, among other works of his, the second symphony in D major had had its first performance. He wrote: "The hall was filled with a picked audience. The whole company was delighted."

To enter into any detailed mention of the programme is unnecessary. Its three numbers are well known to all students and lovers of symphonic masterpieces. The discussion of so-called "readings" of such enterprises is a time worn subject. This state of affairs will no doubt continue to exist just so long as there are conductors to infuse their own personal note of understanding into the renderings of scores.

Under Dr. Muck's guidance the orchestra's playing of the music presented was a cause for unceasing admiration. Each composer was interpreted with a fine understanding of his individual style on the [illegible]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914
Es 1884

barel.“

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Haydn, Mozart und Beethoven, dazu noch des Altmeiſters Erſte Symphonie, und kein Soliſt dazu! Das geſtrige Abendkonzert der Boſtoner mußte demnach alle Freunde ernſter Kunſt anziehen, und die Snobs abſchrecken. Umſo erfreulicher, daß Carnegie Hall auch geſtern nicht das kleinſte Plätzchen frei hatte, und daß die Befriedigung des Publikums ungemein freundliche Formen annahm.

Leicht hatte Dr. Muck es dem Publikum nicht gemacht; nicht als ob er es allzuſehr mit ſchwerer Koſt beladen hätte, — ganz im Gegentheil, es war alles zu ſehr in einem und demſelben Gefühlskreis gehalten, wodurch die Veranſtaltung einer gelegentlichen Monotonie nicht zu entbehren ſchien. Haydn, Mozart und dazu ein Beethoven, da der Größte der Großen, wenn man etwa das ſchäumende, kräftige Menuett ausnimmt, noch gänzlich in den Spuren ſeiner großen Vorgänger wandelte. Das ſchloß jede Kontraſtwirkung, jede kräftigere Note, Effekte, auf welche ein Programm ja nicht verzichten darf, vollſtändig aus. Dr. Muck iſt nicht immer glücklich im Programmachen, und geſtern gab er einen eklatanten Beweis dafür.

Allerdings machte der Dirigent und ſein Orcheſter, das ſich geſtern wieder von ſeiner herrlichſten Seite zeigte, durch die Ausführung der einzelnen Werke die Grundfehler des Aufbaus ſtark wett. In Haydn's funkelnder, geiſtvoller D-Dur-Symphonie (Breitkopf & Härtel No. 2) entzückten der wunderſam glänzende Ton, das feingliedrige Muſiziren und die wirkſam gebrachten Kontraſte, denn im Andante kommt der liebe Papa Haydn mitten zwiſchen den Variationen des einfachen Liedſätzchens immer wieder mit faſt ſchroffen Orcheſterfortiſſimi, die ganz leidenſchaftlich ſich geben, und auch im Menuett muß zwiſchen dem kräftig zufahrenden erſten Satz und dem ſanften Trio der Kontraſt gebührend gebracht werden. In Mozart's Es Dur-Symphonie (Köchel 543) prangte die Lyrik in zarteſtem Schmelz, aber auch der ungewohnte Ernſt des Andante gelangte zu ſeinem Recht.

Ich kann es nicht unterlaſſen, anläßlich dieſes Satzes der ſonſt ſo ungelenken Baßgeigen zu gedenken, deren Spieler ſich als Virtuoſen reifſter Art erwieſen. Welch' ein gleichmäßiger, warmer, durchgeiſtigter Ton, als ob es Celli wären! Und im Menuett darf man dem berückenden Geſang der Klarinette ſein Kompliment nicht verſagen.

Auch die Beethoven'ſche Erſte fand die vollkommenſte Ausführung. Dr. Muck darf das geſtrige Konzert ungeachtet ſeiner oben beſprochenen Strukturmängel als eine gewonnene Schlacht anſehen. Das Publikum war ganz meiner Anſicht.

H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1914
Establish 884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

A Programme of Symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

Some may have thought that Dr. Muck drove his principle of "unity of style" rather hard in making the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert, which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of three symphonies: Haydn's in D major, Mozart's in E flat, and Beethoven's first in C. They are all symphonies of the eighteenth century.

While Haydn's and Mozart's are works of their maturest periods, works that definitely declare their ultimate views and ideals as to symphonic composition, Beethoven's was composed while he was still under the influence of these older men, and had not yet disclosed his own individual style or moved on to the ideals that he established for the dawning of a new era in the new century.

The juxtaposition of three such symphonies cannot be considered a fortunate idea in the art of programme-making. If people went to symphony concerts for the study of musical history, which they do not, there was an opportunity for those who wished to do so to determine for themselves what the historians and historical critics have debated. Is the first symphony "Beethovenish" in originalty? Is it an imitation of Mozart? How far are Haydn and Mozart echoed in its themes, its general plan of development? Is it, as Columbani says, in Mr. Hale's quotation, a résumé of the past, or an original production of his genius? There seems hardly room for much debate, however plainly the claw of the lion may occasionally be visible in passages that neither Haydn nor Mozart would have written.

Whether or not many of Dr. Muck's listeners concerned themselves with these questions last evening, most of them probably felt a sense of monotony in listening to works of so nearly the same style, one after another, without relief. They could enjoy a performance so vigorous and vital, so rhythmically incisive, so beautifully proportioned, so finished in detail, so finely euphonious as the orchestra gave under his direction.

But they doubtless wished that Dr. Muck was a little less relentless in the exemplification of his principles: or that his principles took a little more account of an aesthetic hunger for contest and differentiation.

They may have rejoiced in the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart and in Beethoven's first. Not one of them has been seriously touched by the tooth of time, or is invalidated by the perspective of the twentieth century. But they do not belong all together on one programme.

4

From EVE. POST.
Address New York C

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Orchestra Plays French No elty.

The programme of the Boston Symph concert on Saturday afternoon was made of three numbers—César Franck's S phony in D minor; a novelty, "La trag de Salomé," by Florent Schmitt, in two parts, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish themes.

It seems a singular thing that when Franck's symphony was first performed in 1889 it should have been a puzzle to some listeners, for to our sophisticated ears its harmonic masses, and its thematic material seem perfectly normal. One always feels in listening to his music a lofty purpose—one might almost say a semi-religious solemnity—in his attitude toward his work; but, splendid as are some of the massive orchestral effects which Franck creates, his melodic invention is not of striking originality. No doubt he would have been greatly surprised could he have realized that his symphony is largely based on themes from Liszt's "Les Préludes," that Wagner's works, especially "Parsifal," constantly colored his thoughts, and that one of the chief melodies of his symphony is surprisingly like Grieg. Even if he had little melodic vein himself, he had the taste to study men who had it in a marked degree.

Of the second number on the programme one cannot say that, like the symphony, it is noble and lofty in tone. Florent Schmitt having selected the noisome subject of Salome, and Robert d'Humières having added sundry indecent embellishments to the story, the composer proceeds to try to illustrate it in tones. Fortunately, music is unable to convey such things unaided. Without a clew one would simply wonder what all the noise was about. Mr. Schmitt no doubt hoped to enrich the world by the adaptation of his original work (a mute drama in two acts and seven scenes) to concert performance, but without a dancer it is imcomprehensible. The first "dance of the pearls," where Salome is supposed to dance "with a childish joy," is as frenzied as the later objectionable ones, when nature comes to the rescue and pours volcanic fires on her head. Schmitt has complete command of all the modern color effects for the orchestra, and an occasional interesting moment is the result, the use of muted brasses played fortissimo producing an uncommon effect. The opening measures of the second part, which picture the "enchantments of the sea," have descriptive value, but the general effect is that of a deafening charivari. The orchestra played it with splendid virtuosity, of course, but it seemed hardly worth the trouble. There was almost no applause for either movement.

The concert closed with the Russian work referred to. It came as a welcome contrast to the French novelty, which affected one like a nightmare after listening to Strauss's novelty. Rimsky-Korsakoff's composition was played here a few weeks ago by the Philharmonic in splendidly virile fashion. If there was less red blood in it on Saturday, it nevertheless was played with consummate finish, and came as an appropriate close to a concert chiefly notable for its display of orchestral technique.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9

Concert of Boston Symphony Hear

DR. MUCK was consistently classic in making the programme for last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Carnegie Hall. But three names appeared in the composers' column—Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—all masters, who lived in about the same period, yet each an individualist in style and treatment, and each was represented by a symphony.

First on the programme was Haydn's D major symphony, one of the most melodious and fluent works by that versatile and tireless composer. The charming moods and measures were interpreted with graciousness, appropriate emphasis and faultless blending of tone.

The E flat symphony by Mozart next claimed the attention of the large and distinguished audience. After listening to the Boston Orchestra's masterly reading of the score one can understand this symphony's position among the greatest of Mozart's writings.

Beethoven's C major symphony (No. 1) closed the concert. In outline, scope and melodic material the Beethoven number bore considerable resemblance to the Mozart work. Yet the first-named composition carried a dignity and depth that characterize the writings of Beethoven.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 12 1914
Estab 84

Music.

"Salome" at a Boston Symphony Concert—Other Musical Matters.

Dr. Muck turned from the austere classicism of his Thursday night programme to offer modern music to the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. César Franck's symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" are still modern music, though the former is now twenty-five years old and the latter twenty-seven. They formed respectively the opening and the closing items of the programme Saturday. Between them came "La Tragédie de Salomé," a much more recent work, by Florent Schmitt, born in Lorraine of Alsatian parents, and prominent among the younger French composers. The performance was the first in New York.

Richard Strauss's superb setting of Oscar Wilde's "Salome" is unfortunately not now heard in our town, though the Metropolitan Opera Company has the means to give it a splendid production. However, there is no need of going into that matter here and wasting time and strength in vain lamentations. It is more to the point to inquire whether "La Tragédie de Salomé" for orchestra, after a poem by Robert d'Humières, by Florent Schmitt fills a long felt want.

The Schmitt affair has nothing to do with the Wilde play. It had its inception in music he composed for a "mute drama" by Robert d'Humières performed for the first time at the Théâtre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. It is interesting to note that the part of Salomé was taken by Loie Fuller, who danced the dance of pearls, the dance of the peacock, the dance of serpents, the dance of steel, the dance of silver, and the dance of fear. The orchestra at the Théâtre des Arts was too small to realize Schmitt's ideal, so he amplified the score, putting together several episodes so as to form a suite in two parts for concert use. This was performed at a Colonne concert in Paris on Jan. 2, 1911, under the direction of Gabriel Pierné. The Russian Ballet later took up the work and the famous Karsavina has done Salomé.

The first section of the concert suite consists of a prelude representing the terrace of Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Sea, the surrounding landscape at sunset, and a slow promenade of John the Baptist across the stage, followed by the dance of pearls. The second section begins with the "Enchantments on the Sea." The five engulfed cities are dimly seen beneath the waves. "Old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion." Dance measures are heard, a voice rises from the depths, Herod is overcome, thunder rolls, Salome begins to dance, Herod starts to his feet. Then follows the dance of the lightnings. Herod pursues Salome amid the flashes and plucks the veils from off her. John suddenly steps forward and covers her with his cloak. Herodias points out John to the executioner. Holding the head in a charger, Salome at first dances, then casts the charger into the sea, which straightway turns to the color of blood. All except Salome flee in terror, but she is dazed by a vision of the heads rising about her everywhere. The dance of fear concludes the matter, danced amid a general cataclysm of nature.

Schmitt's music is modern in the fullest sense of the term, modern in harmonic daring, modern in orchestration. It unquestionably produced an effect on Saturday, but with this effect went the impression one could not escape that it is realistic music, music of the scene, which in this concert suite loses something essential that only the theatrical representation can impart. Interesting as the Schmitt music is, it does not quite stand alone.

Of course the orchestra played it magnificently. But so did the orchestra play the great symphony of Franck, which sounded ineffably beautiful as the men from Boston proclaimed its glories. Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice is just a little [illegible] concert but Dr.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date JAN 9 1914
Es 34

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Evening Devoted to Three Contemporaneous Works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted its concert of last night to three symphonies, one by Haydn, one by Mozart and the other by Beethoven. As the Beethoven symphony was his first, the period of the three works were very close.

This gave a sense of monotony to th evening, though it should be said that execution of the programme [illegible] perfection.

TIME TABLE 7:45
rture 7:53
Opera
rnie

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 - 1914

PACKED HOUSE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Soloists Dispensed with in Carnegie Hall Concert.

DR. CARL MUCK NOT IN HIS BEST MOOD

Has Trouble Hushing Conversation of Restless Hearers. Programme Classic.

How little the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs the assistance of soloists which almost every other organization of the kind in America must have in order to stimulate the interest of the public and benefit the box office was shown once more last night in Carnegie Hall when the famous aggregation of virtuosi and their distinguished leader, Dr. Carl Muck, played to a capacity house, though they had dispensed with all stellar glory except their own.

That Dr. Muck had arranged a programme of uncompromisingly classic works, presenting nothing new, nothing startling, nothing exotic, impressionistic or futuristic, served to emphasize the hold the great orchestra has on lovers of good music. In these days of sensationalism, however, it is refreshing, indeed, to turn back to the works of the periwigged masters and such performances as were heard last night of Haydn's symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2), Mozart's in E flat major (K. 543) and Beethoven's in C major, made the listener wonder whether the advancing years, after all, bring as much progress as some philosopher's would have us believe they do.

It would serve little purpose to take up in detail at this time the proceedings of the evening. Every one knows what to expect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the baton of Dr. Muck holds sway, and any concertgoer who could not visit Carnegie Hall last night may imagine easily what he missed.

It can hardly be said, to be sure, that the famous German kapellmeister was in his best mood. His conducting lacked some of its usual zest, and one felt the result in the playing of the orchestra.

However, the buzz of voices between movements must have been exceedingly disconcerting to Dr. Muck's nerves. He had no little trouble in hushing the noise whenever the proper time for silence had come. In fact on one occasion he was induced to turn a frowning face toward the restless audience; on another to gaze reprovingly at a woman in the first tier of boxes who was indulging her conversational inclinations very audibly.

MAX SMITH.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Played.

A trio of symphonies made up the programme for the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last night in Carnegie Hall. Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were the composers of the symphonies and their respective works heard were: Symphony in D major, No. 2; symphony, E flat major, and symphony No. 1 in C major.

In putting forward these three compositions Dr. Muck certainly paid a tribute of high honor to the trend and taste of New York city's musical public. Three classic symphonies, pure and simple, at one hearing unite in forming a mould in concert literature chaste indeed in its form, and one seldom ventured in the giving.

The interest attending their performance was large. The familiar and flattering conditions that prevail at the concerts given here by the Bostonian band were again evidenced in full force.

Perhaps the best general summary of the evening's proceedings can be made at once through remarks quoted in the programme notes by Philip Hale, which Hadyn entered in his diary in 1795, after attending a London concert at which, among other works of his, tha second symphony in D major had had its first performance. He wrote: "The hall was filled with a picked audience. The whole company was delighted."

To enter into any detailed mention of the programme is unnecessary. Its three numbers are well known to all students and lovers of symphonic masterpieces. The discussion of so-called "readings" of such enterprises is a time worn subject. This state of affairs will no doubt continue to exist just so long as there are conductors to infuse their own personal note of understanding into the renderings of scores.

Under Dr. Muck's guidance the orchestra's playing of the music presented was a cause for unceasing admiration. Each composer was interpreted with a fine understanding of his individual style on the [illegible]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914

barel."

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Haydn, Mozart und Beethoven, dazu noch des Altmeiſters Erſte Symphonie, und kein Soliſt dazu! Das geſtrige Abendkonzert der Boſtoner mußte demnach alle Freunde ernſter Kunſt anziehen, und die Snobs abſchrecken. Umſo erfreulicher, daß Carnegie Hall auch geſtern nicht das kleinſte Plätzchen frei hatte, und daß die Befriedigung des Publikums ungemein freundliche Formen annahm.

Leicht hatte Dr. Muck es dem Publikum nicht gemacht; nicht als ob er es allzuſehr mit ſchwerer Koſt beladen hätte, — ganz im Gegentheil, es war alles zu ſehr in einem und demſelben Gefühlskreis gehalten, wodurch die Veranſtaltung einer gelegentlichen Monotonie nicht zu entbehren ſchien. Haydn, Mozart und dazu ein Beethoven, da der Größte der Großen, wenn man etwa das ſchäumende, kräftige Menuett ausnimmt, noch gänzlich in den Spuren ſeiner großen Vorgänger wandelte. Das ſchloß jede Kontraſtwirkung, jede kräftigere Note, Effekte, auf welche ein Programm ja nicht verzichten darf, vollſtändig aus. Dr. Muck iſt nicht immer glücklich im Programmachen, und geſtern gab er einen eklatanten Beweis dafür.

Allerdings machte der Dirigent und ſein Orcheſter, das ſich geſtern wieder von ſeiner herrlichſten Seite zeigte, durch die Ausführung der einzelnen Werke die Grundfehler des Aufbaus ſtark wett. In Haydn's funkelnder, geiſtvoller D-Dur-Symphonie (Breitkopf & Härtel No. 2) entzückten der wunderſam glänzende Ton, das feingliedrige Muſiziren und die wirkſam gebrachten Kontraſte, denn im Andante kommt der liebe Papa Haydn mitten zwiſchen den Variationen des einfachen Liedſätzchens immer wieder mit faſt ſchroffen Orcheſterfortiſſimi, die ganz leidenſchaftlich ſich geben, und auch im Menuett muß zwiſchen dem kräftig zufahrenden erſten Satz und dem ſanften Trio der Kontraſt gebührend gebracht werden. In Mozart's Es Dur-Symphonie (Köchel 543) prangte die Lyrik in zarteſtem Schmelz, aber auch der ungewohnte Ernſt des Andante gelangte zu ſeinem Recht.

Ich kann es nicht unterlaſſen, anläßlich dieſes Satzes der ſonſt ſo ungelenken Baßgeigen zu gedenken, deren Spieler ſich als Virtuoſen reifſter Art erwieſen. Welch' ein gleichmäßiger, warmer, durchgeiſtigter Ton, als ob es Celli wären! Und im Menuett darf man dem berückenden Geſang der Klarinette ſein Kompliment nicht verſagen.

Auch die Beethoven'ſche Erſte fand die vollkommenſte Ausführung. Dr. Muck darf das geſtrige Konzert ungeachtet ſeiner oben beſprochenen Strukturmängel als eine gewonnene Schlacht anſehen. Das Publikum war ganz meiner Anſicht.

H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 - 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

A Programme of Symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

Some may have thought that Dr. Muck drove his principle of "unity of style" rather hard in making the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert, which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of three symphonies: Haydn's in D major, Mozart's in E flat, and Beethoven's first in C. They are all symphonies of the eighteenth century.

While Haydn's and Mozart's are works of their maturest periods, works that definitely declare their ultimate views and ideals as to symphonic composition, Beethoven's was composed while he was still under the influence of these older men, and had not yet disclosed his own individual style or moved on to the ideals that he established for the dawning of a new era in the new century.

The juxtaposition of three such symphonies cannot be considered a fortunate idea in the art of programme-making. If people went to symphony concerts for the study of musical history, which they do not, there was an opportunity for those who wished to do so to determine for themselves what the historians and historical critics have debated. Is the first symphony "Beethovenish" in originalty? Is it an imitation of Mozart? How far are Haydn and Mozart echoed in its themes, its general plan of development? Is it, as Columbani says, in Mr. Hale's quotation, a résumé of the past, or an original production of his genius? There seems hardly room for much debate, however plainly the claw of the lion may occasionally be visible in passages that neither Haydn nor Mozart would have written.

Whether or not many of Dr. Muck's listeners concerned themselves with these questions last evening, most of them probably felt a sense of monotony in listening to works of so nearly the same style, one after another, without relief. They could enjoy a performance so vigorous and vital, so rhythmically incisive, so beautifully proportioned, so finished in detail, so finely euphonious as the orchestra gave under his direction.

But they doubtless wished that Dr. Muck was a little less relentless in the exemplification of his principles: or that his principles took a little more account of an aesthetic hunger for contest and differentiation.

They may have rejoiced in the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart and in Beethoven's first. Not one of them has been seriously touched by the tooth of time, or is invalidated by the perspective of the twentieth century. But they do not belong all together on one programme.

[4]

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Orchestra Plays French Novelty.

The programme of the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday afternoon was made up of three numbers—César Franck's Symphony in D minor; a novelty, "La tragédie de Salomé," by Florent Schmitt, in two parts, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish themes.

It seems a singular thing that when Franck's symphony was first performed in 1889 it should have been a puzzle to some listeners, for to our sophisticated ears its harmonic masses, and its thematic material seem perfectly normal. One always feels in listening to his music a lofty purpose—one might almost say a semi-religious solemnity—in his attitude toward his work; but, splendid as are some of the massive orchestral effects which Franck creates, his melodic invention is not of striking originality. No doubt he would have been greatly surprised could he have realized that his symphony is largely based on themes from Liszt's "Les Préludes," that Wagner's works, especially "Parsifal," constantly colored his thoughts, and that one of the chief melodies of his symphony is surprisingly like Grieg. Even if he had little melodic vein himself, he had the taste to study men who had it in a marked degree.

Of the second number on the programme one cannot say that, like the symphony, it is noble and lofty in tone. Florent Schmitt having selected the noisome subject of Salome, and Robert d'Humières having added sundry indecent embellishments to the story, the composer proceeds to try to illustrate it in tones. Fortunately, music is unable to convey such things unaided. Without a clew one would simply wonder what all the noise was about. Mr. Schmitt no doubt hoped to enrich the world by the adaptation of his original work (a mute drama in two acts and seven scenes) to concert performance, but without a dancer it is imcomprehensible. The first "dance of the pearls," where Salome is supposed to dance "with a childish joy," is as frenzied as the later objectionable ones, when nature comes to the rescue and pours volcanic fires on her head. Schmitt has complete command of all the modern color effects for the orchestra, and an occasional interesting moment is the result, the use of muted brasses played fortissimo producing an uncommon effect. The opening measures of the second part, which picture the "enchantments of the sea," have descriptive value, but the general effect is that of a deafening charivari. The orchestra played it with splendid virtuosity, of course, but it seemed hardly worth the trouble. There was almost no applause for either movement.

The concert closed with the Russian work referred to. It came as a welcome contrast to the French novelty, which affected one like a nightmare after listening to Strauss's novelty. Rimsky-Korsakoff's composition was played here a few weeks ago by the Philharmonic in splendidly virile fashion. If there was less red blood in it on Saturday, it nevertheless was played with consummate finish, and came as an appropriate close to a concert chiefly notable for its display of orchestral technique.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9

Concert of Boston Symphony Heard

DR. MUCK was consistently classic in making the programme for last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Carnegie Hall. But three names appeared in the composers' column—Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—all masters, who lived in about the same period, yet each an individualist in style and treatment, and each was represented by a symphony.

First on the programme was Haydn's D major symphony, one of the most melodious and fluent works by that versatile and tireless composer. The charming moods and measures were interpreted with graciousness, appropriate emphasis and faultless blending of tone.

The E flat symphony by Mozart next claimed the attention of the large and distinguished audience. After listening to the Boston Orchestra's masterly reading of the score one can understand this symphony's position among the greatest of Mozart's writings.

Beethoven's C major symphony (No. 1) closed the concert. In outline, scope and melodic material the Beethoven number bore considerable resemblance to the Mozart work. Yet the first-named composition carried a dignity and depth that characterize the writings of Beethoven.

EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 12 1914

Music.

"Salome" at a Boston Symphony Concert—Other Musical Matters.

Dr. Muck turned from the austere classicism of his Thursday night programme to offer modern music to the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. César Franck's symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" are still modern music, though the former is now twenty-five years old and the latter twenty-seven. They formed respectively the opening and the closing items of the programme Saturday. Between them came "La Tragédie de Salomé," a much more recent work, by Florent Schmitt, born in Lorraine of Alsatian parents, and prominent among the younger French composers. The performance was the first in New York.

Richard Strauss's superb setting of Oscar Wilde's "Salome" is unfortunately not now heard in our town, though the Metropolitan Opera Company has the means to give it a splendid production. However, there is no need of going into that matter here and wasting time and strength in vain lamentations. It is more to the point to inquire whether "La Tragédie de Salomé" for orchestra, after a poem by Robert d'Humières, by Florent Schmitt fills a long felt want.

The Schmitt affair has nothing to do with the Wilde play. It had its inception in music he composed for a "mute drama" by Robert d'Humières performed for the first time at the Théâtre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. It is interesting to note that the part of Salomé was taken by Loie Fuller, who danced the dance of pearls, the dance of the peacock, the dance of serpents, the dance of steel, the dance of silver, and the dance of fear. The orchestra at the Théâtre des Arts was too small to realize Schmitt's ideal, so he amplified the score, putting together several episodes so as to form a suite in two parts for concert use. This was performed at a Colonne concert in Paris on Jan. 2, 1911, under the direction of Gabriel Pierné. The Russian Ballet later took up the work and the famous Karsavina has done Salomé.

The first section of the concert suite consists of a prelude representing the terrace of Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Sea, the surrounding landscape at sunset, and a slow promenade of John the Baptist across the stage, followed by the dance of pearls. The second section begins with the "Enchantments on the Sea." The five engulfed cities are dimly seen beneath the waves. "Old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion." Dance measures are heard, a voice rises from the depths, Herod is overcome, thunder rolls, Salome begins to dance, Herod starts to [illegible] feet. Then follows the dance of the lightnings. Herod pursues Salome amid the flashes and plucks the veils from off her. John suddenly steps forward and covers her with his cloak. Herodias points out John to the executioner. Holding the head in a charger, Salome at first dances, then casts the charger into the sea, which straightway turns to the color of blood. All except Salome flee in terror, but she is dazed by a vision of the heads rising about her everywhere. The dance of fear concludes the matter, danced amid a general cataclysm of nature.

Schmitt's music is modern in the fullest sense of the term, modern in harmonic daring, modern in orchestration. It unquestionably produced an effect on Saturday, but with this effect went the impression one could not escape that it is realistic music, music of the scene, which in this concert suite loses something essential that only the theatrical representation can impart. Interesting as the Schmitt music is, it does not quite stand alone.

Of course the orchestra played it magnificently. But so did the orchestra play the great symphony of Franck, which sounded ineffably beautiful as the men from Boston proclaimed its glories. Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice is just a little light for a symphony concert, but Dr. Muck conducted it as if he holds it in special affection.

JAN 9 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Evening Devoted to Three Contemporaneous Works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted its concert of last night to three symphonies, one by Haydn, one by Mozart and the other by Beethoven. As the Beethoven symphony was his first, the period of the three works were very close.

This gave a sense of monotony to the evening, though it should be said that the execution of the programme was perfection.

TIME TABLE 7:45
rture 7:53
Opera ....

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 10 1914

FOUR OLD MASTERS IN THIS PROGRAMME

Classic Delights of Boston Symphony Featured by Harp and Flute Concerto.

HAYDN'S 'SURPRISE' PLAYED

Mozart, Handel and Beethoven the Others Represented.

Everyone whose taste in art may justly be termed old-fashioned was present, in spirit at least, at the opera house of the Academy of Music last evening. There the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of its series of philharmonic concerts in this borough, playing a programme of four names—Haydn, Mozart, Handel, Beethoven. It was an artistic menu that might be characterized as strictly classical, were it not that the word to many implies scholarly severity, even austerity, a frowning disapproval of modern vagaries. The programme was not one designed to attract only the student; it abounded in music that charmed, music that lulled or swayed the emotions, and quaint conceits to coax forth the indulgent smile.

It may be that in drawing respectful attention to the Old Masters Dr. Muck was making amends for some of his previous examples of programme building, especially, perhaps, for that of the last preceding concert here, when the audience was asked to listen to Kreisler in a Tschaikowsky concerto directly after the startling "Salome" of Schmitt. Last night there were no sensations, no experiments, just the tried and true companions of everybody's musical boyhood, and if these four must be judged by the examples of Dr. Muck's programme, surely it must be agreed that the greatest of these is Mozart.

The genius of Salzburg was represented by a concerto for flute and harp. Incidentally, here was another sop to the old-fashioned—calling upon the ranks of the orchestra to furnish the evening's soloists. There are many who argue, and with apparent logic, that the greatest aggregation of instrumental specialists in the world should need no outside assistance in presenting a two-hour entertainment. So Alfred Holy, the orchestra's new harpist, seated himself at the front of the platform, and beside him stood Andre Maquarre, flutist, and with an instrumental lattice-work background by their fellow Bostonians played this genuinely inspired piece. One might well say that in the warmth and sincere eloquence of the orchestral voices as revealed in the Mozart concerto the height of musical charm is reached. The chronic concert-goer must surely have marveled at the degree of perfection attained by Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Holy and their accompanying colleagues. Beside the lofty plane of this performance all readings and interpretations of tone-paintings and flights of up-to-date fancy tumble down like so many spent rockets.

These are the two so-called liquid voices of the orchestral chorus. The characterization was very apt last night. Mr. Holy's harp sent forth a spray of crisp, clear, keen staccato notes—the whole a cascade of continuous flow, yet each as distinct and cleanly cut as a single captive raindrop. The flute was the other sort of "musical liquid"—the ever-moving, peaceable brook. And when the second number, an andantino, was reached, Mr. Maquarre's instrument converted the melting love melody, unmistakably Italian in its inspiration, into the closest resemblance to a human voice that one may expect to hear from a mechanical source. One might well have visualized Mr. Bonci singing "O Mio Dolce Ardor." This number abounded in dialogues and quaint "close harmonies" for the solo instruments. The blending was a delight; the technique of the artists thoroughly good.

Haydn's "surprise" symphony

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 4

Prelude.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert in Philadelphia tomorrow (Monday) evening, January 5th, in the Academy of Music at 8:15. The soloist will be that superb artist, Madame Teresa Carreno, who a fortnight ago appeared with such brilliant success with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

In working out his general schemes of programs for Boston and other cities where the Orchestra gives a series of concerts, Dr. Muck makes a general plan of alternating modern with classic programs. Last time he gave the great Mahler Symphony in Philadelphia. This time his program will be purely classic. It begins with Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 6, the "Paukenschlag" or "Surprise" Symphony. This will be followed by Mozart's Symphony in E flat Major, the third of the great group, the others of which are the Symphonies in C Major and G Minor. The second part of the program will have only one number, Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto in E Flat Major, No. 5 for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

* * *

Est 1884

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 6 191

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mme. Carreno Soloist in a Delightfully Played Classical Program

HAVING presented several ultra-modern compositions upon his visit here four weeks ago, Dr. Karl Muck swung to the opposite pole at the Academy of Music last night and conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a rigidly classical program consisting of two symphonies—Haydn's G major and Mozart's E-flat major—and Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. Whatever of contrast or variety may have been lacking was amply atoned for by the excellent playing of these old works of inspiration whose beauty has stood the test of time and been proof against the confusing vagaries of musical taste. A large audience, relieved of the necessity of making painful efforts to comprehend, sat comfortably through the evening in manifest delight.

Mme Carreno, who has recently been heard here with the Philadelphia Orchestra and in an excellent concert given by the Young Men's Hebrew Association, once more proved that she is a pianiste who is true to her art—an art that 's aristocratic in spirit without sacrificing its intensity of feeling. She gave a poetical and sympathetic reading of the difficult "Emperor" concerto, developing its many beauties with tender and careful solicitude. Her tone was invariably rich and her control of dynamics masterly. There never was a moment when the brilliant player seemed to be trying to get the better of the artist, and, though the trills and arpeggios fell from her fingers with limpid clarity and amazing facility, she was evidently more absorbed in filling her function as an interpreter of a great work of art than in winning admiration for her mere dexterity. This unfailing restraint made her playing of the graceful allegro and the deeply-thoughtful adagio achievements of unusual beauty, though it prevented her, perhaps, from giving the final movement that touch of grandeur or power which it seems to require. In piano playing, however, under-emphasis is much to be preferred to its noisy alternative. By some strange oversight the piano seemed not to have been adequately tuned, and this fact may have influenced Mme. Carreno to forego giving emphasis which could only have served to exaggerate the instrument's defects.

The two symphonies were played with that finished perfection which distinguishes all the work of the Boston musicians. The naive measures of Haydn were given with buoyant abandon. Just before the thunder-stroke of the Andante which Papa Haydn introduced, as he said, to "shock the ladies," Dr. Muck reduced his strings to the merest audible whisper, so that when the crashing chord came it was indeed a surprise and one so humorous in its playful contrast that the audience laughed in merriment. From the elementary playfulness of Haydn the orchestra swung with easy transition into the more intricate measures of the Mozart work, which was read with full appreciation of its inspired beauty. The whole concert was a refreshing return to the old founts of musical inspiration after many confused and muddled wanderings among the moderns.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 11 1914

THERE is no doubt, none whatever, that the increase in price of admission to sittings for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn will be accepted without a murmur of objection. An increase in subscription prices for the season of 1913-1914 is very slight, when one concert at a time is considered, the increase being from 15 cents to 30 cents in the body of the house, and 50 cents for box sittings. The Boston Symphony concerts are musical events in which there is no reckoning as to cost, or there should be no reckoning, for the organization has no peer. Price is not to be considered when dealing with the various kinds of excellence abiding in the body of musicians, their instruments and with their admirable leader. Brooklyn music-lovers have not [illegible] slow to perceive the [illegible] that have [illegible] increase in [illegible]

k, 1884

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 10 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Academy of Music Crowded With Highly-Enthusiastic Audience.

Especially interesting to that minority of concertgoers, whose interest is more mental than emotional, was the classical programme offered last night by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. Haydn's Symphony in G major—popularly known as the Surprise—and Beethoven's No. 1 in C major, with Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, and Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras made up the programme.

The two symphonies, that of Hadyn representing him in the maturity of his powers as a composer, offers opportunity for contrast with Beethoven's first, which if revealing the influence of Mozart and Haydn is yet so eloquent in its foreshadowing of his remarkable use of instruments in his later orchestral works.

It is superfluous to dwell upon the beauty of the rendition of either, the perfect ensemble, the never failing delight of innumerable nuances, the finish, the precision, and the amazing homogenity of th orchestra. The Beethoven Symphony, in particular, was rendered with great freshness and spirit.

The great enthusiasm was aroused by the exquisite playing of Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp, with two members of the orchestra as soloists, Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Haly, harpist. To many the qualities of the flute as a solo instrument are comparatively unknown of the insuating charm revealed by M. Marquarre's playing too much can not be said in praise. Nor was Mr. Haly less happy. The general unfamiliarity of the work, piqued interest, the performance was a revelation. The demonstration of delight which greeted its exceptional performance was instant, unmistakable, and long continued. Handel's originality as an experimenter in the combination of instruments, was engagingly expressed in the Concerto F major for strings and two wind orchestra, brought as solo players, Anton Witek, violin, oboes, the Messrs. Longy and Mueller, and for the horns the Messrs. Wendler and Jaenicke. The composition with its intrinsic, if naive charm, and beautiful rendition, captured the audience and was heartily applauded.

From parquet to topmost gallery every seat was occupied.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, January 6, at 4:30, and the soloist will be that superb artist, Mme. Teresa Carreno. Mme. Carreno, from all accounts, is playing this year with all the fire and temperament that gave her a unique position among modern pianists, and her reappearance naturally will excite much interest among lovers of the best piano music.

The program will be to a certain extent classical. The first part will be devoted to Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major," the third of the great group of symphonies of this master, the other two of which are those in C major and G minor. The second part of the program comprises Brahms' splendid "Tragic Overture," Beethoven's "Emperor," concerto in E flat major, No. 5, and Wagner's overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

1884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date 914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM CLASSICAL

Third Concert, at New National on Tuesday, Will Have Carreno as Soloist.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will be the soloist, and her reapparance is a matter of much delight to music lovers.

The program will be classical to a certain extent. The first part will be devoted to Mozart's symphony in E flat major, the third of the group of symphonies of this master. The second part will comprise Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat major, No. 5, and Wagner's overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

The Rebew Orchestra, H. W. Weber, director, will give a public rehearsal in the lecture room of the Keller Memorial Church, corner of Ninth street and Maryland avenue northeast, on Monday evening, Miss Gertrude Garth, soprano, and George Ross, tenor, being the soloists.

Est 1884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

JAN

Esta 84

A novel piece written in these troublous musical times, easily comprehensible and readily pleasurable, is Juon's fantasy, "The Watchman's Song," played for the first time in Boston at a recent Symphony concert, and the honest work of a tranquil composer.

Of this the Boston Transcript says: "Once upon a time, Juon, sojourning in Copenhagen, heard the clock on the Town House tinkle out the quarter hours and swell into a little folk tune each time that the hands made full circle. Wandering about Denmark and turning the leaves of Danish song books, he discovered other folk tunes—Queen Dagmar's for example, and the knights as they rode through the forest. Good honest folk tunes, both untouched by northern bleakness or sadness—tunes that could be wrought into spirited and songful music, that could be rhythmed spiritedly, expanded into ample and climacteric voice duly robed in warm harmony and colorful instrumentation and yet remain tunes still.

"Out of the three with agreeable diversity of mood and expression, with ready resource and easy skill, he made his pleasant and a little homely fantasy. It would not be the truth to say that any high, fine or unusual invention and imagination distinguish it or that Juon has discovered any new artifices with harmonies and timbres. The chances are that he did not try to search out even one and that he let his fancy and his hand run their easy course. The outcome was an honest, transparent, homely and pleasurable piece of a sort that seldom finds a place in the Symphony concerts, though it deserves it on occasion, in spite of all the pressing classics, ancient and modern, and all the importunate experiments from Paris to Petersburg.

"Only the most austere and sublimated listeners—and they by no means always sincerely—care to be sitting incessantly in what they call "the high places." Juon's music was as pleasant as a homely and tranquil face in a press of anxious countenances, as homely talk in the midst of aesthetic gabble."

* * *

At the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall in New York next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist. The Thursday evening concert will be strictly classical, Dr. Muck electing to play three short symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. The Saturday afternoon programme will include Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor; Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes. Schmitt's "Salome" will be heard in New York for the first time.

TIMES
New York City
JAN 11 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Work by Florent Schmitt—Franck's Symphony Played.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was devoted to modern compositions—to César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Florent Schmitt's "La Tragédie de Salomé," and Rimsky Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes. Florent Schmitt's piece was played for the first time in New York, and it was the first of his music to be heard here. He is one of the modern school of France, 34 years old, a winner of the Grand Prix, and now one of those considered most recent, most modern in France. One of his biographers considers him to have a "classical turn of mind," finding the explanation for it in his Alsacian descent, while his French blood and French culture have prevented his originality from being "impaired by scholasticism."

In truth, not much impairment of this sort is to be observed in his "Salomé" music; his classicism and his originality may be more open to discussion. This "Salomé" is a suite derived from music written for a "mute drama," a pantomime, that was produced in Paris seven years ago. It is stage music, and in considering it as an interpretation of the scenario as given in the programme notes it is only fair to remember this. The suite is in two parts, the first being a prelude and the "Dance of Pearls," the second "The Enchantments of the Sea," "Dance of the Lightnings," and "Dance of Fear."

Schmitt writes, naturally, in the idiom that has been developed by the school of modern Frenchmen; an idiom that is still difficult for many listeners. And yet Schmitt is no follower of those who are regarded as the leaders of the French school; his music is a voice of his own. It appears, indeed, stronger in invention and in fibre than much that has recently came out of France. It depends less on mere color, instrumental and harmonic, although he makes the fullest use of such color. The prelude is one of the strongest passages of the work, evoking the sunset mood, a vision of the terrace of Herod's palace, the Dead Sea, the Moabite mountains. The "Dance of the Pearls" has a touch of the Orient in its intervals, and its involved rhythms, but it is scarcely of Oriental voluptuousness in its acid harmonies.

The "Enchantments of the Sea" and the "Dance of the Lightnings" and of "Fear," which make the second part, are concerned with various "demoniacal phantasmagoria" and portents of nature. The dance rhythm is less strongly marked; but the music is strangely complicated in changing, broken, and shifting rhythms of other sorts. The instrumental color is harsher and more violent. The illustrative quality of this suite throughout is more obvious than its value specifically as music. There are many interesting instrumental passages, although some would doubtless prefer, toward the end, less of the united horns and trumpets to which the modern French composers are so addicted. The Boston Orchestra, with this performance, did not succeed in securing a general agreement among its listeners as to the surpassing value of this composition. And yet the music made itself felt as a manifestation of something individual in modern French art.

César Franck's symphony, which preceded it, presented itself like a sound and sober classic. Its orchestration never sounded richer, more beautiful than in this performance; and its effective thematic development, the ingenious use of the device of "community of theme," "cyclical form" its admirers call it, was made to count for its utmost in Dr. Muck's exquisitely clear and illuminating delineation. The middle movement, the allegretto, has the purest musical beauty, and is founded upon the most original musical ideas. The material of the first movement seems now rather poverty-stricken, as well as borrowed; and at least one of the chief themes of the last, in the form in which it most frequently appears, grazes dangerously near the commonplace for those to whom this symphony is not an article of faith.

There was a brilliant close to the concert in Rimsky Korsakoff's Spanish caprice, heard for the third time in New York this season.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

BROOKLYN ED

Noted Harpist to Play Here for First Time

Alfred Holy Will Appear with Bosto Symphony at Academy.

Following his general scheme of ternating modern with classic programmes, Dr. Muck has arranged for the third Boston Symphony which will be given in the A of Music, Friday evening, gramme entirely classical strict sense of the word which contains many delights. The programme contains tw symphonies and two concerto first number will be Haydn's phony in G major, No. 6, "The Paukenschlag"; or, "Su Symphony. This is one of th delightful works of "Papa" This will be followed by M concerto for flute and harp, Maquarre playing the solo flute Alfred Holy the solo harp. This be Brooklyn's first opportunity hear Mr. Holy, who is generally knowledged to be one of the greatest harpists of the world.

The second half of the programme will be devoted to Handel's fascinating Concerto for strings and two wind chorus. The solo instruments in this will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes; and Mr. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns. The final number will be the Symphony, in C major, by Beethoven. This is the first of the "immortal" nine, and, while it is to a certain extent a reflection of Mozart and Haydn, yet the reflection is one of manner rather than one of matter. The spirit of the great Beethoven fills it throughout, although it is lighter by far than the great works that follow after.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914
Established

NEW "SALOME" ON PROGRAMME OF BOSTONIANS

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

As many New York concert-goers know, without my telling them, the composer, Florent Schmitt, is the "last shriek" in Paris music. Some seem to think that Schmitt has buried Debussy. That is not true. He has, however, carried on the work which made Debussy's name and fame.

Dr. Muck, who is in touch with modern, as well as classic, art, did very well indeed when he gave Schmitt a place in the latest New York programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Few works of such unusual and uncanny charm have been heard here as his "Tragedy of Salome," which was performed at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, between the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" (Op. 34) of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This "Salome" score was played for the first time about seven years ago at an interpretation of a tragic drama in dumb show, with dances by Loie Fuller, who had already appeared much earlier in Paris in another version of the same thrilling theme, devised by Armand Silvestre, Charles Henry Meltzer and Gabrill Pierne.

Deprived as it was of the stage pictures and stage characters, of which it was meant to be an adjunct, [illegible] the French compos [illegible] course, loses [illegible] tonians played it yesterday that it evoked forms and pictures.

M. d'Humieres, the author of the drama, did not stick closely to the Salome legend. He used his subject as a pretext for the creation of strange scenes and the introduction of fantastic dances. Among the latter are a "Dance of Pearls," a "Lightning Dance," and a "Dance of Fear." Visions and haunting fancies fill the play and are suggested in the score.

The composer is not more than half original. Like Herod and Salome, in the dumb drama, he is haunted, now by snatches of themes from "Parsifal" and "Rheingold," now by familiar passages from the works of Debussy. But if he has remembered something, he has created much. He has invented new orchestral combinations of much art and curious piquancy. He has put color and life and death into his score, which has the highest of the qualities that make art really art—the quality of imagination. Especially ingenious are the uses to which he puts the harp in various passages. Richard Strauss, we may be sure, did not omit to consult "The Tragedy of Salome" before writing his "Rosenkavalier."

Though very complex and studded in what, by the laws of harmony, are discords, Schmitt's music in this work neither hurts nor offends the ear. It abounds in daring rhythms and weird melodies. By comparison it made even the Franck symphony seem aged. Yet, five and twenty years ago the D minor of the great Belgian was

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 13
Establish

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN LIGHTER VEIN

Fritz Kreisler, Great Master of the Violin, Warmly Welcomed as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third appearance of the season here last evening before an audience that filled Infantry Hall. The programme was long, but of a rather lighter nature than any previously heard this year, and was received with a pleasure which was refreshing. The programme in detail was as follows:

Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B-minor: (I) Allegro moderato, (II) Andante con moto; Bizet, Suite No. 1, from the Music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne:" (I) Prelude, (II) Minuetto, (III) Adagietto, (IV) Carillon; Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys;" Brahms, Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, Op. 77: (I)Allegro non troppo, (II) Adagio, (III) Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

It was to the soloist of the evening that the audience gave most applause, and as that soloist was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of the masters of his instrument, the violin, there is no disparagement to the excellent playing of the orchestra in considering him first. It may be said frankly and at once that probably the majority of those present would have preferred to hear something other than the Brahms concerto, which while showing the composer's consummate workmanship, nevertheless leaves one cold as far as the music itself is concerned. Mr. Kreisler has been playing concertos by Mozart, Viotti and Tschaikowsky this season and indeed announced the Tschaikowsky concerto for his Providence appearance and he might have found something in his large repertoire more pleasing for an audience that will hear him only once this season.

However, Mr. Kreisler's playing is so faultless that it makes whatever he plays articulate and it was so last night. He gives life to every note. He combines with the perfect technique of his swift and accurate fingers a tone of thrilling purity and an emotion mastered by art. His prodigious skill is never allowed to exist for itself alone, but is rather concealed under his energy, grace and supple agility. One of the most noticeable characteristics of his work, is that Mr. Kreisler's sense of proportion is finer than that of most artists. A cadenza played by him becomes a link, a parenthesis, not an interruption, so clearly and delicately is it put in its proper place.

The Schubert Unfinished Symphony is one of the best known in the entire colleсtion ,and also one of the most enjoyable. It contains the bigness that is found in Schubert at his best and strongest. Schubert here expresses himself simply, but he does it on a large scale. He seems far more modern than any of his contemporaries and indeed the working out of this symphony is a strange foretaste of the third act of Wagner's "The Valkyrie," and contains an astounding freshness of invention. The exquisite unity of the two movements revents the realization to any extent of e impression conveyed by the title, unnished. The pure song of Schubert's elodies found a fine outlet last night, e strings responding to the lightness gravity required by the constantly hanging moods, and the wood-wind hoir full of character in each of its oices and yet mingled together in beauul tone.

he Bizet suite "L'Arlesienne," which as the second number on the proamme, is one of the best and most opular of concert pieces. It is thorghly fine and characteristic—in many ys finer than "Carmen"—and it was ceived with delight by last night's auence, particularly the Minuet, written Bizet's happiest vein of fresh animan. It must be admitted that the suite ls short of the dignity and grandeur style of the greatest masters even their merrier moods, but it is full of utmost warmth and picturesqueness.

he overture to the opera "Le Roi s" reveals Lalo at his best, for here seems to have at least some of the ength which is usually lacking in his rk. Although it does not reach the eshadowing dignity of the W [illegible] It is mo [illegible]

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 12 1914
Establi

DANCE MUSIC INVADES THE CONCERT HALL

When Papageno taps his little magic bells, the wirld dances; and conversely, it would seem, when the world dances, Papageno must play what the world would withal. The Punch-like spirit of music and laughter that the anciently lamented Herr Schikaneder poked into the wondrous plot of "Die Zauberfloete" may not be untypical of a certain spirit among some of the musicians and music-makers of the day to follow the foible of the day. So it was, perhaps, not altogether surprising to find the gyrations of the Salome of sensual romance delineated in a Boston Symphony concert and Mr. Harold Bauer playing a tango midway between Bach and Brahms to a quizzically pleased audience.

These things occurred as part of the music that, as usual, was poured forth on Saturday and Sunday. Dr. Karl Muck brought forth for its first hearing in New York Florent Schmitt's suite in two parts made from the music originally written for the mute drama, "La Tragedie de Salome," and this Boston Symphony audience that heard it in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon neither gasped nor gave other evidence of any shock to shrinking sensibilities. But concert audiences in New York are not given to indulgence in this sort of thing. A little more breathlessness at certain times would perhaps be a healthy symptom.

M. Schmitt's music was written for a pantomime that had little in common with the Oscar Wilde drame used by Richard Strauss for his opera. Loie Fuller enacted the Salome in this pantomime in Paris, and it may be said that Paris is probably the only city of western Europe where it could have been enacted. It was a matter of feet, flesh and music, according to all accounts thereof, and since the chief of these three exists and persists, there is no good reason why its truth should not be embodied in music as art of a sort. Any one may have his own opinion as to just how high in the scale of art this sort is.

But there is no question that this music of M. Schmitt discloses real mastery. It is somewhat difficult to follow on its delineative side, but it is genuinely creative of mood and it reveals originality in its means. Dr. Muck and his men played this music with superb skill. Cesar Franck's symphony and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Capriccio Espagnole" were the other numbers on the programme.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 10 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third of the Season Is Given at the Academy of Music.

Estab 84

Classical severity and somewhat of a sameness in the programme soothed tradition lovers among the fashionable audience in the opera house, Academy of Music, last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the evening there.

Modernists, however, became a little tired before the last number, Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, was finished, and some left before it was over.

Hadyn's Symphony in G major, opus N. 6, opened the evening's entertainment. This is the "surprise" symphony, and is usually regarded as having dramatic qualities. Hadyn, it is said, bored by having to play to tired duchesses and sleepy squires, wrote this work, introducing fortissimo explosions after pianissimo effects, in order to waken his audience.

So tempered, however, were the "surprises," as executed last night, that they would certainly have failed to make a sleepy sparrow stir, let alone a somnolent duchess. The andante movement the second—was splendidly executed, as, in fact, was every number played. Dr. Muck conducted with seemingly studied calmness and rigidity.

The treat of the evening was Mozart's concerto for flute and harp—soloists, Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. The performance of these artists was beyond criticism. Their art was only circumscribed by the exigencies of the composition, which was written before the double-action harp pedal was invented, and consequently lacks tonal shading.

The adherence of the entire organization to works unadapted to a complete modern orchestra is a disadvantage to which it constantly subpects itself.

Handel's concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments, was finely played. The soloists were: Violin, Mr. Witek; oboes, Messrs. Longy and Mueller; horns, Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence,
Date JAN
Esta

A novel piece written in these musical times, easily comprehen[sible,] readily pleasurable, is Juon's "The Watchman's Song," played first time in Boston at a recent [Sym]phony concert, and the honest work [of a] tranquil composer.

Of this the Boston Transcript sa[ys:]

"Once upon a time, Juon, sojourning in Copenhagen, heard the clock on the Town House tinkle out the quarter hours and swell into a little folk tune each time that the hands made full circle. Wandering about Denmark and turning the leaves of Danish song books, he discovered other folk tunes—Queen Dagmar's for example, and the knights as they rode through the forest. Good honest folk tunes, both untouched by northern bleakness or sadness—tunes that could be wrought into spirited and songful music, that could be rhythmed spiritedly, expanded into ample and climacteric voice duly robed in warm harmony and colorful instrumentation and yet remain tunes still.

"Out of the three with agreeable diversity of mood and expression, with ready resource and easy skill, he made his pleasant and a little homely fantasy. It would not be the truth to say that any high, fine or unusual invention and imagination distinguish it or that Juon has discovered any new artifices with harmonies and timbres. The chances are that he did not try to search out even one and that he let his fancy and his hand run their easy course. The outcome was an honest, transparent, homely and pleasurable piece of a sort that seldom finds a place in the Symphony concerts, though it deserves it on occasion, in spite of all the pressing classics, ancient and modern, and all the importunate experiments from Paris to Petersburg.

"Only the most austere and sublimated listeners—and they by no means always sincerely—care to be sitting incessantly in what they call "the high places." Juon's music was as pleasant as a homely and tranquil face in a press of anxious countenances, as homely talk in the midst of aesthetic gabble."

* * *

At the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall in New York next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist. The Thursday evening concert will be strictly classical, Dr. Muck electing to play three short symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. The Saturday afternoon programme will include Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor; Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes. Schmitt's "Salome" will be heard in New York for the first time.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date JAN

BROOKLYN ED

Noted Harpist to Play Here for First Time

Alfred Holy Will Appear with Boston Symphony at Academy.

Following his general scheme of alternating modern with classic programmes, Dr. Muck has arranged for the third Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, a programme entirely classical in the strict sense of the word and one which contains many delights.

The programme contains two short symphonies and two concertos. The first number will be Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 6, called "The Paukenschlag"; or, "Surprise" Symphony. This is one of the most delightful works of "Papa" Haydn. This will be followed by Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Mr. Maquarre playing the solo flute and Alfred Holy the solo harp. This will be Brooklyn's first opportunity to hear Mr. Holy, who is generally acknowledged to be one of the greatest harpists of the world.

The second half of the programme will be devoted to Handel's fascinating Concerto for strings and two wind chorus. The solo instruments in this will be Mr. Witek, violin; Messrs. Longy and Mueller, oboes; and Mr. Wendler and Jaennicke, horns. The final number will be the Symphony, in C major, by Beethoven. This is the first of the "immortal" nine, and, while it is to a certain extent a reflection of Mozart and Haydn, yet the reflection is one of manner rather than one of matter. The spirit of the great Beethoven fills it throughout, although it is lighter by far than the great works that follow after.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1914
Establishe

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Work by Florent Schmitt—Franck's Symphony Played.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was devoted to modern compositions—to César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Florent Schmitt's "La Tragédie de Salomé," and Rimsky Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes. Florent Schmitt's piece was played for the first time in New York, and it was the first of his music to be heard here. He is one of the modern school of France, 34 years old, a winner of the Grand Prix, and now one of those considered most recent, most modern in France. One of his biographers considers him to have a "classical turn of mind," finding the explanation for it in his Alsacian descent, while his French blood and French culture have prevented his originality from being "impaired by scholasticism."

In truth, not much impairment of this sort is to be observed in his "Salomé" music; his classicism and his originality may be more open to discussion. This "Salomé" is a suite derived from music written for a "mute drama," a pantomime, that was produced in Paris seven years ago. It is stage music, and in considering it as an interpretation of the scenario as given in the programme notes it is only fair to remember this. The suite is in two parts, the first being a prelude and the "Dance of Pearls," the second "The Enchantments of the Sea," "Dance of the Lightnings," and "Dance of Fear."

Schmitt writes, naturally, in the idiom that has been developed by the school of modern Frenchmen; an idiom that is still difficult for many listeners. And yet Schmitt is no follower of those who are regarded as the leaders of the French school; his music is a voice of his own. It appears, indeed, stronger in invention and in fibre than much that has recently came out of France. It depends less on mere color, instrumental and harmonic, although he makes the fullest use of such color. The prelude is one of the strongest passages of the work, evoking the sunset mood, a vision of the terrace of Herod's palace, the Dead Sea, the Moabite mountains. The "Dance of the Pearls" has a touch of the Orient in its intervals, and its involved rhythms, but it is scarcely of Oriental voluptuousness in its acid harmonies.

The "Enchantments of the Sea" and the "Dance of the Lightnings" and of "Fear," which make the second part, are concerned with various "demoniacal phantasmagoria" and portents of nature. The dance rhythm is less strongly marked; but the music is strangely complicated in changing, broken, and shifting rhythms of other sorts. The instrumental color is harsher and more violent. The illustrative quality of this suite throughout is more obvious than its value specifically as music. There are many interesting instrumental passages, although some would doubtless prefer, toward the end, less of the united horns and trumpets to which the modern French composers are so addicted. The Boston Orchestra, with this performance, did not succeed in securing a general agreement among its listeners as to the surpassing value of this composition. And yet the music made itself felt as a manifestation of something individual in modern French art.

César Franck's symphony, which preceded it, presented itself like a sound and sober classic. Its orchestration never sounded richer, more beautiful than in this performance; and its effective thematic development, the ingenious use of the device of "community of theme," "cyclical form," its admirers call it, was made to count for its utmost in Dr. Muck's exquisitely clear and illuminating delineation. The middle movement, the allegretto, has the purest musical beauty, and is founded upon the most original musical ideas. The material of the first movement seems now rather poverty-stricken, as well as borrowed; and at least one of the chief themes of the last, in the form in which it most frequently appears, grazes dangerously near the commonplace for those to whom the symphony is not an article of faith. [Th]e[re] was a brilliant close to the con[cert.] Rimsky Korsakoff's Spanish [Caprice was] heard for the third time in New [York th]is season.

[AM]ERICAN
[N]ew York City.
JAN 11 1914

NEW "SALOME" ON PROGRAMME OF BOSTONIANS

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

As many New York concert-goers know, without my telling them, the composer, Florent Schmitt, is the "last shriek" in Paris music. Some seem to think that Schmitt has buried Debussy. That is not true. He has, however, carried on the work which made Debussy's name and fame.

Dr. Muck, who is in touch with modern, as well as classic, art, did very well indeed when he gave Schmitt a place in the latest New York programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Few works of such unusual and uncanny charm have been heard here as his "Tragedy of Salome," which was performed at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, between the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck and the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" (Op. 34) of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This "Salome" score was played for the first time about seven years ago at an interpretation of a tragic drama in dumb show, with dances by Loie Fuller, who had already appeared much earlier in Paris in another version of the same thrilling theme, devised by Armand Silvestre, Charles Henry Meltzer and Gabriel Pierne.

Deprived as it was of the stage pictures and stage characters, of which it was meant to be an adjunct, [illegible] the French compos[er] [illegible]

[illegible] tonians played it yesterday that it evoked forms and pictures.

M. d'Humieres, the author of the drama, did not stick closely to the Salome legend. He used his subject as a pretext for the creation of strange scenes and the introduction of fantastic dances. Among the latter are a "Dance of Pearls," a "Lightning Dance," and a "Dance of Fear." Visions and haunting fancies fill the play and are suggested in the score.

The composer is not more than half original. Like Herod and Salome, in the dumb drama, he is haunted, now by snatches of themes from "Parsifal" and "Rheingold," now by familiar passages from the works of Debussy. But if he has remembered something, he has created much. He has invented new orchestral combinations of much art and curious piquancy. He has put color and life and death into his score, which has the highest of the qualities that make art really art—the quality of imagination. Especially ingenious are the uses to which he puts the harp in various passages. Richard Strauss, we may be sure, did not omit to consult "The Tragedy of Salome" before writing his "Rosenkavalier."

Though very complex and studded in what, by the laws of harmony, are discords, Schmitt's music in this work neither hurts nor offends the ear. It abounds in daring rhythms and weird melodies. By comparison it made even the Franck symphony seem aged. Yet, five and twenty years ago the D minor of the great Belgian was

---

TRIBUNE
[Addr]ess: Providence, R. I.
[D]ate 13
Establish

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN LIGHTER VEIN

Fritz Kreisler, Great Master of the Violin, Warmly Welcomed as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third appearance of the season here last evening before an audience that filled Infantry Hall. The programme was long, but of a rather lighter nature than any previously heard this year, and was received with a pleasure which was refreshing. The programme in detail was as follows:

Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B-minor: (I) Allegro moderato, (II) Andante con moto; Bizet, Suite No. 1, from the Music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne:" (I) Prelude, (II) Minuetto, (III) Adagietto, (IV) Carillon; Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys;" Brahms, Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, Op. 77: (I)Allegro non troppo, (II) Adagio, (III) Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

It was to the soloist of the evening that the audience gave most applause, and as that soloist was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest of the masters of his instrument, the violin, there is no disparagement to the excellent playing of the orchestra in considering him first. It may be said frankly and at once that probably the majority of those present would have preferred to hear something other than the Brahms concerto, which while showing the composer's consummate workmanship, nevertheless leaves one cold as far as the music itself is concerned. Mr. Kreisler has been playing concertos by Mozart, Viotti and Tschaikowsky this season and indeed announced the Tschaikowsky concerto for his Providence appearance and he might have found something in his large repertoire more pleasing for an audience that will hear him only once this season.

However, Mr. Kreisler's playing is so faultless that it makes whatever he plays articulate and it was so last night. He gives life to every note. He combines with the perfect technique of his swift and accurate fingers a tone of thrilling purity and an emotion mastered by art. His prodigious skill is never allowed to exist for itself alone, but is rather concealed under his energy, grace and supple agility. One of the most noticeable characteristics of his work, is that Mr. Kreisler's sense of proportion is finer than that of most artists. A cadenza played by him becomes a link, a parenthesis, not an interruption, so clearly and delicately is it put in its proper place.

The Schubert Unfinished Symphony is one of the best known in the entire collecftion ,and also one of the most enjoyable. It contains the bigness that is found in Schubert at his best and strongest. Schubert here expresses himself simply, but he does it on a large scale. He seems far more modern than any of his contemporaries and indeed the working out of this symphony is a strange foretaste of the third act of Wagner's "The Valkyrie," and contains an astounding freshness of invention. The exquisite unity of the two movements [p]revents the realization to any extent of [th]e impression conveyed by the title, un[fi]nished. The pure song of Schubert's [m]elodies found a fine outlet last night, [t]he strings responding to the lightness [or] gravity required by the constantly [c]hanging moods, and the wood-wind [c]hoir full of character in each of its [v]oices and yet mingled together in beautiful tone.

The Bizet suite "L'Arlesienne," which [w]as the second number on the pro[gr]amme, is one of the best and most [po]pular of concert pieces. It is thor[ou]ghly fine and characteristic—in many [w]ays finer than "Carmen"—and it was [re]ceived with delight by last night's au[di]ence, particularly the Minuet, written [in] Bizet's happiest vein of fresh anima[tio]n. It must be admitted that the suite [fa]lls short of the dignity and grandeur [of] style of the greatest masters even [in] their merrier moods, but it is full of [th]e utmost warmth and picturesqueness.

The overture to the opera "Le Roi [d'Y]s" reveals Lalo at his best, for here [he] seems to have at least some of the [str]ength which is usually lacking in his [wo]rk. Although it does not reach the [for]eshadowing dignity of the W[agner] [illegible] It is mo[re] [illegible]

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 12 1914
Establi

DANCE MUSIC INVADES THE CONCERT HALL

When, Papageno taps his little magic bells, the wirld dances; and conversely, it would seem, when the world dances, Papageno must play what the world would withal. The Punch-like spirit of music and laughter that the anciently lamented Herr Schikaneder poked into the wondrous plot of "Die Zauberfloete" may not be untypical of a certain spirit among some of the musicians and music-makers of the day to follow the foible of the day. So it was, perhaps, not altogether surprising to find the gyrations of the Salome of sensual romance delineated in a Boston Symphony concert and Mr. Harold Bauer playing a tango midway between Bach and Brahms to a quizzically pleased audience.

These things occurred as part of the music that, as usual, was poured forth on Saturday and Sunday. Dr. Karl Muck brought forth for its first hearing in New York Florent Schmitt's suite in two parts made from the music originally written for the mute drama, "La Tragedie de Salome," and this Boston Symphony audience that heard it in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon neither gasped nor gave other evidence of any shock to shrinking sensibilities. But concert audiences in New York are not given to indulgence in this sort of thing. A little more breathlessness at certain times would perhaps be a healthy symptom.

M. Schmitt's music was written for a pantomime that had little in common with the Oscar Wilde drame used by Richard Strauss for his opera. Loie Fuller enacted the Salome in this pantomime in Paris, and it may be said that Paris is probably the only city of western Europe where it could have been enacted. It was a matter of feet, flesh and music, according to all accounts thereof, and since the chief of these three exists and persists, there is no good reason why its truth should not be embodied in music as art of a sort. Any one may have his own opinion as to just how high in the scale of art this sort is.

But there is no question that this music of M. Schmitt discloses real mastery. It is somewhat difficult to follow on its delineative side, but it is genuinely creative of mood and it reveals originality in its means. Dr. Muck and his men played this music with superb skill. Cesar Franck's symphony and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Capriccio Espagnole" were the other numbers on the programme.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 10 1914
Estab 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third of the Season Is Given at the Academy of Music.

Classical severity and somewhat of a sameness in the programme soothed tradition lovers among the fashionable audience in the opera house, Academy of Music, last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the evening there.

Modernists, however, became a little tired before the last number, Beethoven's First Symphony in C major, was finished, and some left before it was over.

Hadyn's Symphony in G major, opus N. 6, opened the evening's entertainment. This is the "surprise" symphony, and is usually regarded as having dramatic qualities. Hadyn, it is said, bored by having to play to tired duchesses and sleepy squires, wrote this work, introducing fortissimo explosions after pianissimo effects, in order to waken his audience.

So tempered, however, were the "surprises," as executed last night, that they would certainly have failed to make a sleepy sparrow stir, let alone a somnolent duchess. The andante movement the second—was splendidly executed, as, in fact, was every number played. Dr. Muck conducted with seemingly studied calmness and rigidity.

The treat of the evening was Mozart's concerto for flute and harp—soloists, Andre Maquarre, flute, and Alfred Holy, harp. The performance of these artists was beyond criticism. Their art was only circumscribed by the exigencies of the composition, which was written before the double-action harp pedal was invented, and consequently lacks tonal shading.

The adherence of the entire organization to works unadapted to a complete modern orchestra is a disadvantage to which it constantly subjects itself.

Handel's concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments, was finely played. The soloists were: Violin, Mr. Witek; oboes, Messrs. Longy and Mueller; horns, Messrs. Wendler and Jaennicke.

[96]

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third symphony concert of the Washington season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Mme. Teresa Carreno, the famous pianist, as soloist. Mme. Carreno played Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto. The symphony of the afternoon was Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major." Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" completed the program. A large and distinguished audience included Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice President.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two Symphonies and Pianoforte Concerto Make Up the Program

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before one of those crowded audiences which it habitually attracts, seems to have a penchant for eccentric programs. It will be remembered that his last month's arrangement consisted of just two numbers, one of them being the late Gutave Mahler's symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor, whose performance occupied nearly an hour and a half, and the other Brahms' violin concerto. Last night what the orchestra played consisted of two symphonies, the one by Mozart in E flat, containing the familiar minuet, and the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn.

This was a change with a vengeance for anything more different from Mahler's turgid, complicated, pretentious and bombastic score, with its constant straining after effect and its intolerable prolixity, than the sincere, spontaneous, pellucid and melodious music of Haydn and Mozart is with difficulty imaginable. The contrast presented was noteworthy and remarkable, and it may be suspected that a majority of listeners derived more pleasure and a greater profit from the familiar classic scores than from the music that was inflicted upon them a month ago. [illegible] admirably both symp[illegible] wer[illegible] need hardly be said. Th[illegible] wer[illegible] ven with the utmost brillianc[illegible] and [illegible]inement and with an artistic ap[illegible] prec[illegible]tion of their idiosyncracies whic[illegible] quite excluded any such over accentuation as the modern orchestra invites.

The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno, whose interpretation of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, in breadth and power and dignity, in elevation of sentiment, in technical proficiency and in a kind of virivile strength not readily associated with the feminity of the performer, was greatly enjoyed and deservedly applauded. Mme. Carreno has occupied a front place among contempora[illegible] pianists for more years than it would be polite to recall, and she never played better, with a more masterful execution or a more communicative emotion, than she is playing now. Her presentation of the "Emperor" was a very great achievement, and Dr. Muck supplied an accompaniment which in its plasticity, mobility and expression left nothing to be desired.

Off for Europe

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 7, at 8:15. There will be but two numbers on the program —a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Madame Terese Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto in B Flat Major, No. 5. The first part of the program will be devoted to Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, No. 2. He is the only great composer succeeding Tschaiskowsky.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 3 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 7, at 8:15. T[illegible]re will be but two numbers on the program, a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto in E flat major, No. 5.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date JAN 11 1914

MODERN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Audience Listens to Three Compositions by Writers of Inferior Merit.

LET OUT TO TEDIOUS LENGTH

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

What is a poor child of nature to make of the concert given yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall; in which the audience had to listen to three modern compositions by writers who have no claim to be admitted to the front rank?

The afternoon of music began with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D, of which Gounod remarked severely but justly that it was "the affirmation of incompetency pushed to dogmatic lengths."

And I think I know what Gounod meant, for from the beginning of this symphony to the end there is hardly a passage written from the heart to the heart. Hardly a passage, with the exception of the beginning of the allegretto, which appeals even to one's musical sense of the picturesque. And, oh! the length, the discursiveness and the garrulity of the first movement. Surely all that was said could have been said in less tedious time.

So much of it was purely music-making, writing for the sake of writing, and wire-drawing of ideas.

"Tregedie de Salome."

Then came Florent Schmitt's "Tragedie de Salome," for orchestra, after a poem by Robert Humieres. The poem was Englished in the programme and the translation gave us some idea of M. Schmitt's intentions. Once again it was proved that lengthiness is one of the ingredients of modern music. Length of itself has no artistic value. If it had, why not start a craze for painting pictures many yards long, or writing epics in forty-eight books, thus doubling Homer? To the protest of the afflicted you can always answer, "Well, that's the way I feel it."

The relation between the poem and M. Schmitt's music was not very clear. The poem was a revamping of all the old Salome pseudo-Oriental stuff of which Oscar Wilde, Massenet and Strauss have given us our fill, until we are nauseated with their morbid, supersensual and unwarranted expansion of the austerely laconic but wonderfully dramatic story told in the Scriptures, upon which none of them have improved.

Storm, Shiver and Quiver.

M. Schmitt's music is simply storm, shiver, quiver and stress, bathing us in a musical liquid so acrid, unnatural and exotic that we longed to put our heads under a musical pump and have a few quarts of the tonic chord of C major poured benevolently over them.

Young critics are warned never to prophesy. I shall be incautious enough to violate the wholesome rule. Schmitt and Franck will be listened to with pleasure when Beethoven and Brahms are forgotten, but not till then.

We enjoyed a serener and humaner atmosphere when Rinsky Korsakoff was set forth.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Mme. Carreno as Soloist Adds to Delight of Perfect Ensemble.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, was heard in its third concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the celebrated pianiste, Mme. Teresa Carreno, as soloist. The severely classic spirit predominated in the program, the formal elegance of pure musical tone.

A perfection of control and exquisite beauty in each detail, each phrase, characterized the E flat major symphony of Mozart, which seems a composition designed preeminently for the strings, although in the andante the alternate work of strings and winds were contrasted charmingly, as was the very lovely song of the minue[illegible]. The spirit of the finale was jo[illegible] with perfect in the different parts, withal crisp attack, fine shading, and very musical in interpretation.

The opening theme of the Brahm's "Tragic" overture was dir[illegible]ect and dramatic, followed by anothe[illegible]r theme of really intense beauty. Ye[illegible]t, despite its name, it seemed the wor[illegible]k of [illegible] classicist, chaste and exquisite[illegible], r[illegible] passioned.

Madame Carreno returns to us [illegible] the poise of a mature artist. It is to be regretted that she did not choose the romantic type of composition which is so intimately a part of her temperament, for in the Beethoven E flat major concerto she does not find expression for the spirit that one has learned to expect from her. She sustained her legato in the first movement with satisfying repose and fineness, and in little episodes gave some interesting tonal effects like the picking of stringed instruments, yet with all the big construction work, it was pedagogic and not the thing for which Madame Carreno stands.

The full richness of the orchestra was brought out in the Wagner overture to the "Flying Dutchman," and Dr. Muck was rhythmic and vigorous in his conducting. The descending chords of the first exposition of the "Flying Dutchman" theme were intensely dramatic. There was some notable preluding leading up to the ailors' chorus, and the finale with its arp arpeggios was worked up to a lendid climax.

J. MacB.

in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

Symphony Players Show Great Skill

A spirit of serenity pervaded the masterly interpretation of Mozart's beautiful E flat major symphony by Dr. Muck at the Boston symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

The consummate technical skill of the orchestra was ably displayed in the beautiful phrasing and limpidity of each movement.

The second number, "Tragic" overture by Brahms, gave a contrasting sombre note. This composition has been characterized as a musical portrayal of Hamlet, and the themes typifying Hamlet, Ophelia and Fortinbras musically suggest these characters with singular effectiveness.

The distinguished pianiste, Mme. Carreno, as soloist of the concert, played the Beethoven "Emperor" concert in E flat major with high refinement of pianistic art.

The program closed with the dramatic overture to the "Flying Dutchman" by Richard Wagner.

J. M.

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date JAN 9 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck chose for his programme last night three classic symphonies; the Haydn in D major (the last of the Salomon set), the Mozart in E flat major, and the first of Beethoven's nine. It cannot be denied that this ultra-classic choice made for monotony. Contrast was almost wholly wanting. There are more interesting Beethoven symphonies than his maiden effort—some that are heard less frequently, too.

The Haydn symphony Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic played last year with rather more emotional quality than the Boston men put into it. It was a delight to hear the Mozart symphony, especially the minuet, which was played with much grace and delicacy. Something by that giant among giants, Sebastian Bach, however, would have kept the programme classical and at the same time made for contrast. Bach's stirring rhythms would have been a splendid offset to the grace of Haydn and Mozart. But after those two symphonies, the Beethoven first sounded almost like a step backward. However, between an ultra-modern and an ultra-classical programme the latter by all means is preferable!

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

AMUSEM

Boston Symphony

Establ k, 1884

The third symphony co Washington season by the B ony Orchestra, under the direc Dr. Karl Muck, was given at the tional Theater yesterday afternoon, wi Mme. Teresa Carreno, the famous pianist, as soloist. Mme. Carreno played Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto. The symphony of the afternoon was Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major." Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" completed the program. A large and distinguished audience included Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice President.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two Symphonies and Pianoforte Concerto Make Up the Program

Establis

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before one of those crowded audiences which it habitually attracts, seems to have a penchant for eccentric programs. It will be remembered that his last month's arrangement consisted of just two numbers, one of them being the late Gutave Mahler's symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor, whose performance occupied nearly an hour and a half, and the other Brahms' violin concerto. Last night what the orchestra played consisted of two symphonies, the one by Mozart in E flat, containing the familiar minuet, and the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn.

This was a change with a vengeance for anything more different from Mahler's turgid, complicated, pretentious and bombastic score, with its constant straining after effect and its intolerable prolixity, than the sincere, spontaneous, pellucid and melodious music of Haydn and Mozart is with difficulty imaginable. The contrast presented was noteworthy and remarkable, and it may be suspected that a majority of listeners derived more pleasure and a greater profit from the familiar classic scores than from the music that was inflicted upon them a month ago.

admirably both symp hor wer need hardly be said. Th wer ven with the utmost brilliance and nement and with an artistic ap pre tion of their idiosyncracies which quite excluded any such over accentuation as the modern orchestra invites.

The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno, whose interpretation of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, in breadth and power and dignity, in elevation of sentiment, in technical proficiency and in a kind of virivile strength not readily associated with the feminity of the performer, was greatly enjoyed and deservedly applauded. Mme. Carreno has occupied a front place among contempora pianists for more years than it would be polite to recall, and she never played better, with a more masterful execution or a more communicative emotion, than she is playing now. Her presentation of the "Emperor" was a very great achievement, and Dr. Muck supplied an accompaniment which in its plasticity, mobility and expression left nothing to be desired.

Off for Europe

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Establis

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 7, at 8:15. There will be but two numbers on the program —a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Madame Terese Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto in B Flat Major, No. 5. The first part of the program will be devoted to Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, No. 2. He is the only great composer succeeding Tschaiskowsky.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 3 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Estab 384

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 7, at 8:15. There will be but two numbers on the program, a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's Emperor Concerto in E flat major, No. 5.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date JAN 11 1914

MODERN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

k, 1884

Audience Listens to Three Compositions by Writers of Inferior Merit.

LET OUT TO TEDIOUS LENGTH

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

What is a poor child of nature to make of the concert given yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall; in which the audience had to listen to three modern compositions by writers who have no claim to be admitted to the front rank?

The afternoon of music began with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D, of which Gounod remarked severely but justly that it was "the affirmation of incompetency pushed to dogmatic lengths."

And I think I know what Gounod meant, for from the beginning of this symphony to the end there is hardly a passage written from the heart to the heart. Hardly a passage, with the exception of the beginning of the allegretto, which appeals even to one's musical sense of the picturesque. And, oh! the length, the discursiveness and the garrulity of the first movement. Surely all that was said could have been said in less tedious time.

So much of it was purely music-making, writing for the sake of writing, and wire-drawing of ideas.

"Tregedie de Salome."

Then came Florent Schmitt's "Tragedie de Salome," for orchestra, after a poem by Robert Humieres. The poem was Englished in the programme and the translation gave us some idea of M. Schmitt's intentions. Once again it was proved that lengthiness is one of the ingredients of modern music. Length of itself has no artistic value. If it had, why not start a craze for painting pictures many yards long, or writing epics in forty-eight books, thus doubling Homer? To the protest of the afflicted you can always answer, "Well, that's the way I feel it."

The relation between the poem and M. Schmitt's music was not very clear. The poem was a revamping of all the old Salome pseudo-Oriental stuff of which Oscar Wilde, Massenet and Strauss have given us our fill, until we are nauseated with their morbid, supersensual and unwarranted expansion of the austerely laconic but wonderfully dramatic story told in the Scriptures, upon which none of them have improved.

Storm, Shiver and Quiver.

M. Schmitt's music is simply storm, shiver, quiver and stress, bathing us in a musical liquid so acrid, unnatural and exotic that we longed to put our heads under a musical pump and have a few quarts of the tonic chord of C major poured benevolently over them.

Young critics are warned never to prophesy. I shall be incautious enough to violate the wholesome rule. Schmitt and Franck will be listened to with pleasure when Beethoven and Brahms are forgotten, but not till then.

We enjoyed a serener and humaner atmosphere when Rinsky Korsakoff was set forth.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS

Mme. Carreno as Soloist Adds to Delight of Perfect Ensemble.

Esta 84

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, was heard in its third concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with the celebrated pianiste, Mme. Teresa Carreno, as soloist. The severely classic spirit predominated in the program, the formal elegance of pure musical tone.

A perfection of control and exquisite beauty in each detail, each phrase, characterized the E flat major symphony of Mozart, which seems a composition designed preeminently for the strings, although in the andante the alternate work of strings and winds were contrasted charmingly, as was the very lovely song of the minuet. The spirit of the finale was jo with perfect in the different parts, withal crisp attack, fine shading, and very musical in interpretation.

The opening theme of the Brahm's "Tragic" overture was dire ect and dramatic, followed by anothe r theme of really intense beauty. Ye t, despite its name, it seemed the wor k of th classicist, chaste and exquisite , r passioned.

Madame Carreno returns to us the poise of a mature artist. It is to be regretted that she did not choose the romantic type of composition which is so intimately a part of her temperament, for in the Beethoven E flat major concerto she does not find expression for the spirit that one has learned to expect from her. She sustained her legato in the first movement with satisfying repose and fineness, and in little episodes gave some interesting tonal effects like the picking of stringed instruments, yet with all the big construction work, it was pedagogic and not the thing for which Madame Carreno stands.

The full richness of the orchestra was brought out in the Wagner overture to the "Flying Dutchman," and Dr. Muck was rhythmic and vigorous in his conducting. The descending chords of the first exposition of the "Flying Dutchman" theme were intensely dramatic. There was some notable preluding leading up to the ailors' chorus, and the finale with its arp arpeggios was worked up to a lendid climax.

J. MacB.

in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 1914

Symphony Players Show Great Skill

Est 1884

A spirit of serenity pervaded the masterly interpretation of Mozart's beautiful E flat major symphony by Dr. Muck at the Boston symphony concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

The consummate technical skill of the orchestra was ably displayed in the beautiful phrasing and limpidity of each movement.

The second number, "Tragic" overture by Brahms, gave a contrasting sombre note. This composition has been characterized as a musical portrayal of Hamlet, and the themes typifying Hamlet, Ophelia and Fortinbras musically suggest these characters with singular effectiveness.

The distinguished pianiste, Mme. Carreno, as soloist of the concert, played the Beethoven "Emperor" concert in E flat major with high refinement of pianistic art.

The program closed with the dramatic overture to the "Flying Dutchman" by Richard Wagner.

J. M.

From E. POST.
Address New York City.
Date JAN 9 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Esta 884

Dr. Muck chose for his programme last night three classic symphonies; the Haydn in D major (the last of the Salomon set), the Mozart in E flat major, and the first of Beethoven's nine. It cannot be denied that this ultra-classic choice made for monotony. Contrast was almost wholly wanting. There are more interesting Beethoven symphonies than his maiden effort—some that are heard less frequently, too.

The Haydn symphony Mr. Stransky and the Philharmonic played last year with rather more emotional quality than the Boston men put into it. It was a delight to hear the Mozart symphony, especially the minuet, which was played with much grace and delicacy. Something by that giant among giants, Sebastian Bach, however, would have kept the programme classical and at the same time made for contrast. Bach's stirring rhythms would have been a splendid offset to the grace of Haydn and Mozart. But after those two symphonies, the Beethoven first sounded almost like a step backward. However, between an ultra-modern and an ultra-classical programme the latter by all means is preferable!

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1914
Established:

SOME NEW SALOME BALLET MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra Plays Schmitt's Setting of a Loie Fuller Pantomime.

REMARKABLE SCORE BY AN ALSATIAN COMPOSER

A Master of Invention, Construction and Orchestration Introduced to New York.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Dr. Muck introduced a composer hitherto unknown to the New York public at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. No better fortune than such an introduction could be asked by the most exacting musician alive, for it insured an illuminative performance of his work and a sympathetic hearing. The composer was Florent Schmitt; the composition, some music written to illustrate a pantomime, or ballet, entitled "La Tragédie de Salomé." Why the old story of Herodias's daughter, with its slight foundation in the familiar Biblical narrative, should have fascinated the human mind for centuries might provide an interesting topic for psychological study and speculation; but there is neither time nor space at the command of a newspaper reviewer to pursue it now. Mr. Philip Hale suggests the wide scope which it would take when in his programmatic note in the book of Boston programmes he enumerates "Wilde's tragedy, the operas by Massenet, Strauss and Mariotti, the description of Herodias in Heine's 'Atta Troll,' the essay of Gomez Carillo, the pictures of Moreau, Regnault, Karl von Mander and other painters, the tale of Flaubert, the dramas of Richard Hengist Horne and Hermann Sudermann and the libretto of Gustav Nicolai." But this is far from being a complete list. Mr. Hale also mentions the ballet written by Armand Silvestre and Charles Henry Meltzer and set to music by Gabriel Pierné for Miss Loie Fuller in 1895, but overlooks the symphonic poem by an American composer, Henry Hadley, now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, which was played in Boston in April, 1907, and at an English festival. Mr. Hadley's composition is a symphonic poem based on Oscar Wilde's play.

The music, which had its first New York hearing, was also written, like that of M. Pierné, to display the charms of Miss Fuller's art, but the story on which it is based owes nothing to Wilde, though possibly one episode to Jules Lafargue's "Moralité Légendiare," as Mr. Hale suggests. "La Tragédie de Salomé" is a pantomime for which Robert d'Humières created the dramatic story, which with Schmitt's music had its first production in Paris in 1907. Lorent Schmitt is an Alsatian whose musical training has been all French (he carried off the Grand Prix de Rome at the Conservatoire in 1900) and whose sympathies and ideals are also French, though they may be tinged with a bit of Teutonism which finds expression in the solidity and logical sequence of his music and what may be called its frequent lapses into idioms which the followers of Debussy, unlike Richard Strauss, affect to contemn. He is not afraid of the diatonic scale and of a sane and sonorous phrase with all his liking for Oriental intervals and the whole-tone device which Debussy pre-empted as a distinguishing characteristic. His music is highly picturesque and so full of delineative devices that we fancy its effect would be raised fourfold if it could be accompanied by scenery and action, or even with the make-believe of moving pictures, and yet it has an inexplicable charm for its own sake. Schmitt is a puissant evoker of moods by means of pregnant themes and harmonic and instrumental color, but also by a most ingenious and individual system of thematic development. The score of "Salomé" is a closely woven fabric, masterful in the logic of its design as well as in its freedom, and if we were called upon to give it a place among the recent products of orchestral writing we should be strongly tempted to say that it is far and away the most significant instrumental composition which has come to us out of France since Debussy's "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune." We cannot recall evidences of such high imaginativeness in anything by Enesco, Dukas or Debussy, except in the work mentioned, the influence of which is felt oftener than any other in portions of the music not wholly given up to the delineation of externals. In poetical quality and variety of refined expression it puts much of Strauss's music in the shade.

It is a crowded canvas, for which the composer undertook to provide life and color by means of his music. Herod, walking on the terrace of his palace, with the Dead Sea and the mountains of Moab bathed in the colors of the setting sun [illegible] torches, [illegible] herself for the dance and essaying it for her own childish delight. Then a picture of the sea in its sinister and magical aspects; its rising phosphorescent lights; a vision of the cities whose wickedness caused them to be buried beneath the waves; sounds of sinful orgies; abysmal songs; a storm, the lightnings of which disclose Salome dancing the lascivious dance which inflames the lust of Herod; his pursuit of her; the capture; the stripping of her veils from shoulders and limbs; the apparition of the Baptist, who hides her nudity with his cloak; the vengeance of Herodias; the decapitation. The poet ought to be permitted to tell the rest of the tale in his own way:

> The triumphant Salome takes the head of the prophet and outlines a step, laden with her funereal burden. Then, as one feeling sudden uneasiness, as if the voice of the beheaded had whispered in her ear, she runs to the edge of the terrace and hurls the charger over the battlement into the sea. And the sea turns to the color of blood, and Salome falls in a swoon, while mad terror sweeps away Herod, Herodia and the executioners in frantic flight.
>
> Salome comes to herself. The head of John appears, stares at her, then disappears. Salome quakes and turns away in anguish. The head again gazes at her from another part of the stage. Salome wishes to steal away. And the heads now arising are everywhere.
>
> Salome, terrified, turns about to escape the bloody vision.
>
> As she dances the storm breaks. A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal frenzy.

A lurid picture, indeed, and much of it beyond the descriptive capacity of music, of course. But it is little short of marvellous how much of the phantasmagoria has found expression or suggestion in chmitt's music, and how both imagination and emotions fall under its thrall. Ve can well believe that Edmond Stoullig poke the truth without exaggeration when e said that at the performance at the Théâtre des Arts there was nothing to do ut "to admire with open mouth."

The concert began with César Franck's symphony in D minor, which, it is to be feared, we have heard too often of late, since, despite its beauty, it is beginning to grow monotonous because of its persistence of mood, and ended with Rimsky-Korsakow's caprice on Spanish airs, Op. 34, which sounded vulgar and commonplace in comparison with the highly ingenious music which had preceded it.

NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date JAN 9 1914
Established 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played before its usual large audience last evening in Carnegie Hall. There was much enthusiasm displayed by the gathering of music lovers for a programme that offered nothing but music in its pristine purity.

It is doubtful if any conductor outside of Dr. Muck could have eliminated soloists and given a programme so severely classical and yet retained the hold upon his hearers as Dr. Muck did in the Haydn symphony in D major, the Mozart E flat major symphony and Beethoven's first symphony.

Dr. Muck's interpretations accentuated the distance that most conductors have wandered from the true classical spirit of these masters. It was a great lesson as well as an undeniable pleasure. The conductor and his men were warmly greeted.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914
Estab 1884

Music.

A Concert of Classics, "Koenigskinder," and a 'Cellist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again, and for its first New York concert of the year 1914, at Carnegie Hall last evening, it offered its patrons, who completely filled the hall, a programme of three classic symphonies. The symphonies chosen were Haydn's in D major, Mozart's in E flat, and Beethoven's in C (the First of the Immortal Nine). Unity in programme making is a hobby with Dr. Muck, and in this instance it would be hard to acquit him of a touch of pedantry also, but if symphony concerts are to be consciously educational, as opera once was at the Manhattan Opera House, we can go to no better school than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

To dilate on the qualities of the performance would be almost an impertinence. Dr. Muck, it is hardly necessary to [illegible] each symphony, Rimsky-Korsakow [illegible] "Caprice" and a new "Tr[illegible]

[illegible] its individual style, and the [illegible] precision, and euphony of the orchestra's playing were an unceasing delight. Even those who found the programme a little taxing must admit that in nothing do the rare qualities of the band from Boston appear to quite such advantage as in the old classics. The great audience gave many evidences of enjoyment.

At the Metropolitan Opera House last night "Königskinder" was given for the first time this season. Though the audience was large, there were no indications that the Goose Girl's opera is growing in popularity. If anything could bring about that result, it would unquestionably be the impersonation of the Goose Girl by Miss Geraldine Farrar. The beauty and charm of Miss Farrar in that rôle compensate in great measure for the many tedious pages in the score. As of old, Mr. Jörn appeared as the King's Son, but he was not in good voice. Mr. Goritz repeated his admired representation of the Spielmann. Mr. Ruysdael as the Woodcutter, Mr. Leonhardt as the Innkeeper, and Else Foerster as the Child were the new members of the cast. Mr. Ruysdael showed genuine comic talent. Mrs. Robeson appeared as the Witch and Mr. Reiss as the Broommaker. Mr. Hertz conducted.

Miss Beatrice Harrison, the young English 'cellist, who made her début here as soloist with the Philharmonic Society last month, gave a recital at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience seemed bent on making up for its lack of numbers by applauding in season and out. In season Miss Harrison amply deserved the [illegible] plause. The [illegible] with the Philharmo[illegible] amplified and strengthened yesterday. Her technique is masterly, her tone beautiful, and her playing is marked by intelligence and artistic feeling. Boccherini's sonata in A major, Bach's unaccompanied suite in G major, and Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" were the principal numbers on her programme.

Society in Force at Concert.

A brilliant audience filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff had with them Lady Spring-Rice, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Capt. Boy-Ed, and Baron Berkheim, of the embassy.

Mrs. William Crozier had with her her box Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, and Mrs. Clarence Wils Mrs. Marshall Field had with her Mr Maldwin Drummond, of London, who her guest, and Mrs. Slater. Mrs. Jam McMillan entertained Mrs. A. E. Bate Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. Elisha Dye and Miss Stephens.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had in her bo Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Miss Hegema Mr. Kendall, and Mr. Hamlin. Mr. ar Mrs. A. Lisner had in their box Mr Robert J. Wynne, Mrs. Dickins, ar Mrs. Benjamin Woodruff. Mrs. I. Mann also entertained a party in h box.

Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, who occupi the presidential box, had with her M Marshall, Mrs. Patterson, Mme. Vassilie and Viscount Benoist d'Azy.

Others in the audience at the conc were Miss Gwynn, Mr. and Mrs. Her Kirke Porter, Mrs. Bowers, Dr. Bauman Miss Natalie Magruder, the Secretary the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secreta of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston. M Daniels, Mrs. Bagley, Miss Bagley, V countess de Sibour, Mrs. George Howa Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Mrs. Sa uel Spencer, Mrs. H. B. Spencer, M Nathaniel Francis, Mr. de Costa, M Harlan, Dr. Charles D. Walcott, M Pinchot, Mrs. Matthewson, Mrs. Stickn Miss Lee, Mrs. Frederick Atherton, M John M. Biddle, Mr. Schmolck, of Netherlands legation; Mrs. Henry Cle land Perkins, Mrs. Lyman Tiffany, M Parker, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Algara, of the Mexican embassy; M Ethel Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, and Mrs. Thomas Hutchinson, Mr. Th as Spring-Rice, the Misses Mackay-Sm Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. Drey Barney, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Mi ell, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, the Chil Minister, Miss Ingalls, Miss Lippitt, M da Gama, Rev. Father Hemmick, M Calvo, Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, M Lawrence Heap, Mrs. Hennen Jenni Miss Jennings, Miss Coleman, Mrs. Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Hamilton Lewis, Misses Sheridan, Mr. and Mrs. Wa MacVeagh, Mrs. J. P. Sanger, Mr. Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Charles Hughes, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. liam B. Mearns, Mrs. C. C. Glover, M Van Swinderen, Miss Marion Sands, M Max Kauffmann, Mrs. Victor Kauffma Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, and Misses Patten.

The First Established and Most Complet
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 6
Esta

MME. CARRENO HEARD WITH BOSTON ARTISTS

Plays 'Emperor' Concerto as Soloist at Symphony Orchestra Concert

DR. MUCK MASTERFUL

MADAME TERESA CARRENO

The distinguished Venezuelan pianist was heard last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By H. T. Craven

Having presumably satisfied ultra-modernists with a superb performance of Gustav Mahler's extraordinary symphony earlier in the season, Dr. Karl Muck, leading the Boston Orchestra, in the Academy of Music last night, made his appeal directly to admirers of the recognized classics.

The newest number on the program dated from 1809. This was Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, magnificently played by Teresa Carreno. The other composer's represented were Hadyn and Mozart.

Within the last three weeks Madame Carreno has been heard here three times. This is none too often for an exhibition of such eloquent and expressive art as that of the great Venezuelan pianist. Teresa Carreno today stands almost alone in her field.

Artistically she is of the race of Rubinstein and Liszt. Majesty and epic power are the prime attributes of her playing. Advancing years—the artist was born in Caracas sixty years ago—have not availed to dim the luster of her gifts.

She is still the "lioness of the pianoforte"—a performer of impeccable technique, thrilling interpretative vision, and personally possessed of irresistible magnetic charm.

When Czerny first played the "Emperor" concert in Vienna in 1812, it was condemned for its extravagant length. The work seemed all too short in the glorious reading which Madame Carreno gave of it last evening.

There were two symphonies on the roster. Hadyn's "Surprise," with its ever startling crash in the andante, was played with much grace and spirit. This very naive work, however, suffered in comparison with Mozart's delightful G major, the composition on which at least one-third of its reputation as a symphony maker rests. Its fellows are the "Jupiter" and the G minor. Doctor Muck's interpretation of the G major work was crystal clear, authoritative and poetic.

This is a late day to comment on the materful artistry of the Boston symphony. Each of its five visits here a season is a musical event of signal importance.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 11 1914
Established:

SOME NEW SALOME BALLET MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra Plays Schmitt's Setting of a Loie Fuller Pantomime.

REMARKABLE SCORE BY AN ALSATIAN COMPOSER

A Master of Invention, Construction and Orchestration Introduced to New York.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

Dr. Muck introduced a composer hitherto unknown to the New York public at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. No better fortune than such an introduction could be asked by the most exacting musician alive, for it insured an illuminative performance of his work and a sympathetic hearing. The composer was Florent Schmitt; the composition, some music written to illustrate a pantomime, or ballet, entitled "La Tragédie de Salomé." Why the old story of Herodias's daughter, with its slight foundation in the familiar Biblical narrative, should have fascinated the human mind for centuries might provide an interesting topic for psychological study and speculation; but there is neither time nor space at the command of a newspaper reviewer to pursue it now. Mr. Philip Hale suggests the wide scope which it would take when in his programmatic note in the book of Boston programmes he enumerates "Wilde's tragedy, the operas by Massenet, Strauss and Mariotti, the description of Herodias in Heine's 'Atta Troll,' the essay of Gomez Carillo, the pictures of Moreau, Regnault, Karl von Mander and other painters, the tale of Flaubert, the dramas of Richard Hengist Horne and Hermann Sudermann and the libretto of Gustav Nicolai." But this is far from being a complete list. Mr. Hale also mentions the ballet written by Armand Silvestre and Charles Henry Meltzer and set to music by Gabriel Pierné for Miss Loie Fuller in 1895, but overlooks the symphonic poem by an American composer, Henry Hadley, now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, which was played in Boston in April, 1907, and at an English festival. Mr. Hadley's composition is a symphonic poem based on Oscar Wilde's play.

The music, which had its first New York hearing, was also written, like that of M. Pierné, to display the charms of Miss Fuller's art, but the story on which it is based owes nothing to Wilde, though possibly one episode to Jules Lafargue's "Moralité Légendiare," as Mr. Hale suggests. "La Tragédie de Salomé" is a pantomime for which Robert d'Humières created the dramatic story, which with Schmitt's music had its first production in Paris in 1907. Lorent Schmitt is an Alsatian whose musical training has been all French (he carried off the Grand Prix de Rome at the Conservatoire in 1900) and whose sympathies and ideals are also French, though they may be tinged with a bit of Teutonism which finds expression in the solidity and logical sequence of his music and what may be called its frequent lapses into idioms which the followers of Debussy, unlike Richard Strauss, affect to contemn. He is not afraid of the diatonic scale and of a sane and sonorous phrase with all his liking for Oriental intervals and the whole-tone device which Debussy pre-empted as a distinguishing characteristic. His music is highly picturesque and so full of delineative devices that we fancy its effect would be raised fourfold if it could be accompanied by scenery and action, or even with the make-believe of moving pictures, and yet it has an inexplicable charm for its own sake. Schmitt is a puissant evoker of moods by means of pregnant themes and harmonic and instrumental color, but also by a most ingenious and individual system of thematic development. The score of "Salomé" is a closely woven fabric, masterful in the logic of its design as well as in its freedom, and if we were called upon to give it a place among the recent products of orchestral writing we should be strongly tempted to say that it is far and away the most significant instrumental composition which has come to us out of France since Debussy's "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune." We cannot recall evidences of such high imaginativeness in anything by Enesco, Dukas or Debussy, except in the work mentioned, the influence of which is felt oftener than any other in portions of the music not wholly given up to the delineation of externals. In poetical quality and variety of refined expression it puts much of Strauss's music in the shade.

It is a crowded canvas, for which the composer undertook to provide life and color by means of his music. Herod, walking on the terrace of his palace, with the Dead Sea and the mountains of Moab bathed in the colors of the settin torches, [illegible] [illegible] herself for the dance and essaying it for her own childish delight. Then a picture of the sea in its sinister and magical aspects; its rising phosphorescent lights; a vision of the cities whose wickedness caused them to be buried beneath the waves; sounds of sinful orgies; abysmal songs; a storm, the lightnings of which disclose Salome dancing the lascivious dance which inflames the lust of Herod; his pursuit of her; the capture; the stripping of her veils from shoulders and limbs; the apparition of the Baptist, who hides her nudity with his cloak; the vengeance of Herodias; the decapitation. The poet ought to be permitted to tell the rest of the tale in his own way:

> The triumphant Salome takes the head of the prophet and outlines a step, laden with her funereal burden. Then, as one feeling sudden uneasiness, as if the voice of the beheaded had whispered in her ear, she runs to the edge of the terrace and hurls the charger over the battlement into the sea. And the sea turns to the color of blood, and Salome falls in a swoon, while mad terror sweeps away Herod, Herodia and the executioners in frantic flight.
>
> Salome comes to herself. The head of John appears, stares at her, then disappears. Salome quakes and turns away in anguish. The head again gazes at her from another part of the stage. Salome wishes to steal away. And the heads now arising are everywhere.
>
> Salome, terrified, turns about to escape the bloody vision.
>
> As she dances the storm breaks. A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal frenzy.

A lurid picture, indeed, and much of it beyond the descriptive capacity of music, of course. But it is little short of marvellous how much of the phantasmagoria has found expression or suggestion in chmitt's music, and how both imagination and emotions fall under its thrall. Ve can well believe that Edmond Stoullig poke the truth without exaggeration when ie said that at the performance at the Théâtre des Arts there was nothing to do out "to admire with open mouth."

The concert began with César Franck's symphony in D minor, which, it is to be feared, we have heard too often of late, since, despite its beauty, it is beginning to grow monotonous because of its persistence of mood, and ended with Rimsky-Korsakow's caprice on Spanish airs, Op. 34, which sounded vulgar and commonplace in comparison with the highly ingenious music which had preceded it.

NEW YORK

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date 9 1914
Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played before its usual large audience last evening in Carnegie Hall. There was much enthusiasm displayed by the gathering of music lovers for a programme that offered nothing but music in its pristine purity.

It is doubtful if any conductor outside of Dr. Muck could have eliminated soloists and given a programme so severely classical and yet retained the hold upon his hearers as Dr. Muck did in the Haydn symphony in D major, the Mozart E flat major symphony and Beethoven's first symphony.

Dr. Muck's interpretations accentuated the distance that most conductors have wandered from the true classical spirit of these masters. It was a great lesson as well as an undeniable pleasure. The conductor and his men were warmly greeted.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914
Estab 1884

Music.

A Concert of Classics, "Koenigskinder," and a 'Cellist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again, and for its first New York concert of the year 1914, at Carnegie Hall last evening, it offered its patrons, who completely filled the hall, a programme of three classic symphonies. The symphonies chosen were Haydn's in D major, Mozart's in E flat, and Beethoven's in C (the First of the Immortal Nine). Unity in programme making is a hobby with Dr. Muck, and in this instance it would be hard to acquit him of a touch of pedantry also, but if symphony concerts are to be consciously educational, as opera once was at the Manhattan Opera House, we can go to no better school than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

To dilate on the qualities of the performance would be almost an impertinence. Dr. Muck, it is hardly necessary to [illegible] [illegible] each symphony, [illegible] [illegible] ice" and a new "Tr

[illegible] its individual style, and the [illegible] precision, and euphony of the orchestra's playing were an unceasing delight. Even those who found the programme a little taxing must admit that in nothing do the rare qualities of the band from Boston appear to quite such advantage as in the older classics. The great audience gave many evidences of enjoyment.

At the Metropolitan Opera House last night "Königskinder" was given for the first time this season. Though the audience was large, there were no indications that the Goose Girl's opera is growing in popularity. If anything could bring about that result, it would unquestionably be the impersonation of the Goose Girl by Miss Geraldine Farrar. The beauty and charm of Miss Farrar in that rôle compensate in great measure for the many tedious pages in the score. As of old, Mr. Jörn appeared as the King's Son, but he was not in good voice. Mr. Goritz repeated his admired representation of the Spielmann. Mr. Ruysdael as the Woodcutter, Mr. Leonhardt as the Innkeeper, and Else Foerster as the Child were the new members of the cast. Mr. Ruysdael showed genuine comic talent. Mrs. Robeson appeared as the Witch and Mr. Reiss as the conducted.

(Copyright 1914

When the spring winds call cheerily and the birds on the southern shores twitter gayly milady looks on her most cherished winter hat with an air of scorn. The silky sheen of the velvet appears no longer pleasing and the buoyant feather has a dejected look. Then without a

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7

Society in Force at Concert.

A brilliant audience filled the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff had with them Lady Spring-Rice, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Capt. Boy-Ed, and Baron Berkheim, of the embassy.

Mrs. William Crozier had with her in her box Mme. Jusserand, Mrs. Huntington Wilson, and Mrs. Clarence Wilson. Mrs. Marshall Field had with her Mrs. Maldwin Drummond, of London, who is her guest, and Mrs. Slater, Mrs. James McMillan entertained Mrs. A. E. Bates, Mrs. Preston Gibson, Mrs. Elisha Dyer, and Miss Stephens.

Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had in her box Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Miss Hegeman, Mr. Kendall, and Mr. Hamlin. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner had in their box Mrs. Robert J. Wynne, Mrs. Dickins, and Mrs. Benjamin Woodruff. Mrs. I. Mann also entertained a party in her box.

Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, who occupied the presidential box, had with her Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Patterson, Mme. Vassilis and Viscount Benoist d'Azy.

Others in the audience at the concert were Miss Gwynn, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirke Porter, Mrs. Bowers, Dr. Bauman, Miss Natalie Magruder, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston. Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Bagley, Miss Bagley, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, Mrs. H. B. Spencer, M Nathaniel Francis, Mr. de Costa, M Harlan, Dr. Charles D. Walcott, M Pinchot, Mrs. Matthewson, Mrs. Stickn Miss Lee, Mrs. Frederick Atherton, M John M. Biddle, Mr. Schmolck, of Netherlands legation; Mrs. Henry Cleland Perkins, Mrs. Lyman Tiffany, M Parker, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Algara, of the Mexican embassy; M Ethel Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, and Mrs. Thomas Hutchinson, Mr. Th as Spring-Rice, the Misses Mackay-Sm Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Mrs. Drey Barney, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Mi ell, Mrs. Sinclair Bowen, the Chil Minister, Miss Ingalls, Miss Lippitt, M da Gama, Rev. Father Hemmick, M Calvo. Mr. and Mrs. George Eustis, M Lawrence Heap, Mrs. Hennen Jenni Miss Jennings, Miss Coleman, Mrs. Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Hamilton Lewis, Misses Sheridan, Mr. and Mrs. W MacVeagh, Mrs. J. P. Sanger, Mr. Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Charles Hughes, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. liam B. Mearns, Mrs. C. C. Glover, Van Swinderen, Miss Marion Sands, Max Kauffmann, Mrs. Victor Kauffm Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, and Misses Patten.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 6

MME. CARRENO HEARD WITH BOSTON ARTISTS

Plays 'Emperor' Concerto as Soloist at Symphony Orchestra Concert

DR. MUCK MASTERFUL

MADAME TERESA CARRENO

The distinguished Venezuelan pianist was heard last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By H. T. Craven

Having presumably satisfied ultra-modernists with a superb performance of Gustav Mahler's extraordinary symphony earlier in the season, Dr. Karl Muck, leading the Boston Orchestra, in the Academy of Music last night, made his appeal directly to admirers of the recognized classics.

The newest number on the program dated from 1809. This was Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, magnificently played by Teresa Carreno. The other composer's represented were Hadyn and Mozart.

Within the last three weeks Madame Carreno has been heard here three times. This is none too often for an exhibition of such eloquent and expressive art as that of the great Venezuelan pianist. Teresa Carreno today stands almost alone in her field.

Artistically she is of the race of Rubinstein and Liszt. Majesty and epic power are the prime attributes of her playing. Advancing years—the artist was born in Caracas sixty years ago—have not availed to dim the luster of her gifts.

She is still the "lioness of the pianoforte"—a performer of impeccable technique, thrilling interpretative vision, and personally possessed of irresistible magnetic charm.

When Czerny first played the "Emperor" concert in Vienna in 1812, it was condemned for its extravagant length. The work seemed all too short in the glorious reading which Madame Carreno gave of it last evening.

There were two symphonies on the roster. Hadyn's "Surprise," with its ever startling crash in the andante, was played with much grace and spirit. This very naive work, however, suffered in comparison with Mozart's delightful G major, the composition on which at least one-third of its reputation as a symphony maker rests. Its fellows are the "Jupiter" and the G minor. Doctor Muck's interpretation of the G major work was crystal clear, authoritative and poetic.

This is a late day to comment on the materful artistry of the Boston symphony. Each of its five visits here a season is a musical event of signal importance.

[98]

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914

Establi

SCHMITT'S SALOME FIRST GIVEN HERE

Dr. Muck and Boston Symphony Orchestra Present Tone Poem.

Though Florent Schmitt's scintilla tone-poem, "La Tragedie de Salom already had reached Brooklyn, whe Dr. Karl Muck presented that high modern French score a few weeks a for the benefit of our across-riv brothers and sisters, it was heard f the first time in Manhattan yesterda afternoon at the Boston Symphon Orchestra's third Saturday matinee o the season in Carnegie Hall. The othe numbers on the programme, careful selected by the conductor to satisf his ideas of unity, were Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which opened the musical proceedings, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, opus 34, which brought them to a close.

Originally Florent Schmitt wrote his "Tragedie de Salome" as a "mute drama in two acts and seven scenes," for the poetic background of which Robert d'Humieres was responsible. As the work in that form had its first performance at the Theatre des Arts in Paris on November 9, 1907, with Loie Fuller impersonating the title part, the composer and author may have known the pantomime on the same subject by Armand Silvestre and Charles Henry Meltzer, music by Gabriel Pierne, to which the famous choreographic artist lent her persuasions in March, 1895, in the Comedie Parisienne.

Afterward, as Philip Hale explains in his programme notes, the composer combined several episodes from the "mute drama" into a suite in two parts, and in that shape the score had its first performance anywhere at a Concert Colonne in Paris on January 8, 1911.

A Picturesque Orchestral Orgy.

It was the "suite" which the Boston Orchestra produced yesterday, and to assist the listener in following the impressionistic involutions of the extremely difficult and complicated score, Philip Hale's annotations provided a picturesquely descriptive literary exposition under the following headings: 1. Prelude; Dance of the Pearls. 2. The Enchantment of the Sea; Dance of the Lightnings; Dance of Fear.

Even with this "guide," however, which sketches the scenic background, introduces you to Herod, Herodi John the Baptist and Salome, and d scribes the varying conditions of elements and the movements of protagonists, it was difficult to follo closely the poetic context of the musi

The stressful climax of orchestr noises, to be sure, proved to be illum nating. As Salome dances the stor breaks loose. "A furious wind envelop her. Sulphurous clouds roll about th precipice; the tempest rocks the sea Pillars of sand rush in the desert places The tall cypresses writhe tragically an break in pieces with a crash. The bol falls, and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Mebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal fire."

Moreover there were other incidents, too, which could be caught fitfully in the instrumental swirl.

Herod's "furious gesture," however, the chopping off of the Baptist's head, Salome's appearance with "her funereal burden," her swooning and a few other occurrences escaped notice at first hearing. Alas, that it would have been so!

Character of the Work.

As has already been intimated, the score is complicated. Whatever technical difficulties it offers to the players, however—difficulties which Dr. Muck and his musicians solved yesterday with virtuosic brilliancy—the music in itself is not unfathomable.

The orchestral idiom and the devices of harmonic modulation and instrumental coloring are of the Gallic variety in which Debussy excels. But the thematic material and the treatment which it has received are not Debussyan. There are sweeping melodies and dynamic exuberances which the composer of "Pelleas et Melisande" would shun; there is a vigor and propulsive ardor which one does not find in other creations of the neo-French school.

To the student of orchestration the score of "La Tragedie de Salome" unquestionably is interesting. It is crowded with rich sonorities and the rythmical fertility the composer brings to his work is by no means one of his smallest charms, though the division of a few measures into "three and a half quarters" seems to be somewhat far-fetched.

On the whole, though it can hardly be conceded that "La Tragedie de Salome" reveals striking evidences of originality. It is the work of a virtuoso craftsman possessing a fine sense of atmosphere and color rather than a creation of genius.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914

Es 1884

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made Cesar Franck's noble Symphony in D Minor the chief feature of their concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It is a Titanic work in the modern manner, richly woven and full of dramatic fire and noble triumphant music. The Boston players gave every changing element of beauty in the score its full value. After Florent Schmitt's arid tone poem, "The Tragedy of Salome," it was a relief to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's melodic "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which concluded the programme.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn N. Y.
JAN 8 1914
Dat

Est 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY RATES.

Increased Expenditure Calls for Advance in Price of Seats.

For the season of 1914-1915 the subscription prices of season tickets for the five Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, are increased as follows: From $3.75 to $4.50, an increase of 15 cents per concert; from $5 to $6, an increase of 20 cents per concert; from $6 to $7, an increase of 20 cents a concert; from $7.50 to $9, an increase of 30 cents a concert; and box seats, from $10 to $12.50, an increase of 50 cents a concert.

The prices have been lower in Brooklyn than in any other city in which the orchestra plays and have remained substantially the same for more than a quarter of a century. The prices have been recently increased in other cities. The orchestra has been increased from eighty-seven to 101 musicians. The salaries of all the members of the orchestra are much larger than formerly, and the hotel and transportation expenses while the orchestra en-route are also materially increased. Furthermore, the demand for reserved seat season tickets is greater than the supply, so that there is a waiting list of those who would gladly pay more for the privilege of attending the concerts than is now paid.

Under these circumstances it is the judgment of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society and of the trustees of the Institute that the change as above announced is a proper one, that the increased income from the Brooklyn concerts will contribute to the maintenance of the orchestra more nearly Brooklyn's share of its annual cost, and that all the sunbscribers, old and new, to the concerts will cheerfully pay the larger prices as their contributions to the support of the orchestra as one that is unsurpassed in the quality of its work.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date JAN 9 1914

Es 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Crowded for Classical Concert.

Our musical friends from Boston—and how thrice welcome are their monthly visits from their New England home!—came to us again last night. Oversupplied as New Yorkers are with orchestral concerts, they are undersupplied with those of the Boston Symphony, as is evidenced by the size of the audiences which that organization always draws. The programme Dr. Muck chose for last night's concert was scarcely one in which the popular note was dominant, it being a programme devoted to three of the classic masters—Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—each of which was represented by a complete symphony. Yet, as ever, Carnegie Hall was filled from pit to dome, and the only vacant seats were in the intermission.

Praise for the great band was long ago reckoned among the things superfluous. The perfect balance, the sure adjustments of dynamics, the perfection of detail are the Boston Orchestra's own, and have been as conductor has followed conductor. The individual readings of compositions have differed, the warmth of interpretation has been greater or less, according to the leader, but the band has ever remained supreme.

Josef Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2) was the one which opened last night's concert, and both in this and in the following, Mozart, in E-flat major, Dr. Muck's splendid mastery of detail was evident, while he led his men with a fine and commanding sweep. It was, however, in the Beethoven First Symphony that he was at his best. Whatever scholasticism of treatment might be hinted at in his reading of Haydn was surely absent here, and in its place was a poetic fire and a repressed intensity that did not in the least take away from the grace and vivacity of the composition. Happy were all hearers last night, and happy will they be again at the orchestra's next concert, to-morrow afternoon.

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 28 1913

Musical announcements intended for publication in this department must be in the office of the Sunday Journal by Friday noon. They should be addressed to the Music Department of the Sunday Journal

33

Establishe

THE third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will give importance to the musical offerings of the holiday week, and the new year will be ushered in by the Chopin Club, with a reception and musical tea on Thursday afternoon.

In the churches, the last of four organ recitals will be given this evening at St. Stephen's Church, and at the Beneficent Congregational Church the Christmas programme of last week will be repeated.

* * *

In the programme which Dr. Muck has prepared for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is a holiday character and cheerful spirit quite in keeping with the season. In its proper order, the programme is as follows: Schubert, Symphony in B-Minor, "Unfinished;" Bizet, suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1; Lalo, overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" Brahms, Concerto in D-major for violin.

Few works in symphonic literature have a firmer hold on the appreciation of the public than the "Unfinished" symphony of Franz Schubert. This is especially curious, since the testimony of history seems to prove that the composer did not place a high value upon it, probably never completing it, and it was lost for many years after his death.

© Aime Dupont

Fritz Kreisler,
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

While it must ever remain a matter of deep regret that the last two movements, if ever written, have been lost, the beauty of the remaining movements makes the symphony, unfinished as it is, one of the most precious legacies that have been bequeathed to posterity by the genius of Schubert.

The four movements, which make the first "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet, are as many parts from the incidental music written by that composer for Alphonse Daudet's play, "The Woman of Arles." The play itself, while holding a high place in dramatic literature, never had popular success, possibly because "The Woman of Arles," who is known only by that title, never appears on the stage. It is questionable if it would ever have been remembered after its first failure in Paris, had it not been for the brilliant, colorful music, written by Bizet as an accompaniment to the play, some of which has been taken over for ballet music in the last act of "Carmen," and is, therefore, not included in the first suite. Had Bizet not won fame, in "Carmen," it is considered that his music for "The Woman of Arles" would have given it to him.

The opera "Le Roi d'Ys," which is based on the old Breton legend of the wicked city of Is, which was engulfed by the sea, is still a favorite in French opera houses, and it is one of the curious facts that no impresario in this country has seen fit to put it on the stage. The music of the overture is not only beautiful in itself, but contains one of the most exquisite solos for 'cello in the literature of music.

As already announced, the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will not play here again during this season. In the Concerto in D-major, by Brahms, that composer, as in his Symphony in C-minor, approaches the lofty heights of Beethoven's genius, and Kreisler, who last year played here the Beethoven Concerto, will give the audience an opportunity to hear the other supreme test of a violinist's skill.

* * *

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914
Establi

SCHMITT'S SALOME FIRST GIVEN HERE

Dr. Muck and Boston Symphony Orchestra Present Tone Poem.

Though Florent Schmitt's scintillant tone-poem, "La Tragedie de Salome," already had reached Brooklyn, where Dr. Karl Muck presented that highly modern French score a few weeks ago for the benefit of our across-river brothers and sisters, it was heard for the first time in Manhattan yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third Saturday matinee of the season in Carnegie Hall. The other numbers on the programme, carefully selected by the conductor to satisfy his ideas of unity, were Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which opened the musical proceedings, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, opus 34, which brought them to a close.

Originally Florent Schmitt wrote his "Tragedie de Salome" as a "mute drama in two acts and seven scenes," for the poetic background of which Robert d'Humieres was responsible. As the work in that form had its first performance at the Theatre des Arts in Paris on November 9, 1907, with Loie Fuller impersonating the title part, the composer and author may have known the pantomime on the same subject by Armand Silvestre and Charles Henry Meltzer, music by Gabriel Pierne, to which the famous choreographic artist lent her persuasions in March, 1895, in the Comedie Parisienne.

Afterward, as Philip Hale explains in his programme notes, the composer combined several episodes from the "mute drama" into a suite in two parts, and in that shape the score had its first performance anywhere at a Concert Colonne in Paris on January 8, 1911.

A Picturesque Orchestral Orgy.

It was the "suite" which the Boston Orchestra produced yesterday, and to assist the listener in following the impressionistic involutions of the extremely difficult and complicated score, Philip Hale's annotations provided a picturesquely descriptive literary exposition under the following headings: 1. Prelude; Dance of the Pearls. 2. The Enchantment of the Sea; Dance of the Lightnings; Dance of Fear.

Even with this "guide," however, which sketches the scenic background, introduces you to Herod, Herodias, John the Baptist and Salome, and describes the varying conditions of the elements and the movements of the protagonists, it was difficult to follow closely the poetic context of the music.

The stressful climax of orchestral noises, to be sure, proved to be illuminating. As Salome dances the storm breaks loose. "A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls, and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Mebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal fire."

Moreover there were other incidents, too, which could be caught fitfully in the instrumental swirl.

Herod's "furious gesture," however, the chopping off of the Baptist's head, Salome's appearance with "her funereal burden," her swooning and a few other occurrences escaped notice at first hearing. Alas, that it would have been so!

Character of the Work.

As has already been intimated, the score is complicated. Whatever technical difficulties it offers to the players, however—difficulties which Dr. Muck and his musicians solved yesterday with virtuosic brilliancy—the music in itself is not unfathomable.

The orchestral idiom and the devices of harmonic modulation and instrumental coloring are of the Gallic variety in which Debussy excels. But the thematic material and the treatment which it has received are not Debussyan. There are sweeping melodies and dynamic exuberances which the composer of "Pelleas et Melisande" would shun; there is a vigor and propulsive ardor which one does not find in other creations of the neo-French school.

To the student of orchestration the score of "La Tragedie de Salome" unquestionably is interesting. It is crowded with rich sonorities and the rythmical fertility the composer brings to his work is by no means one of his smallest charms, though the division of a few measures into three and a half quarters" seems to be somewhat far-fetched.

On the whole, though it can hardly be conceded that "La Tragedie de Salome" reveals striking evidences of originality. It is the work of a virtuoso craftsman possessing a fine sense of atmosphere and color rather than a creation of genius.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 11 1914
Es 1884

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made Cesar Franck's noble Symphony in D Minor the chief feature of their concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It is a Titanic work in the modern manner, richly woven and full of dramatic fire and noble triumphant music. The Boston players gave every changing element of beauty in the score its full value. After Florent Schmitt's arid tone poem, "The Tragedy of Salome," it was a relief to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's melodic "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which concluded the programme.

EAGLE
Brooklyn N. Y.
JAN 8 1914
884

STON SYMPHONY RATES.

ased Expenditure Calls for Advance in Price of Seats.

the season of 1914-1915 the subion prices of season tickets for the Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts by oston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, are increased as follows: From $3.75 to $4.50, an increase of 15 cents per concert; from $5 to $6, an increase of 20 cents per concert; from $6 to $7, an increase of 20 cents a concert; from $7.50 to $9, an increase of 30 cents a concert; and box seats, from $10 to $12.50, an increase of 50 cents a concert.

The prices have been lower in Brooklyn than in any other city in which the orchestra plays and have remained substantially the same for more than a quarter of a century. The prices have been recently increased in other cities. The orchestra has been increased from eighty-seven to 101 musicians. The salaries of all the members of the orchestra are much larger than formerly, and the hotel and transportation expenses while the orchestra en-route are also materially increased. Furthermore, the demand for reserved seat season tickets is greater than the supply, so that there is a waiting list of those who would gladly pay more for the privilege of attending the concerts than is now paid.

Under these circumstances it is the judgment of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society and of the trustees of the Institute that the change as above announced is a proper one, that the increased income from the Brooklyn concerts will contribute to the maintenance of the orchestra more nearly Brooklyn's share of its annual cost, and that all the sunbscribers, old and new, to the concerts will cheerfully pay the larger prices as their contributions to the support of the orchestra as one that is unsurpassed in the quality of its work.

First Established and Most Complete
Cutting Bureau in the World

IBUNE
New York City
JAN 9 1914
1884

TON SYMPHONY PLAYS

egie Hall Crowded for Classical Concert.

Our musical friends from Boston—and how thrice welcome are their monthly visits from their New England home!—came to us again last night. Oversupplied as New Yorkers are with orchestral concerts, they are undersupplied with those of the Boston Symphony, as is evidenced by the size of the audiences which that organization always draws. The programme Dr. Muck chose for last night's concert was scarcely one in which the popular note was dominant, it being a programme devoted to three of the classic masters—Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—each of which was represented by a complete symphony. Yet, as ever, Carnegie Hall was filled from pit to dome, and the only vacant seats were in the intermission.

Praise for the great band was long ago reckoned among the things superfluous. The perfect balance, the sure adjustments of dynamics, the perfection of detail are the Boston Orchestra's own, and have been as conductor has followed conductor. The individual readings of compositions have differed, the warmth of interpretation has been greater or less, according to the leader, but the band has ever remained supreme.

Josef Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2) was the one which opened last night's concert, and both in this and in the following, Mozart, in E-flat major, Dr. Muck's splendid mastery of detail was evident, while he led his men with a fine and commanding sweep. It was, however, in the Beethoven First Symphony that he was at his best. Whatever scholasticism of treatment might be hinted at in his reading of Haydn was surely absent here, and in its place was a poetic fire and a repressed intensity that did not in the least take away from the grace and vivacity of the composition. Happy were all hearers last night, and happy will they be again at the orchestra's next concert, to-morrow afternoon.

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 28 1913
Establishe

Musical announcements intended for publication in this department must be in the office of the Sunday Journal by Friday noon. They should be addressed to the Music Department of the Sunday Journal

38

THE third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will give importance to the musical offerings of the holiday week, and the new year will be ushered in by the Chopin Club, with a reception and musical tea on Thursday afternoon.

In the churches, the last of four organ recitals will be given this evening at St. Stephen's Church, and at the Beneficent Congregational Church the Christmas programme of last week will be repeated.

* * *

In the programme which Dr. Muck has prepared for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there is a holiday character and cheerful spirit quite in keeping with the season. In its proper order, the programme is as follows: Schubert, Symphony in B-Minor, "Unfinished;" Bizet, suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1; Lalo, overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" Brahms, Concerto in D-major for violin.

Few works in symphonic literature have a firmer hold on the appreciation of the public than the "Unfinished" symphony of Franz Schubert. This is especially curious, since the testimony of history seems to prove that the composer did not place a high value upon it, probably never completing it, and it was lost for many years after his death.

© Aime Dupont

Fritz Kreisler,
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

While it must ever remain a matter of deep regret that the last two movements, if ever written, have been lost, the beauty of the remaining movements makes the symphony, unfinished as it is, one of the most precious legacies that have been bequeathed to posterity by the genius of Schubert.

The four movements, which make the first "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet, are as many parts from the incidental music written by that composer for Alphonse Daudet's play, "The Woman of Arles." The play itself, while holding a high place in dramatic literature, never had popular success, possibly because "The Woman of Arles," who is known only by that title, never appears on the stage. It is questionable if it would ever have been remembered after its first failure in Paris, had it not been for the brilliant, colorful music, written by Bizet as an accompaniment to the play, some of which has been taken over for ballet music in the last act of "Carmen," and is, therefore, not included in the first suite. Had Bizet not won fame, in "Carmen," it is considered that his music for "The Woman of Arles" would have given it to him.

The opera "Le Roi d'Ys," which is based on the old Breton legend of the wicked city of Is, which was engulfed by the sea, is still a favorite in French opera houses, and it is one of the curious facts that no impresario in this country has seen fit to put it on the stage. The music of the overture is not only beautiful in itself, but contains one of the most exquisite solos for 'cello in the literature of music.

As already announced, the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will not play here again during this season. In the Concerto in D-major, by Brahms, that composer, as in his Symphony in C-minor, approaches the lofty heights of Beethoven's genius, and Kreisler, who last year played here the Beethoven Concerto, will give the audience an opportunity to hear the other supreme test of a violinist's skill.

* * *

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914
Established:

MEN AND WOMEN MERELY PLAYERS

"KOENIGSKINDER" at the Opera and the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

WITH all the witchery of a well told fairy tale, "Koenigskinder" was presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last night for the first time this season, and a rapt audience forgot its sophistication and became as little children, while this simple story with hidden symbols gradually unfolded.

Humperdinck's score is now as familiar as his earlier "Hansel und Gretel" and fully as admirable. Last night Alfred Hertz in conducting the work gave due expression to its constantly changing beauty. Miss Farrar as the Goose Girl sang and acted with an unfailing sense of both the outer and inner meaning of her rôle. Her voice was not at its best, but she sang with such discretion that this fact was barely discernible. Carl Jörn as the Prince, Otto Goritz as the Fiddler, Miss Lila Robeson as the Witch and Basil Ruysdael and Albert Reiss as hewers of wood and drawers of water were all consistent figures in the great picture of life in the Hellawald as it is revealed on the stage of the opera house. Robert Leonhardt, appearing as the Innkeeper for the first time, gave the rôle its true value, while Rita Fornia as his daughter and Marie Mattfeld as his stable maid repeated familiar characterizations.

Because of his searching mind, the verve of his baton and his unequalled organization Dr. Muck can dare programmes that no other conductor could risk. Still, subscribers might wel. fear, and perhaps refuse so copious a dosage of naivete as he provided in last night's programme at Carnegie Hall. Here it is in all its rigorous simplicity:—Haydn, symphony in D major, adagio, andante, menuetto, allegro spirituoso; Mozart symphony in E flat major, adagio, andante, menuetto, finale; Beethoven, symphony in C major, adagio, andante cantabile, menuetto, finale. A series of three simple symphonies for the Strauss stricken ears of the New York concertgoers—surely a sufficiency of its sort and a task to make interesting to any but the precise combination of Dr. Muck and his Boston symphonians. It was a real achievement for them to carry it through so successfully and the audience left manifestly much more enlivened and enthusiastic than they had entered.

One must always admire the student in Dr. Muck, his look and bearing hardly permit one to forget it. So if in his programme making he occasionally thinks too much of the student into his enthusiastic audience, it is not fair to criticise. Last night's programme, though seemingly at the glance forbidding, was from the scholar's point of view vitally interesting. The Haydn symphony was first performed in 1795, the Mozart in 1788 and the Beethoven in about 1800. Very seldom do audiences have works written by these giants at the same period brought into such close juxtaposition, and last night's concert demonstrated with interesting clearness that Beethoven, beginning his work in the period of the maturity of Haydn and Mozart, wrote with almost precisely the same idiom, his first symphony being touched only here and there, and then chiefly in the "development," with any color that might be called specially his own, always excepting the wonderful "scherzo" which dissembles itself under the familiar old title "menuetto."

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR

When Miss Beatrice Harrison, the English 'cellist, appeared with the Philharmonic Orchestra recently, her excellent work awakened interest in her further appearances, which was gratified yesterday afternoon when Miss Harrison appeared in recital in Aeolian Hall.

He rema and sons then com grar ...ly and her bowing ... tone

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date
Est 884

Following the plan of alternating classic and modern programmes in a series of concerts the programme which Director Muck has arranged for the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, will be purely classical and will consist of three short symphonies. These are as follows:

Haydn, Symphony in D Major, No. 2
Mozart, Symphony in E Flat Major
Beethoven, Symphony in C Major, No. 1

At the matinee concert he will give an entirely modern programme. It is as follows:

Cesar Franck, Symphony in D Minor
Florent Schmitt, "La Tragedie de Salome."
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, opus 34.

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 1914
Esta 884

Symphony Orchestra At Lyric Next Wednesday

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening. There will be but two numbers on the program—a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Mme. Terese Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat major, No. 5.

The first part of the program will be devoted to Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2. This work has been heard here once before, when Mr. Fiedler was conductor of the orchestra. Sergei Rachmaninoff is the one man among modern Rus-

---

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date N 9
Estab 84

TO-NIGHT'S Boston Symphony audience in Brooklyn will hear a piece of news practically unprecedented for this season. Beginning next fall, the prices of tickets are to be raised. The best chairs at the Academy go up from top theatre rates to $2.50, and even the gallery, where a charge is more quickly felt, makes a modest step from 75 to 90 cents. The reasons for the advance are briefly stated. Prices hitherto have been lower in Brooklyn than in any other place where the Boston visitors play, and have remained substantially the same for more than a quarter of a century.

The prices have been recently raised in other cities. The orchestra, too, has been increased from eighty-seven to 101 musicians. The salaries of the members are larger than they were, and the cost of living at hotels and on trains is higher than ever before. A clinching argument is that the demand for season tickets exceeds the supply. There is a waiting list of those who will gladly pay more for the privilege of attending the concerts than is paid by the fortunate persons holding subscriptions now.

The usual house sold out by the season greeted the Boston Orchestra in Manhattan last night at Carnegie Hall. Three purely classical symphonies made a two-hour bill. If any Homeric nods marked Haydn's D major, No. 2, the slumberers were gently roused by Mozart's E flat and stirred to final departure by Beethoven's First symphony in C major. After a recent equinoctial storm of Mahler, it was all as calm as the cloudless sky of a summer day. The applause was as gentle as the music, and Dr. Muck bowed thrice alone.

At the Brooklyn concert this evening, besides the Beethoven symphony, there are Haydn's Sixth or "Surprise," a Mozart flute and harp concerto for Maquarre and Alfred Holy, and a Handel concerto for strings and wind, with Witek, Longy and Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke, in solo parts.

To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee is all modern, including a Cesar Fr[illegible] symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice" and a new "Tra

---

Address
Date JAN 7
Est

SYMPHONY SOLOIST AT LYRIC CONCER

TERESA CARRENO

Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphoy concert of the season at the Lyric tonight, the number in which she will be heard being Beethoven's celebrated "Emperor" Concerto in E flat major. This piece ranks with the world's musical masterpieces and is a great favorite in Baltimore. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, made a deep impression with it at the Oratorio Society's Musical Festival last spring, his reading having aroused no end of enthusiasm.

The program selected by Director Muck for the concert tonight contains but two numbers, the other being Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2. This work is in E minor and tonight's performance will be only the second it has received in Baltimore. It is regarded as one of the greatest symphonic compositions since Tschaikowsky. Rachmaninoff is a leader among contemporaneous musicians both as a piano virtuoso and as a composer. The composition that brought him his first, and perhaps widest, fame was his prelude in C sharp minor, which became popular to the hackneyed point. It was taken by many as an expression of the revolutionary spirit of young Russia.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date
Establis

Salome's Dances in Musical Form Prove Dramatic

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Music Originally Composed for a Mute Drama.

Salome, that much discussed daug Herodias, was introduced to yest afternoon's audience of the Boston phony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall musical form composed by Mr. F Schmitt, a French composer. The called "La Tragedie de Salome," is i movements, the first representing Prelude and Dance of Pearls, whil second half depicts the Enchantmen the Sea, the Dance of Lightnings an Dance of Fear.

Originally this music was compose accompany a mute drama performe Paris six years ago. Yesterday it gested the necessity of stage pictu make clear its dramatic significance. ultra' modern, abounds in disson and employs a large orchestra, for w Mr. Schmitt has written with skill. first section is uninteresting, but in Dance of the Lightnings and in the Dance of Fear there are highly dra moments.

The audience received the work c there being very little applause afte first section and not much more afte finale. It is hardly the sort of m which invites a second hearing.

The rest of the programme was m more acceptable and was more enthu tically applauded. It began with C Frank's D minor symphony, excelle conducted by Dr. Karl Muck and finely played by his admirable orchestra. The second movement, with its melancholy theme, was singled out for appreciative applause. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which was most brilliantly played and proved the various soloists of this orchestral ensemble to be virtuosi. So the audience went home

---

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 1914
Establish

GLAD RACHMANINOFF SYMPHONY WAS LON

Played by Boston Organiza tion It Charmed Audience at the Lyric.

It depends upon the degree of sens susceptibility as to how and to what extent Rachmaninoff's symphony in minor is enjoyed. This work, togethe with Beethoven's concerto in E flat fo piano and orchestra, constituted the pr gram given by the Boston Symphony Or chestra at the Lyric last night. Mme Teresa Carreno, pianist, was the soloist The concert was the third of the seaso given by the Boston organization. Dr Karl Muck conducted well, especially i the symphony.

When is a symphony not a symphony? When it is long.

This is the strange question and the still stranger answer (in effect) which is heard endlessly among those who discuss music. Interpreted, question and answer mean that when a symphony is long it becomes a rambling composition and loses its distinctive form. This is not logical, and, to say the least, it is no compliment to the mind which created the work. The enormous modern examples of the symphony being created are laid out on such large scales that, regarded from one point of view, their forms are less easily seen than those of the smaller examples. This is because of the enlargement of detail and not because of change of form. The form remains the same. Close to a small building, its form or design is apparent at a glance; viewed from the same distance, the schemes of larger ones become less instantly apparent as the dimensions increase.

So comes the need of perspective for the auditor and onlooker and the ability to appreciate both small and great detail. It is difficult to get perfect proportion in the combination of design and detail. Hence, devotees of the art of music frequently are divided into factions, one leaning to form and the other leaning to detail. If music is ever to mean anything to the world, the world must keep itself free from exacting the all but impossible and give the greater attention to content. Form itself may give real pleasure, but it is the working out of the material form shapes which leaves the great impression.

Conversely, overloaded detail decreases the good effect which otherwise might have been produced. One listened to the Rachmaninoff symphony played last night knowing it was long, glad it was long and he did not care how long it was. So much for the susceptibility of sense! seeking perspective, one began immediately to weigh the claims of form and design, respectively, to see whether the great size of the composition was justified. (Including the intervals between the four movements it requires about one hour and ten minutes for the performance.) Time only will tell. What will be thought of it 100 years from now—as long after it was written as it has been since Beethoven wrote the concerto played last night. Probably it will be thought then, as it is thought now of the concerto, that it is entirely too long. The world owes much to Russian composition, however, very much, and it will owe much more.

Mme. Carreno played splendidly, but the piano had little carrying power. The orchestra lived the music it played, though it probably would have been more expressive in the concerto if more could have been done with the tone of the piano.

J. N. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day, the Longy Ensemble of wind players from America's premier band announces a third concert at Æolian Hall on Saturday night. The programme has been withheld pending the players' arrival.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bu
From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date JAN 9 1914
Establis

THREE SYMPHONIES PLAYED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night through a classical programme that consisted of Haydn's symphony in D minor, Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's first symphony in C major. It was enjoyed by a crowded audience that appreciated the musicianship of the conception and the brilliant playing of the orchestra. If there were something of apparent sameness in the [illegible] positions that savored of one [illegible] Muck is to be forgiven. The[illegible] time or space just now to analy[illegible] difference in the works. Just [illegible] and attention to [illegible]

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 9 1914

Established:

MEN AND WOMEN MERELY PLAYERS

"KOENIGSKINDER" at the Opera and the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

WITH all the witchery of a well told fairy tale, "Koenigskinder" was presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last night for the first time this season, and a rapt audience forgot its sophistication and became as little children, while this simple story with hidden symbols gradually unfolded.

Humperdinck's score is now as familiar as his earlier "Hansel und Gretel" and fully as admirable. Last night Alfred Hertz in conducting the work gave due expression to its constantly changing beauty. Miss Farrar as the Goose Girl sang and acted with an unfailing sense of both the outer and inner meaning of her rôle. Her voice was not at its best, but she sang with such discretion that this fact was barely discernible. Carl Jôrn as the Prince, Otto Goritz as the Fiddler, Miss Lila Robeson as the Witch and Basil Ruysdael and Albert Reiss as hewers of wood and drawers of water were all consistent figures in the great picture of life in the Hellawald as it is revealed on the stage of the opera house. Robert Leonhardt, appearing as the Innkeeper for the first time, gave the rôle its true value, while Rita Fornia as his daughter and Marie Mattfeld as his stable maid repeated familiar characterizations.

Because of his searching mind, the verve of his baton and his unequalled organization Dr. Muck can dare programmes that no other conductor could risk. Still, subscribers might well fear, and perhaps refuse so copious a dosage of naivete as he provided in last night's programme at Carnegie Hall. Here it is in all its rigorous simplicity:—Haydn, symphony in D major, adagio, andante, menuetto, allegro spirituoso; Mozart, symphony in E flat major, adagio, andante, menuetto, finale; Beethoven, symphony in C major, adagio, andante cantabile, menuetto, finale. A series of three simple symphonies for the Strauss stricken ears of the New York concertgoers—surely a sufficiency of its sort and a task to make interesting to any but the precise combination of Dr. Muck and his Boston symphonians. It was a real achievement for them to carry it through so successfully and the audience left manifestly much more enlivened and enthusiastic than they had entered.

One must always admire the student in Dr. Muck, his look and bearing hardly permit one to forget it. So if in his programme making he occasionally thinks too much of the student into his enthusiastic audience, it is not fair to criticise. Last night's programme, though seemingly at glance forbidding, was from the scholar's point of view vitally interesting. The Haydn symphony was first performed in 1795, the Mozart in 1788 and the Beethoven in about 1800. Very seldom do audiences have works written by these giants at the same period brought into such close juxtaposition, and last night's concert demonstrated with interesting clearness that Beethoven, beginning his work in the period of the maturity of Haydn and Mozart, wrote with almost precisely the same idiom, his first symphony being touched only here and there, and then chiefly in the "development," with any color that might be called specially his own, always excepting the wonderful "scherzo" which dissembles itself under the familiar old title "menuetto."

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR

When Miss Beatrice Harrison, the English 'cellist, appeared with the Philharmonic Orchestra recently, her excellent work awakened interest in her further appearances, which was gratified yesterday afternoon when Miss Harrison appeared in recital in Aeolian Hall.

Her playing is masterly and her bowing remarkable. The result is a rich full tone and faultless intonation. In a Boccherini sonata, a Bach suite, a Tschaikowsky theme with variations and several smaller compositions she presented an ideal programme.

Address
Date JAN 7 1

Est

SYMPHONY SOLOIST AT LYRIC CONCER

TERESA CARRENO

Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphoy concert of the season at the Lyric tonight, the number in which she will be heard being Beethoven's celebrated "Emperor" Concerto in E flat major. This piece ranks with the world's musical masterpieces and is a great favorite in Baltimore. Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory, made a deep impression with it at the Oratorio Society's Musical Festival last spring, his reading having aroused no end of enthusiasm.

The program selected by Director Muck for the concert tonight contains but two numbers, the other being Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2. This work is in E minor and tonight's performance will be only the second it has received in Baltimore. It is regarded as one of the greatest symphonic compositions since Tschaikowsky. Rachmaninoff is a leader among contemporaneous musicians both as a piano virtuoso and as a composer. The composition that brought him his first, and perhaps widest, fame was his prelude in C sharp minor, which became popular to the hackneyed point. It was taken by many as an expression of the revolutionary spirit of young Russia.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 1914

Establish

GLAD RACHMANINOFF SYMPHONY WAS LON

Played by Boston Organization It Charmed Audience at the Lyric.

It depends upon the degree of sens susceptibility as to how and to what extent Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor is enjoyed. This work, togethe with Beethoven's concerto in E flat fo piano and orchestra, constituted the pro gram given by the Boston Symphony Or chestra at the Lyric last night. Mme Teresa Carreno, pianist, was the soloist The concert was the third of the seaso given by the Boston organization. Dr Karl Muck conducted well, especially i the symphony.

When is a symphony not a symphony? When it is long.

This is the strange question and the still stranger answer (in effect) which is heard endlessly among those who discuss music. Interpreted, question and answer mean that when a symphony is long it becomes a rambling composition and loses its distinctive form. This is not logical, and, to say the least, it is no compliment to the mind which created the work. The enormous modern examples of the symphony being created are laid out on such large scales that, regarded from one point of view, their forms are less easily seen than those of the smaller examples. This is because of the enlargement of detail and not because of change of form. The form remains the same. Close to a small building, its form or design is apparent at a glance; viewed from the same distance, the schemes of larger ones become less instantly apparent as the dimensions increase.

So comes the need of perspective for the auditor and onlooker and the ability to appreciate both small and great detail. It is difficult to get perfect proportion in the combination of design and detail. Hence, devotees of the art of music frequently are divided into factions, one leaning to form and the other leaning to detail. If music is ever to mean anything to the world, the world must keep itself free from exacting the all but impossible and give the greater attention to content. Form itself may give real pleasure, but it is the working out of the material form shapes which leaves the great impression.

Conversely, overloaded detail decreases the good effect which otherwise might have been produced. One listened to the Rachmaninoff symphony played last night knowing it was long, glad it was long and he did not care how long it was. So much for the susceptibility of sense! seeking perspective, one began immediately to weigh the claims of form and design, respectively, to see whether the great size of the composition was justified. (Including the intervals between the four movements it requires about one hour and ten minutes for the performance.) Time only will tell. What will be thought of it 100 years from now—as long after it was written as it has been since Beethoven wrote the concerto played last night. Probably it will be thought then, as it is thought now of the concerto, that it is entirely too long. The world owes much to Russian composition, however, very much, and it will owe much more.

Mme. Carreno played splendidly, but the piano had little carrying power. The orchestra lived the music it played, though it probably would have been more expressive in the concerto if more could have been done with the tone of the piano.

J. N. H.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
1914
Date

Following the plan of alternating classic and modern programmes in a series of concerts the programme which Director Muck has arranged for the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, will be purely classical and will consist of three short symphonies. These are as follows:

Haydn, Symphony in D Major, No. 2
Mozart, Symphony in E Flat Major
Beethoven, Symphony in C Major, No. 1

At the matinee concert he will give an entirely modern programme. It is as follows:

Cesar Franck, Symphony in D Minor
Florent Schmitt, "La Tragedie de Salome."
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, opus 34.

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 4 1914

Esta 884

Symphony Orchestra At Lyric Next Wednesday

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening. There will be but two numbers on the program—a symphony and a piano concerto. The soloist will be Mme. Terese Carreno, one of the really great virtuosos of our time. She will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat major, No. 5.

The first part of the program will be devoted to Bachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2. This work has been heard here once before, when Mr. Fiedler was conductor of the orchestra. Sergei Rachmaninoff is the one man among modern Rus-

---

Symphony audi... Brooklyn will hear a ...ows practically unprecedented this season. Beginning next fall, the prices of tickets are to be raised. The best chairs at the Academy go up from top theatre rates to $2.50, and even the gallery, where a charge is more quickly felt, makes a modest step from 75 to 90 cents. The reasons for the advance are briefly stated. Prices hitherto have been lower in Brooklyn than in any other place where the Boston visitors play, and have remained substantially the same for more than a quarter of a century.

The prices have been recently raised in other cities. The orchestra, too, has been increased from eighty-seven to 101 musicians. The salaries of the members are larger than they were, and the cost of living at hotels and on trains is higher than ever before. A clinching argument is that the demand for season tickets exceeds the supply. There is a waiting list of those who will gladly pay more for the privilege of attending the concerts than is paid by the fortunate persons holding subscriptions now.

The usual house sold out by the season greeted the Boston Orchestra in Manhattan last night at Carnegie Hall. Three purely classical symphonies made a two-hour bill. If any Homeric nods marked Haydn's D major, No. 2, the slumberers were gently roused by Mozart's E flat and stirred to final departure by Beethoven's First symphony in C major. After a recent equinoctial storm of Mahler, it was all as calm as the cloudless sky of a summer day. The applause was as gentle as the music, and Dr. Muck bowed thrice alone.

At the Brooklyn concert this evening, besides the Beethoven symphony, there are Haydn's Sixth or "Surprise," a Mozart flute and harp concerto for Maquarre and Alfred Holy, and a Handel concerto for strings and wind, with Witek, Longy and Mueller, Wendler and Jaennicke, in solo parts.

To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee is all modern, including a Cesar Fr... symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice" and a new "Tra...

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Establis

Salome's Dances in Musical Form Prove Dramatic

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Music Originally Composed for a Mute Drama.

Salome, that much discussed daughter of Herodias, was introduced to yesterday afternoon's audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall in a musical form composed by Mr. Florent Schmitt, a French composer. The suite, called "La Tragedie de Salome," is in two movements, the first representing the Prelude and Dance of Pearls, while the second half depicts the Enchantment on the Sea, the Dance of Lightnings and the Dance of Fear.

Originally this music was composed to accompany a mute drama performed in Paris six years ago. Yesterday it suggested the necessity of stage pictures to make clear its dramatic significance. It is ultra modern, abounds in dissonances and employs a large orchestra, for which Mr. Schmitt has written with skill. The first section is uninteresting, but in the Dance of the Lightnings and in the final Dance of Fear there are highly dramatic moments.

The audience received the work coolly, there being very little applause after the first section and not much more after the finale. It is hardly the sort of music which invites a second hearing.

The rest of the programme was much more acceptable and was more enthusiastically applauded. It began with Cesar Frank's D minor symphony, excellently conducted by Dr. Karl Muck and finely played by his admirable orchestra. The second movement, with its melancholy theme, was singled out for appreciative applause. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which was most brilliantly played and proved the various soloists of this orchestral ensemble to be virtuosi. So the audience went home

---

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING SUN
ss: New York
JAN

WITH the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day, the Longy nsemble of wind players from Amer-a's premier band announces a third cert at Æolian Hall on Saturday
ht. The programme has been with-pending the players' arrival.

London, 1881; New York, 188

---

paper Cutting Bu
ENING WORLD
: New York
JAN 9 1914

THREE SYMPHONIES PLAYED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night through a classical programme that consisted of Haydn's symphony in D minor, Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's first symphony in C major. It was enjoyed by a crowded audience that appreciated the musicianship of the conception and the brilliant playing of the orchestra. If there were something of apparent sameness in the compositions that savored of one mind, Dr. Muck is to be forgiven. There is no time or space just now to analyze the difference in the works. Just a ... all attention to

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R
Date DEC 31 191

FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Organization Presents 2 1-2-Hour Programme Here.

Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra increased the time limit of its programme and its third concert last evening in Infantry Hall held the attention of a large audience for nearly two hours and a half, with a programme of considerable variety and an unusual amount of melody, which, with Fritz Kreisler as a soloist, left little to be desired.

It was a matter of regret, of course, that the indisposition of Dr. Muck prevented his appearance, and obliged Mr. Urack to fill his place, but Mr. Urack who last year on one or two similar occasions appeared in the same position has been steadily growing in experience and favor, and if one felt occasionally in the symphony, a possibility that Dr Muck might have been more subtly suggestive, it was no more than a c of possibility, and he ably filled in the rest of the programme, was arranged in the following or

Schubert ..... Unfinished Symphony in
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
Bizet......Suite No. 1, from the Music phonse Daudet's Play, "L'Arlesienne"
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Lalo...............Overture to "Le Ro
Brahms......Concerto in D-major, for Vi Orchestra, Op. 77.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo

Modern music, with its surpris strange chords and its exciting sonances, undoubtedly has charm those who like novelty, and wh constantly seeking the exciteme change; but to those who apprecia sincerity of true melody, there is beauty in the flowing themes o symphony that Schubert left unfinished and never heard played.

Louis Elson once prophesied that in time there will be a reaction from the noise of modern music, and that "melody will return, and Music, heavenly maid, will become young again." Last night, as one listened to the delicacy of the strings and the limpid notes of the wood-wind choir as they played their changes on the themes, one realized that in the undying beauty of the melody of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the heavenly maid was ever young. Even if, as has been said, Schubert lacked the technical skill to develop his themes, he was so greatly blessed in his gift of melody, that between the variety of his themes and the color of his instrumentation, one feels no further need. He is never commonplace, nor dull, and the buoyancy of his music as it swings from grave to gay is soul-satisfying to an idealist.

The symphony has been heard here at more than one Symphony concert. It was a favorite with Mr. Gericke when he was conductor and he chose it for the concert at which he made his farewell appearance here. Last night the two movements were admirably played, but not more so than the succeeding numbers.

Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," which was played here first nearly 20 years ago, was, in its way, a wide contrast to the symphony, but a tuneful, stirring succession of four movements of great variety met with much favor from the audience, especially the "Minuetto."

Likewise Lalo's overture to "Le Ro d'Ys" was brilliantly played and giver its full dramatic value, rounding out the first part of the programme and providing still further interest.

To many the crowning quality of the programme was that which came last the Brahms Concerto in D-major fo violin and orchestra, in which Frit Kreisler was the soloist.

In the years since Kreisler first ap peared here in the Students' Course, h has forged steadily onward, playing eac year with greater interpretative skill an more compelling beauty of tone, yet pre serving his simplicity of manner an accepting the appreciation bestowed upo him with an entire absence of self-con sciousness that ranks him with th world's greatest artists.

Last year he played the Beethove Concerto with compelling force, and las night the audience had an opportunit to her the Concerto by Brahms playe by the same hand. It was a brillian performance, Mr. Kreisler meeting th demands of the composition with a per fection of technique, inspired by the re sources of an artistic temperament, and playing with admirable effect.

The fourth concert will be given or Feb. 3 with Mme. Teresa Carreno, wh is considered the greatest woman pianis as soloist.

A. W. C.

The First Established and Most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

It is like the great sword of an old general covered with elaborate detail of ornamentation, but still as strong as ever. The old ideas of the masters are still present in it, but made more effective by the large orchestra of modern instruments, allowing a greater expansion in the instrumentation. This modern use of the multitude of instruments allows a variety to the ear in what appears like repetition, making the changing music the same and yet not the same, either in fact or effect. The symphony is a complete demonstration of the fact that the true possibilities of musical composition are yet far from exhausted, and that even R. Strauss and Elgar are not yet near the last word in musical writings. People are beginning to realize the axiom in musical art that whatever really sounds well, is well, as in tecture what actually looks well is The present in art will never be a set limits for the future. But i always be true that whatever . fo cause sounds bad, is bad. Still alphabet of progress the prospect must follow the A already achieved.

The next concert brings a gre prano, Madame Elizabeth Van En

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
JAN 10 1914
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Classic Programme Strong in Unity Superbly Given at Academy.

To say that yesterday's Academy of Music concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was caviar for the general without a sop to Cerberus, is to employ a metaphor as mixed as Dr. Muck's programme was unified. Haydn, Mozart, Handel and Beethoven—the master being represented by his most Mozartian symphony—provide a combination of effects which no orchestra can develop or differentiate so well as the Bostonian under the classic leadership of Dr. Muck. And it is difficult to quarrel with him for making us more familiar with the great orchestral pieces of another century in the best interpretation possible to modern musical genius. It should be added that in the ten-minute conversazione between the two halves of last night's concert some murmurs of protest against the classic rigors of the programme were heard, especially from such representatives of masculinity as were on duty rather than on pleasure bent.

The most interesting number of the programme was the Mozart "Concerto for Flute and Harp," delightfully simple and appealing to the ear, yet calling for a degree of virtuosity which only those somewhat familiar with the solo instruments can appreciate. Andre Maquarre's performance of the delicious runs and thrills in the "andantino" and the "rondo," resembling now the singing of a bird. And, again, the soft crooning of a woman was a revelation of the flute as an expression of human emotion. The passages which Mozart provided for the harp seemed less inspired largely because the mechanical possibilities of this instrument had not been developed in his day. Nevertheless, Alfred Holy did wonders with them, and in the solo passages of the last two movements brought out some very pleasing effects.

In Haydn's "Surprise" symphony the sudden fortisimo in the andante brought forth the usual ripple of response from the audience although the "Paukenschlag," as given yesterday, seemed a very mild affair compared to those auricular assaults with which Wagner, et al., have made us familiar. The pure classic spirit was abroad in the number. As the first on the programme, the mind was still fresh to receive it, and its chaste and yet spirited interpretation by Dr. Muck and his men will keep it in memory as a supreme example of the eighteenth century spirit in music.

The broad, majestic lines of Handel's "Concerto in F Major" for strings and two wind orchestras were well preserved, and the first Beethoven symphony rounded out the successfully unified programme. Each time he returns Dr. Muck gives the impression of having established a closer and more intimate relation with the members of his orchestra, so that an inclination of the head or a slight movement of the hand wins the response which other conductors achieve with elaborate gesticulation. For such a programme as that of last night the leader and the orchestra are supreme.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date AN 7 1914

Boston Symphony Concert

A large and distinguished audience crowded the New National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Thomas Marshall, wife of the Vice President, was entertained by Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh in her box, who also had with her Mrs. Robert Petterson, Viscount Benoist d'Azy, and Capt. and Mrs. D. S. Vassilieff.

Other boxholders were Brig. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, who had with them Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British Ambassador, and Mrs. Huntington Wilson; the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who were accompanied by Mrs. Chandler Hale; Mrs. Marshall Field, who had with her Mrs. Drummond, Mrs. Harriet Lane Beale, Mrs. Slater, and Miss Patten; Mrs. James McMillan entertained Mrs. Alfred E. Bates and Mrs. Preston Gibson; Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe entertained a number of friends in her box, as did Mrs. Listner and Mrs. I. T. Mann.

Others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs.

John Hays, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mme. van Swinderen, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess Henri de Sibour, Miss Gwynn, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mr. and Mrs. Wayne MacVeagh, Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Miss Harriet Peckham, Mme. de Pena, Miss de Pena, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. William D. Mearns, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Marian Sands, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Natalie Magruder, Mrs. Victor Murdock, Mrs. Robert Wynne, Mrs. Richard A. Johnson, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, and Mrs. Charles McKenny.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date AN 7 1914

SUCCESS IS SCORED BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mme. Teresa Carreno Also Plays Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto with Artistic Finish.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at th National Theater, yesterday afternoon gave the third of its matinees for th season in Washington. Mme. Teres Carreno, the renowned pianist, playe Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto. Th symphony was the E flat major of Mo zart, and Brahms' "Tragic" overtur and the overture to Wagner's "Flyin Dutchman," completed the program.

No man is better suited to play Mozart than Dr. Muck. The exquisite grace and loveliness of phrase requires just the fine artistic finish in every least detail that Dr. Muck gives. Wherever pure aesthetic beauty, passion, is to be portrayed, Dr. Muck is far and away above every other conductor in An [illegible] a. [illegible] e did not know which to admire [illegible] the dainty arabesque work of the andante, or the breezy finals, in which the dominating motive of eight or nine notes was so subtlety managed as to make the figure a winged flight of melody above the lo moving harmonies.

Brahms' "Academic" overture [illegible] played here last year; yesterday his "Tragic" overture. The experimental stage for Brahms' music has hardly yet passed for many musicians. But whether or not he is to be placed in th role of pioneers or classed as a Bach-Beethoven imitator, the sincerity, and absolute beauty of much of his music makes such questions come very near quibble. The "Tragic" overture has very little of the tragic character.

The player of Beethoven must unite a warm heart with a clear intellect. This Mme. Carreno does. She played the concerto with great artistic finish as to detail. Her technic is fully adequate to the needs of that work. She lacks only power to make her work truly great. So far as physical strength would go, her playing of the concerto was that of a careful, musicianly, and inspired artist. The subordination of the piano to the solo orchestra, wherever those occurred, was exquisitely done Her runs and thrills were dainty and lovely.

The orchestral rendering of the "Dutchman" was highly dramatic and thoroughly satisfying.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 6 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY THIRD CONCERT

Haydn's G Major and Mozart's E-Flat Major Played—Carreno the Soloist.

PROGRAM.
Haydn..Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 6.)
Mozart..Symphony, E flat major (K. 543)
Beethoven..Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist...............Teresa Carreno.

Three numbers constituted the Boston Symphony's third concert this season at the Academy of Music last evening, Theresa Carreno being the soloist. There were two symphonies, Haydn's G major ("The Surprise") and Mozart's E-flat major, while the concerto played by Carreno was Beethoven's No. 5, also in E-flat major. It was a program that was classical to the extreme, but most thoroughly enjoyable. It is rarely that Haydn and Mozart, two composers of practically the same period, are heard in the same program, but "The Surprise" is the gem of Haydn's long works, as far as melodiousness is concerned, and Mozart's E-flat major is the brightest and most sparkling of his long compositions, and yet the two following one another presented so much variety that monotony was not suggested.

Haydn's G major is frequently childlike in its simplicity, but the admirable handling by Dr. Muck and his orchestra makes it big and broad and appealing. Especially effective cate manner in which the andante movement was handled, the big combination being subdued at times almost to a musical whisper, an art in which Dr. Muck has drilled his men to a degree of perfection such as no other leader has been able to accomplish.

The reading of the Mozart symphony was equally admirable, bringing out all its brightness, its shimmer, its plasticity as well as its beauty of pattern. Dr. Muck presented all the beauties that the genius of Mozart had worked into it, and especially was this true of the playing of the "Menuetto."

Madame Carreno was heard here for the third time within as many wee and in one of the greatest of conc numbers for the piano, Beethoven's No. 5. In the long list it is, in many ways, the most exacting of all the big solo numbers, requiring a technical mastery possessed by but a few artists, and no one of them has ever played it with more feeling that Carreno. To the credit of Dr. Muck it must be said that he demonstrated a wonderful mastery over the acccompaniment in order that the audience could enjoy to the greatest extent the pianist's finished art.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony will be given on February 16, when the soloist will be Madame Elizabeth Van Endert, a German lyric soprano, who will be heard in Philadelphia for the first time.

NIXON—"THE ATTORNEYS"

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date JAN 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH CARREN

Pianist in Beethoven Con Follows Delightful Perform ance of Haydn and Mozar Symphonies.

PROGRAM.
Symphony in G major, "Surprise".....Hayd
Symphony, E flat major (K. 543)......Moz
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5......Beeth
Madame Teresa Carreno.

It would be wide of the mark to say that the concert of the Boston Symph Orchestra, heard by the usual "capacity" audience at the Academy last evening was severely classical. For, though th program was given over to Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the "Surprise" symphony is the very essence of the blithe and sunny temperament of its composer and at the playful thunderstrokes of the Andante, the hearers laughed outright. Their accentuation was the more forceful since Conductor Muck had reduced the lisping phrases that preceded them to the merest audible whisper, creating a profound hush throughout the auditorium to make certain of not losing a syllable.

The entire symphony was set forth in a way that showed a true apprehension of the first and the best of musical humorists; through the last movement ran the "delight and liberty" of children turned loose in blue jeans to play in the sand pile. This was Haydn restored to the contemporary atmosphere—yet every phrase was brought to life and exhilarating freshness as though of today: it was no half-hearted attempt to revive moldering archaisms.

The playing of the more sophisticated core of Mozart continued the impression f the exactitude of clockwork with the old and pulseless mechanism replaced by he warm and breathing vitality of human inspiration. As in the Andante of Haydn, the oboe and flute caroled and warbled exquisitely together, so in the Mozart Menuett they answered each other so feliciously that but for the different timbre, it vould have been hard to tell where one eft off and the other took up the strain.

Mr. Muck had seated the players so t but four of the first violins and two the second were upon the lowest level, d the arrangement brought the piano t the apex of the triangle of the strings.

The soloist, Madame Carreno, has just been heard here with the Philadelphia Orchestra and in one of the excellent Y. M. H. A. concerts at Witherspoon Hall. Last night she elected to play the Beethoven Concerto No. 5, in E flat major, and played it like the great artist she is. It was a thoughtful, reverent interpretation. Here was no disposition to disclose the "Valkyrie of the Pianoforte," as Madame Carreno was called some years ago.

It was a reading that made common cause with the superlative accompaniment produced by Mr. Muck and his associates; the piano part was built into the polyphony instead of domineering. The concerto must have been all but impossible to the piano technique of Beethoven's day. The runs and arpeggios fell from the player's fingers in the very poetry of motion, and—in staccato passages—with the the clear detachment of the notes of the xylophone. Such playing as that of the adagio only issues from a deep experience of life, and for the technique it may be said that more beautiful trills are hardly producible by human fingers. And what a celestial voice, again, was that of Maquarre's flute heard in the background a little later! It was a masterpiece in the ensemble, orchestra and soloist dividing the honors. Though the concerto came at the end of the evening, Madame Carreno was many times recalled, and would, of course, have been encored had the long-standing rule permitted. Her artistic triumph was the more remarkable in view of the fact that by an extraordinary oversight the piano on which she played had not been accurately tuned in its upper octaves.

WITH THE MINSTREL MEN

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 19

Triumph for Boston Symphony

A remarkable triumph, ever for Boston Symphony Orchestra, was its concert last evening at the Lpric, under its director, Dr. Karl Muck, with Teresa Carreno as soloist. The following was the unique program, constructed by the well-instructetd musical scribe who brought forth music, both old and new:

Rachmaninoff—I. Largo—allegro moderato. II. Allegro molto. III. Adagio. IV. Allegro vivace.

Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat mapor. Op. 73. I. Allegro. II. Adagio un poco moto. III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

As will be seen, there were but two numbers on the program, both great master works, a century apart in their dates, but each the best of its time. For no one will question the supremacy of Beethoven's E flat Emperor piano concerto, nor has anyone put forth a stronger, fuller, more complete, melodious and harmonious symphony than that of the Rachmaninoff. He is very mod-

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R
Date DEC 31 1913

FRITZ KREISLER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Organization Presents 2 1-2-Hour Programme Here.

Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra increased the time limit of its programme and its third concert last evening in Infantry Hall held the attention of a large audience for nearly two hours and a half, with a programme of considerable variety and an unusual amount of melody, which, with Fritz Kreisler as a soloist, left little to be desired.

It was a matter of regret, of course, that the indisposition of Dr. Muck prevented his appearance, and obliged Mr. Urack to fill his place, but Mr. Urack who last year on one or two similar occasions appeared in the same position has been steadily growing in experience and favor, and if one felt occasionally in the symphony, a possibility that Dr. Muck might have been more subtly suggestive, it was no more than a question of possibility, and he ably filled his part in the rest of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Schubert ..... Unfinished Symphony in B-minor
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andunte con moto.
Bizet......Suite No. 1, from the Music for Alphonse Daudet's Play, "L'Arlesienne"
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Lalo................Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"
Brahms.....Concerto in D-major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

Modern music, with its surprises, its strange chords and its exciting dissonances, undoubtedly has charms for those who like novelty, and who are constantly seeking the excitement of change; but to those who appreciate the sincerity of true melody, there is great beauty in the flowing themes of the symphony that Schubert left unfinished and never heard played.

Louis Elson once prophesied that in time there will be a reaction from the noise of modern music, and that "melody will return, and Music, heavenly maid, will become young again." Last night, as one listened to the delicacy of the strings and the limpid notes of the wood-wind choir as they played their changes on the themes, one realized that in the undying beauty of the melody of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the heavenly maid was ever young. Even if, as has been said, Schubert lacked the technical skill to develop his themes, he was so greatly blessed in his gift of melody, that between the variety of his themes and the color of his instrumentation, one feels no further need. He is never commonplace, nor dull, and the buoyancy of his music as it swings from grave to gay is soul-satisfying to an idealist.

The symphony has been heard here at more than one Symphony concert. It was a favorite with Mr. Gericke when he was conductor and he chose it for the concert at which he made his farewell appearance here. Last night the two movements were admirably played, but not more so than the succeeding numbers.

Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," which was played here first nearly 20 years ago, was, in its way, a wide contrast to the symphony, but a tuneful, stirring succession of four movements of great variety met with much favor from the audience, especially the "Minuetto."

Likewise Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" was brilliantly played and given its full dramatic value, rounding out the first part of the programme and providing still further interest.

To many the crowning quality of the programme was that which came last the Brahms Concerto in D-major for violin and orchestra, in which Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

In the years since Kreisler first appeared here in the Students' Course, he has forged steadily onward, playing each year with greater interpretative skill and more compelling beauty of tone, yet preserving his simplicity of manner and accepting the appreciation bestowed upon him with an entire absence of self-consciousness that ranks him with the world's greatest artists.

Last year he played the Beethoven Concerto with compelling force, and last night the audience had an opportunity to her the Concerto by Brahms played by the same hand. It was a brilliant performance, Mr. Kreisler meeting the demands of the composition with a perfection of technique, inspired by the resources of an artistic temperament, and playing with admirable effect.

The fourth concert will be given on Feb. 3 with Mme. Teresa Carreno, who is considered the greatest woman pianist, as soloist.

A. W. C.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 1914

Triumph for Boston Symphony.

A remarkable triumph, ever for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was its concert last evening at the Lpric, under its director, Dr. Karl Muck, with Teresa Carreno as soloist. The following was the unique program, constructed by the well-instructetd musical scribe who brought forth music, both old and new:

Rachmaninoff—I. Largo—allegro moderato. II. Allegro molto. III. Adagio. IV. Allegro vivace.

Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat mapor. Op. 73. E. Allegro. II. Adagio un poco moto. III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

As will be seen, there were but two numbers on the program, both great master works, a century apart in their dates, but each the best of its time. For no one will question the supremacy of Beethoven's E flat Emperor piano concerto, nor has anyone put forth a stronger, fuller, more complete, melodious and harmonious symphony than that of the Rachmaninoff. He is very mod-

It is like the great sword of an old general covered with elaborate detail of ornamentation, but still as strong as ever. The old ideas of the masters are still present in it, but made more effective by the large orchestra of modern instruments, allowing a greater expansion in the instrumentation. This modern use of the multitude of instruments allows a variety to the ear in what appears like repetition, making the changing music the same and yet not the same, either in fact or effect. The symphony is a complete demonstration of the fact that the true possibilities of musical composition are yet far from exhausted, and that even R. Strauss and Elgar are not yet near the last word in musical writings. People are beginning to realize the axiom in musical art that whatever really sounds well, is well, as in architecture what actually looks well is well. The present in art will never be able to set limits for the future. But it will always be true that whatever . for any cause sounds bad, is bad. Still in the alphabet of progress the prospective B must follow the A already achieved.

The next concert brings a great soprano, Madame Elizabeth Van Endert.

stablished and Most Complete
Cutting Bureau in the World

AGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y. JAN 10 1914

TON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

sic Programme Strong in Unity Superbly Given at Academy.

say that yesterday's Academy of c concert of the Boston Symphony estra was caviar for the general out a sop to Cerberus, is to employ etaphor as mixed as Dr. Muck's programme was unified. Haydn, Mozart, Handel and Beethoven—the master being represented by his most Mozartian symphony—provide a combination of effects which no orchestra can develop or differentiate so well as the Bostonian under the classic leadership of Dr. Muck. And it is difficult to quarrel with him for making us more familiar with the great orchestral pieces of another century in the best interpretation possible to modern musical genius. It should be added that in the ten-minute conversazione between the two halves of last night's concert some murmurs of protest against the classic rigors of the programme were heard, especially from such representatives of masculinity as were on duty rather than on pleasure bent.

The most interesting number of the programme was the Mozart "Concerto for Flute and Harp," delightfully simple and appealing to the ear, yet calling for a degree of virtuosity which only those somewhat familiar with the solo instruments can appreciate. Andre Maquarre's performance of the delicious runs and thrills in the "andantino" and the "rondo," resembling now the singing of a bird. And, again, the soft crooning of a woman was a revelation of the flute as an expression of human emotion. The passages which Mozart provided for the harp seemed less inspired largely because the mechanical possibilities of this instrument had not been developed in his day. Nevertheless, Alfred Holy did wonders with them, and in the solo passages of the last two movements brought out some very pleasing effects.

In Haydn's "Surprise" symphony the sudden fortisimo in the andante brought forth the usual ripple of response from the audience although the "Paukenschlag," as given yesterday, seemed a very mild affair compared to those auricular assaults with which Wagner, et al., have made us familiar. The pure classic spirit was abroad in the number. As the first on the programme, the mind was still fresh to receive it, and its chaste and yet spirited interpretation by Dr. Muck and his men will keep it in memory as a supreme example of the eighteenth century spirit in music.

The broad, majestic lines of Handel's "Concerto in F Major" for strings and two wind orchestras were well preserved, and the first Beethoven symphony rounded out the successfully unified programme. Each time he returns Dr. Muck gives the impression of having established a closer and more intimate relation with the members of his orchestra, so that an inclination of the head or a slight movement of the hand wins the response which other conductors achieve with elaborate gesticulation. For such a programme as that of last night the r and the orchestra are supreme.

HERALD
: Washington, D. C.
AN 7 1914

Boston Symphony Concert

A large and distinguished audience crowded the New National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Thomas Marshall, wife of the Vice President, was entertained by Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh in her box, who also had with her Mrs. Robert Petterson, Viscount Benoist d'Azy, and Capt. and Mrs. D. S. Vassilieff.

Other boxholders were Brig. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier, who had with them Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador; Lady Spring-Rice, wife of the British Ambassador, and Mrs. Huntington Wilson; the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who were accompanied by Mr. Chandler Hale; Mrs. Marshall Field, who had with her Mrs. Drummond, Mrs. Harriet Lane Beale, Mrs. Slater, and Miss Patten; Mrs. James McMillan entertained Mrs. Alfred E. Bates and Mrs. Preston Gibson; Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe entertained a number of friends in her box, as did Mrs. Listner and Mrs. I. T. Mann.

Others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. John Hays, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mme. van Swinderen, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess Henri de Sibour, Miss Gwynn, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mr. and Mrs. Wayne MacVeagh, Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Miss Harriet Peckham, Mme. de Pena, Miss de Pena, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. William D. Mearns, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Marian Sands, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. William Kearney Carr, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Natalie Magruder, Mrs. Victor Murdock, Mrs. Robert Wynne, Mrs. Richard A. Johnson, Mrs. Lloyd Bowers, and Mrs. Charles McKenny.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
AN 7 1914

CESS IS SCORED BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mme. Teresa Carreno Also Plays Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto with Artistic Finish.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater, yesterday afternoon, gave the third of its matinees for the season in Washington. Mme. Teresa Carreno, the renowned pianist, played Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto. The symphony was the E flat major of Mozart, and Brahms' "Tragic" overture, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," completed the program.

No man is better suited to play Mozart than Dr. Muck. The exquisite grace and loveliness of phrase requires just the fine artistic finish in every least detail that Dr. Muck gives. Wherever pure aesthetic beauty, passion, is to be portrayed, Dr. Muck is far and away above every other conductor in Am[illegible]. [illegible] did not know which to admire [illegible] the dainty arabesque work of the andante, or the breezy finals, in which the dominating motive of eight or nine notes was so subtlety managed as to make the figure a winged flight of melody above the [illegible] moving harmonies.

Brahms' "Academic" overture [illegible] played here last year; yesterday his "Tragic" overture. The experimental stage for Brahms' music has hardly yet passed for many musicians. But whether or not he is to be placed in the role of pioneers or classed as a Bach-Beethoven imitator, the sincerity, and absolute beauty of much of his music makes such questions come very near quibble. The "Tragic" overture has very little of the tragic character.

The player of Beethoven must unite a warm heart with a clear intellect. This Mme. Carreno does. She played the concerto with great artistic finish as to detail. Her technic is fully adequate to the needs of that work. She lacks only power to make her work truly great. So far as physical strength would go, her playing of the concerto was that of a careful, musicianly, and inspired artist. The subordination of the piano to the solo orchestra, wherever those occurred, was exquisitely done. Her runs and thrills were dainty and lovely.

The orchestral rendering of the "Dutchman" was highly dramatic and thoroughly satisfying.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 6 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY THIRD CONCERT

Haydn's G Major and Mozart's E-Flat Major Played—Carreno the Soloist.

PROGRAM.
Haydn..Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 6.)
M zart..Symphony, E flat major (K. 543)
Beethoven..Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
Conductor........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist..............Teresa Carreno.

Three numbers constituted the Boston Symphony's third concert this season at the Academy of Music last evening, Theresa Carreno being the soloist. There were two symphonies, Haydn's G major ("The Surprise") and Mozart's E-flat major, while the concerto played by Carreno was Beethoven's No. 5, also in E-flat major. It was a program that was classical to the extreme, but most thoroughly enjoyable. It is rarely that Haydn and Mozart, two composers of practically the same period, are heard in the same program, but "The Surprise" is the gem of Haydn's long works, as far as melodiousness is concerned, and Mozart's E-flat major is the brightest and most sparkling of his long compositions, and yet the two following one another presented so much variety that monotony was not suggested.

Haydn's G major is frequently childlike in its simplicity, but the admirable handling by Dr. Muck and his orchestra makes it big and broad and appealing. Especially effective cate manner in which the andante movement was handled, the big combination being subdued at times almost to a musical whisper, an art in which Dr. Muck has drilled his men to a degree of perfection such as no other leader has been able to accomplish.

The reading of the Mozart symphony was equally admirable, bringing out all its brightness, its shimmer, its plasticity as well as its beauty of pattern. Dr. Muck presented all the beauties that the genius of Mozart had worked into it, and especially was this true of the playing of the "Menuetto."

Madame Carreno was heard here for the third time within as many weeks and in one of the greatest of concert numbers for the piano, Beethoven's No. 5. In the long list it is, in many ways, the most exacting of all the big solo numbers, requiring a technical mastery possessed by but a few artists, and no one of them has ever played it with more feeling that Carreno. To the credit of Dr. Muck it must be said that he demonstrated a wonderful mastery over the acccompaniment in order that the audience could enjoy to the greatest extent the pianist's finished art.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony will be given on February 16, when the soloist will be Madame Elizabeth Van Endert, a German lyric soprano, who will be heard in Philadelphia for the first time.

NIXON—"THE ATTORNEYS"

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia
JAN 6

BOSTON SYMPHO WITH CAR

Pianist in Beethoven Con Follows Delightful Performance of Haydn and Mo Symphonies.

PROGRAM.
Symphony in G major, "Surprise".....Hay
Symphony, E flat major (K. 543)......Mo
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5......Beeth
Madame Teresa Carreno.

It would be wide of the mark to say that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard by the usual "capacity" audience at the Academy last evening, was severely classical. For, though the program was given over to Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the "Surprise" symphony is the very essence of the blithe and sunny temperament of its composer, and at the playful thunderstrokes of the Andante, the hearers laughed outright. Their accentuation was the more forceful since Conductor Muck had reduced the lisping phrases that preceded them to the merest audible whisper, creating a profound hush throughout the auditorium to make certain of not losing a syllable.

The entire symphony was set forth in a way that showed a true apprehension of the first an d the best of musical humorists; through the last movement ran the "delight and liberty" of children turned loose in blue jeans to play in the sand pile. This was Haydn restored to the contemporary atmosphere—yet every phrase was brought to life and exhilarating freshness as though of today: it was no half-hearted attempt to revive moldering archaisms.

The playing of the more sophisticated score of Mozart continued the impression of the exactitude of clockwork with the cold and pulseless mechanism replaced by the warm and breathing vitality of human inspiration. As in the Andante of Haydn, the oboe and flute caroled and warbled exquisitely together, so in the Mozart Menuett they answered each other so felicitously that but for the different timbre, it would have been hard to tell where one left off and the other took up the strain.

Mr. Muck had seated the players so that but four of the first violins and two of the second were upon the lowest level, and the arrangement brought the piano at the apex of the triangle of the strings.

The soloist, Madame Carreno, has just been heard here with the Philadelphia Orchestra and in one of the excellent Y. M. H. A. concerts at Witherspoon Hall. Last night she elected to play the Beethoven Concerto No. 5, in E flat major, and played it like the great artist she is. It was a thoughtful, reverent interpretation. Here was no disposition to disclose the "Valkyrie of the Pianoforte," as Madame Carreno was called some years ago.

It was a reading that made common cause with the superlative accompaniment produced by Mr. Muck and his associates; the piano part was built into the polyphony instead of domineering. The concerto must have been all but impossible to the piano technique of Beethoven's day. The runs and arpeggios fell from the player's fingers in the very poetry of motion, and—in staccato passages—with the the clear detachment of the notes of the xylophone. Such playing as that of the adagio only issues from a deep experience of life, and for the technique it may be said that more beautiful trills are hardly producible by human fingers. And what a celestial voice, again, was that of Maquarre's flute heard in the background a little later! It was a masterpiece in the ensemble, orchestra and soloist dividing the honors. Though the concerto came at the end of the evening, Madame Carreno was many times recalled, and would, of course, have been encored had the long-standing rule permitted. Her artistic triumph was the more remarkable in view of the fact that by an extraordinary oversight the piano on which she played had not been accurately tuned in its upper octaves.

WITH THE MINSTREL MEN

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

SALOME IN MUSIC FRESH FROM PARIS

Florent Schmitt's Exposition of Mute Tragedy in New Thought Style.

COMPOSITION WELL DONE

Cesar Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov Also on Boston Symphony Programme.

The chief business of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its matinee concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday was the performance for the first time in this city of parts of Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humieres. This tragedy is a mute drama and was produced at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, on November 9, 1907, with Schmitt's music. The character of the drama may be surmised from the fact that the role of Salome was entrusted to the hands (and feet) of Loie Fuller, who performed the dance of pearls, the dance of the peacock, the dance of serpents, the dance of steel, the dance of silver and the dance of fear.

It may be added that the supreme moment of the play is reached when Salome is dancing a lascivious dance upon a stage illumined by flashes of lighting, and Herod, pursuing her, snatches off the seven veils, so that she is seen for a moment nude. Then John intervenes and covers her with his cloak. At this moment Herodias, infuriated, signals for the destruction of John, and a few minutes later his head is delivered to Salome, who presently throws it into the sea.

This is by no means all of this delectable drama, but it is enough. What may be the precise purport of the music of Mr. Schmitt it is difficult to determine, nor do we know just what episodes of the tragedy were illustrated by the two movements performed yesterday. It matters little. This kind of music has one immense advantage over the older kinds—it can be understood in any one of a thousand ways without violence. Doubtless this is because we doddering ancients cannot catch up with the significance of the new thought in music.

Cannot Be Ignored.

Let us content ourselves then with recognizing the indisputable fact that this music belongs to the present and that it translates into tone the ideas now dominant in all the other arts, particularly in Paris. It cannot be dismissed with contempt nor evaded by the easy application of the term "impressionistic." It is neither crude nor vulgar in methods. It is, on the contrary, pointed in purpose, which is the modern one of delineating moods by the combination of pungent and striking harmonic development with ingenious instrumentation, and it shows forth a genuine mastery of materials.

If we were better acquainted with the delineative design of the music, such as might be gained from a performance of the tragedy, we might more readily appreciate the wonderful color scheme of the composition, its extraordinary treatment of modern harmonies, its pointed use of stopped trumpets as a new factor in chord tinting, rather than as solo voices, its utilization of harp harmonics in novel figuration and its introduction of a sweeping pizzicato across the four strings of the violin family in a new exhibition of arpeggiated chords.

In form there is no obscurity in this music. It is easy enough to follow, and the themes, while avoiding both the straight lines and the perfect curves of old fashioned melody, are not intangible, despite their chromatic elusiveness. All these things belong to the apparatus of the new thought, which was nurtured at the Nouvelle Athenes immortalized by George Moore. It was born when in "the death pallor of the zenith, like a white flag fluttering faintly, Symbolists and Decadents appeared."

"Never before was there so sudden a flux and conflux of artistic desire, such aspiration of the soul of man, such rage of passion, such fainting fever, such cerebral erethism."

Certainly they were a seething company, those New Athenians, but who will explain to us why the movement set going by them has found it so much more comfortable to walk in the gutter than on the sidewalk? Is it a manifestation of genius to discover the soul of a Sappho in the body of a night prowler of the Place Pigalle? Are the passions of Salome and her sort more inspiring to true art than those of Semiramis, whose flesh burned after its kind no less than her mind after power and kingdom? The chief fascinations of Salome were her acceptance of the hideous rites of mummy worship and her eagerness to dance disrobed.

There are still many things in the ritual of the Rosicrucians and in the ceremonies of phallic adoration which have not been dramatized or set to music by these professors of the new thought. We can only say that in the opinion of some fairly intelligent people these fellows are no better than those shrewd inventors of religions which appear from time to time as a thin cloak for unbridled lust and its filthiest indulgence.

The fact that Mr. Schmitt has a real talent makes the case only the more pitiable. He has left Debussy behind in the race after new harmonic atmospheres and he has made Reger and some of the others look childish in the use of embittered counterpoint, the polyphony that stingeth like an adder. But we do not believe that he can compose "Les Elephants Savants" or "La Pythonesse" as he has pretended to do in his "Musique Foraines." And we hope he will find some better food for his imagination in the future than the dirty tragedy in which one musical soul has already sold itself for thirty pieces of silver.

Cesar Franck's noble symphony in D minor opened the programme—a prelude which hung over the "Salome" setting like the clear sky over a tropical jungle. It was nobly played too. The Schmitt number was performed superbly. It was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. The final music was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

THE SEAGOERS.
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date JAN 12 1914
Established:

The Boston Symphony atoned for the severity of the classical programme of the first of its pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall Saturday by giving one entirely modern in composers, although Cesar Franck, whose sublime D minor symphony opened the programme, may well be placed among the classics, and in nothing did Dr. Muck reach greater interpretative heights than in this.

Dr. Muck presented for the first time here a composer of the French school who is now arousing much attention. This was Florent Schmitt, born in Lorraine, of Alsatian parents. The work was "La Tragedie de Salome," in symphonic style, scored with all modern effects and written in the modern French idiom as expressed by Debussy, Dukas, Ravel and others of indefinable characteristics.

Whatever may be said for or against the work—and it will find plenty of defenders and of detractors—it is gripping in interest, of exceedingly emotional nature and it is a masterly picee of instrumentation.

As given for the first time in t Theater des Arts, Paris, November 907, it was presented as mute dran pantomime), in which Lole Fuller danced the several dances. Last summer in London the music was given by the Russian dancers, when Mme. Karsavina danced the part of Salome.

These two numbers were too pronounced in character to allow such a work as the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" to enjoy the success it would otherwise have had.

SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, JANUARY 18,

EUGENE YSAYE

The recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon by Eugene Ysaye at 3:30 will complete the list of concerts given this year by the great violinists of the world. Messrs. Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman have already played here and it will be interesting to observe wherein Ysaye differs from the younger men who have followed him. He will have the assistance of his accomplished accompanist, Camille Decreus. As the great chorus stage will be in use in Symphony Hall this evening it has been decided to sell seats on the same, which are most desirable, for the concert of Ysaye this afternoon. The program is as follows:

Sonata .... G. Faure
Concerto in E minor .... Mendelssohn
Aria .... Handel
Havanaise .... Saint-Saens
Concerto No. 2, in D minor .... Wieniawski
Finale alla zingara.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Anton Witek, the admired concert master of the Symphony orchestra, will make his annual appearance as soloist at the 13th rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Witek will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. Two novelties are on the program, one by Debussy and one by Liszt. The new piece by Debussy will be his Suite "Printemps." This is not to be confused with his "Rondes de Printemps," played by Mr. Fiedler several years since. It was a piece sent as envoi when he was a student at Rome. The committee of the Beaux Arts, finding it ultra-modern, refused to receive it. It was published forthe piano (four hands). Debussy not long ago rewrote it. It had its first performance in Paris last spring. Its first performance in America was last month in New York by the New York Symphony Society under Walter Damrosch. The Liszt novelty will be the Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria." This is the ninth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt. It has never been played at a Symphony concert, but was performed in 1891 at a concert of the Philharmonic Society at the Tremont Theatre.

MMES. CULP AND CARRENO

The concert which Mmes. Julia Culp and Teresa Carreno will give in Symphony Hall, Sunday, Jan. 25, will be for many the most attractive of the winter series. Mme. Culp in her few appearances here has established herself in the favor of Boston as has been the fortune of few other singers. At her song recital the other day Jordan Hall was filled to its utmost capacity and naturally she will draw from a wider public for a Sunday concert. Mme. Carreno likewise has a large and loyal public who will welcome her appearance here. Mme. Culp will sing three groups of songs; the first by Schumann, the second by Hugo Wolf and the third will be composed of English, Scotch and Irish songs. Mme. Carreno's selections will be announced in a few days.

RECORD, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 17.

BAUER PLAYS BRAHMS CONCERTO

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Ninth Symphony. D minor. (Unfinished.)
Brahms—Piano Concerto, No. 1. D minor.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

The programme of yesterday afternoon reads as if it were very short. But a Bruckner Symphony, even if it is unfinished, is something to be reckoned with and eats up time remorselessly. At a first glance also it might appear as if the audience were very deeply steeped in D minor, but the modern modulations made sufficient excursions through surrounding and even distant keys, even if the music of both works frequently came back to roost in D minor, says Louis C. Elson in The Advertiser.

There were some points of coincidence that came uncontrollably to mind. One could not but think of another "ninth symphony" which was considered very long in its day, yet even in its complete state was less prolonged than this uncompleted work. Then also, one thought of another "Unfinished" symphony which was much more grateful to the ear than this colossal composition. Yet Bruckner was not as prolix, nor as puzzling as many of his successors have become, and some of his symphonic work really rises to majestic heights.

It was somewhat odd to have Bruckner bracketed with Brahms. The two have nothing in common except the first two letters of their names. Possibly Dr. Muck was seeking alliteration in the make-up of this D-minor programme. Brahms looked down contemptuously upon poor Bruckner and cordially allowed his partisan, Mme. Von Herzogenberg, to make the most satirical flings at his contemporary. He agreed with her when she compared Bruckner's music to a watery soup with just a speck of grease floating upon it, to deceive people into believing in its richness.

Mr. Bauer merged himself into the work with artistic zeal. He evidently played for the music-lover and not at the galleries. All the more is it the critic's duty to recognize the high worth of his interpretation. And the audience, in this case, seemed to recognize it too, for the applause was very spontaneous and very hearty, after the conclusion of the work, and although the end of the programme had been reached, all the audience remained to recall Mr. Bauer again and again.

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1914

Julia Culp's Great Art Again Charms Bosto

MME. JULIA CULP,
The wonderful lieder singer, who sang to a great audience at her Boston re-entr

The absence of our Symphony orchestra no longer leaves any vacancy in the list of musical events, for many famous soloists are now only too glad to find a recital-date with which nothing important will conflict. Yesterday afternoon gave this chance to Julia Culp, who took full advantage of it. The scene was shifted to Jordan Hall, where a crowded audience was better able to follow the expression of the singer.

That her nuances of expression were well worth following may be taken for granted. With encomiums that place her foremost among Lieder singers, Miss Culp certainly justified her admirers in their praise. Her voice was full and mellow; rich to opulence in quality, except in one or two rare cases of forced high notes; and amply sympathetic in its softer effects. The latter were sometimes exaggerated a trifle, and several numbers were closed with an almost inaudible pianissimo. Apart from this, however, the singer's use of varying dynamics was fully justified, and eminently artistic.

Of four groups on the programme, the first was devoted to Schubert. "Heimliches Lieben" brought out much richness of tone; it might have had a shade more intensity, but it showed a most velve smoothness. Entirely successful was "D Fischers Liebesglueck," the singer's a mated brightness, variety of style, an well-controlled lightness of touch makin it the most pleasing of the group. "Di Forelle" was given with tones of crysta line clearness, while "Nacht und Traeum finished the set in a broad style well su tained by the soloist.

Of the Brahms songs that followed, t opening "Trennung" gave the singer well-taken opportunity to bring out repressed intensity which marks many that composer's works. "Meerfah showed full attention to mood and c trast, though bringing memories of Fran more-delicate setting. "Sonntag" ushe in a brighter style, and after the "Hei kehr," short but intense, "Der Schmie with its rhythmic suggestion of the smit hammer, was given with a swing that w insistent applause and the first of seve encores. Miss Culp's work was art throughout, but the lively vein of this other numbers showed her at her best.

At the piano, Conrad Bos, prince of a companists, added much to the high a tistic merit of the recital.

[162]

New

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

SALOME IN MUS
FRESH FROM P

Florent Schmitt's Exposition Mute Tragedy in New Thought Style.

COMPOSITION WELL DONE

Cesar Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov Also on Boston Symphony Programme.

The chief business of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its matinee concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday was the performance for the first time in this city of parts of Florent Schmitt's "La Tragedie de Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humieres. This tragedy is a mute drama and was produced at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, on November 9, 1907, with Schmitt's music. The character of the drama may be surmised from the fact that the role of Salome was entrusted to the hands (and feet) of Loie Fuller, who performed the dance of pearls, the dance of the peacock, the dance of serpents, the dance of steel, the dance of silver and the dance of fear.

It may be added that the supreme moment of the play is reached when Salome is dancng a lascivious dance upon a stage illumined by flashes of lighting, and Herod, pursuing her, snatches off the seven veils, so that she is seen for a moment nude. Then John intervenes and covers her with his cloak. At this moment Herodias, infuriated, signals for the destruction of John, and a few minutes later his head is delivered to Salome, who presently throws it into the sea.

This is by no means all of this delectable drama, but it is enough. What may be the precise purport of the music of Mr. Schmitt it is difficult to determine, nor do we know just what episodes of the tragedy were illustrated by the two movements performed yesterday. It matters little. This kind of music has one immense advantage over the older kinds—it can be understood in any one of a thousand ways without violence. Doubtless this is because we doddering ancients cannot catch up with the significance of the new thought in music.

Cannot Be Ignored.

Let us content ourselves then with recognizing the indisputable fact that this music belongs to the present and that it translates into tone the ideas now dominant in all the other arts, particularly in Paris. It cannot be dismissed with contempt nor evaded by the easy application of the term "impressionistic." It is neither crude nor vulgar in methods. It is, on the contrary, pointed in purpose, which is the modern one of delineating moods by the combination of pungent and striking harmonic development with ingenious instrumentation, and it shows forth a genuine mastery of materials.

If we were better acquainted with the delineative design of the music, such as might be gained from a performance of the tragedy, we might more readily appreciate the wonderful color scheme of the composition, its extraordinary treatment of modern harmonies, its pointed use of stopped trumpets as a new factor in chord tinting, rather than as solo voices, its utilization of harp harmonics in novel figuration and its introduction of a sweeping pizzicato across the four strings of the violin family in a new exhibition of arpeggiated chords.

In form there is no obscurity in this music. It is easy enough to follow, and the themes, while avoiding both the straight lines and the perfect curves of old fashioned melody, are not intangible, despite their chromatic elusiveness. All these things belong to the apparatus of the new thought, which was nurtured at the Nouvelle Athenes immortalized by George Moore. It was born when in "the death pallor of the zenith, like a white flag fluttering faintly, Symbolists and Decadents appeared."

"Never before was there so sudden a flux and conflux of artistic desire, such aspiration of the soul of man, such rage of passion, such fainting fever, such cerebral erethism."

Certainly they were a seething company, those New Athenians, but who will explain to us why the movement set going by them has found it so much more comfortable to walk in the gutter than on the sidewalk? Is it a manifestation of genius to discover the soul of a Sappho in the body of a night prowler of the Place Pigalle? Are the passions of Salome and her sort more inspiring to true art than those of Semiramis, whose flesh burned after its kind no less than her mind after power and kingdom? The chief fascinations of Salome were her acceptance of the hideous rites of mummy worship and her eagerness to dance disrobed.

There are still many things in the ritual f the Rosicrucians and in the ceremonies f phallic adoration which have not been ramatized or set to music by these professors of the new thought. We can nly say that in the opinion of some fairly ntelligent people these fellows are no beter than those shrewd inventors of religions which appear from time to time s a thin cloak for unbridled lust and its ilthiest indulgence.

The fact that Mr. Schmitt has a real alent makes the case only the more pitiable. He has left Debussy behind in the ace after new harmonic atmospheres and e has made Reger and some of the others ook childish in the use of embittered counterpoint, the polyphony that stingeth like an adder. But we do not believe that e can compose "Les Elephants Savants" r "La Pythonesse" as he has pretended o do in his "Musique Foraines." And we ope he will find some better food for his magination in the future than the dirty ragedy in which one musical soul has already sold itself for thirty pieces of silver.

Cesar Franck's noble symphony in D minor opened the programme—a prelude which hung over the "Salome" setting ike the clear sky over a tropical jungle. It was nobly played too. The Schmitt number was performed superbly. It was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. The final music was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

THE SEAGOERS.
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York
Date JAN 12 1914
Established:

The Boston Symphony atoned for the severity of the classical programme of the first of its pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall Saturday by giving one entirely modern in composers, although Cesar Franck, whose sublime D minor symphony opened the programme, may well be placed among the classics, an in nothing did Dr. Muck reach greater interpretative heights than in this.

Dr. Muck presented for the first time here a composer of the French school who is now arousing much attention. This was Florent Schmitt, born in Lorraine, of Alsatian parents. The work was "La Tragedie de Salome," in symphonic style, scored with all modern effects and written in the modern French idiom as expressed by Debussy, Dukas, Ravel and others of indefinable characteristics.

Whatever may be said for or against the work—and it will find plenty of defenders and of detractors—it is gripping in interest, of exceedingly emotional nature and it is a masterly picee of instrumentation.

As given for the first time in t Theater des Arts, Paris, November 907, it was presented as mute dran pantomime), in which Loie Fuller danced the several dances. Last summer in London the music was given by the Russian dancers, when Mme. Karsavina danced the part of Salome.

These two numbers were too pronounced in character to allow such a work as the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" to enjoy the success it would otherwise have had.

SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, JANUARY 18,

EUGENE YSAYE

The recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon by Eugene Ysaye at 3:30 will complete the list of concerts given this year by the great violinists of the world. Messrs. Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman have already played here and it will be interesting to observe wherein Ysaye differs from the younger men who have followed him. He will have the assistance of his accomplished accompanist, Camille Decreus. As the great chorus stage will be in use in Symphony Hall this evening it has been decided to sell seats on the same, which are most desirable, for the concert of Ysaye this afternoon. The program is as follows:

Sonata........................G. Faure
Concerto in E minor..........Mendelssohn
Aria..............................Handel
Havanaise......................Saint-Saens
Concerto No. 2, in D minor....Wieniawski
Finale alla zingara.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Anton Witek, the admired concert master of the Symphony orchestra, will make his annual appearance as soloist at the 13th rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Witek will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. Two novelties are on the program, one by Debussy and one by Liszt. The new piece by Debussy will be his Suite "Printemps." This is not to be confused with his "Rondes de Printemps," played by Mr. Fiedler several years since. It was a piece sent as envoi when he was a student at Rome. The committee of the Beaux Arts, finding it ultra-modern, refused to receive it. It was published forthe piano (four hands). Debussy not long ago rewrote it. It had its first performance in Paris last spring. Its first performance in America was last month in New York by the New York Symphony Society under Walter Damrosch. The Liszt novelty will be the Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria." This is the ninth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt. It has never been played at a Symphony concert, but was performed in 1891 at a concert of the Philharmonic Society at the Tremont Theatre.

MMES. CULP AND CARRENO

The concert which Mmes. Julia Culp and Teresa Carreno will give in Symphony Hall, Sunday, Jan. 25, will be for many the most attractive of the winter series. Mme. Culp in her few appearances here has established herself in the favor of Boston as has been the fortune of few other singers. At her song recital the other day Jordan Hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and naturally she will draw from a wider public for a Sunday concert. Mme. Carreno likewise has a large and loyal public who will welcome her appearance here. Mme. Culp will sing three groups of songs; the first by Schumann, the second by Hugo Wolf and the third will be composed of English, Scotch and Irish songs. Mme. Carreno's selections will be announced in a few days.

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1914

Julia Culp's Great Art Again Charms Bosto

MME. JULIA CULP,
The wonderful lieder singer, who sang to a great audience at her Boston re-entree

The absence of our Symphony orchestra no longer leaves any vacancy in the list of musical events, for many famous soloists are now only too glad to find a recital-date with which nothing important will conflict. Yesterday afternoon gave this chance to Julia Culp, who took full advantage of it. The scene was shifted to Jordan Hall, where a crowded audience was better able to follow the expression of the singer.

That her nuances of expression were well worth following may be taken for granted. With encomiums that place her foremost among Lieder singers, Miss Culp certainly justified her admirers in their praise. Her voice was full and mellow; rich to opulence in quality, except in one or two rare cases of forced high notes; and amply sympathetic in its softer effects. The latter were sometimes exaggerated a trifle, and several numbers were closed with an almost inaudible pianissimo. Apart from this, however, the singer's use of varying dynamics was fully justified, and eminently artistic.

Of four groups on the programme, the first was devoted to Schubert. "Heimliches Lieben" brought out much richness of tone; it might have had a shade more intensity, but it showed a most velve smoothness. Entirely successful was "D Fischers Liebesglueck," the singer's an mated brightness, variety of style, an well-controlled lightness of touch makin it the most pleasing of the group. "Di Forelle" was given with tones of crysta line clearness, while "Nacht und Traeum finished the set in a broad style well su tained by the soloist.

Of the Brahms songs that followed, t opening "Trennung" gave the singer well-taken opportunity to bring out repressed intensity which marks many that composer's works. "Meerfah showed full attention to mood and co trast, though bringing memories of Fran more-delicate setting. "Sonntag" ushe in a brighter style, and after the "Hei kehr," short but intense, "Der Schmie with its rhythmic suggestion of the smit hammer, was given with a swing that w insistent applause and the first of seve encores. Miss Culp's work was art throughout, but the lively vein of thi other numbers showed her at her best.

At the piano, Conrad Bos, prince of a companists, added much to the high a tistic merit of the recital.

RECORD, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 17.

BAUER PLAYS BRAHMS CONCERTO

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Ninth Symphony. D minor. (Unfinished.)
Brahms—Piano Concerto, No. 1. D minor.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

The programme of yesterday afternoon reads as if it were very short. But a Bruckner Symphony, even if it is unfinished, is something to be reckoned with and eats up time remorselessly. At a first glance also it might appear as if the audience were very deeply steeped in D minor, but the modern modulations made sufficient excursions through surrounding and even distant keys, even if the music of both works frequently came back to roost in D minor, says Louis C. Elson in The Advertiser.

There were some points of coincidence that came uncontrollably to mind. One could not but think of another "ninth symphony" which was considered very long in its day, yet even in its complete state was less prolonged than this uncompleted work. Then also, one thought of another "Unfinished" symphony which was much more grateful to the ear than this colossal composition. Yet Bruckner was not as prolix, nor as puzzling as many of his successors have become, and some of his symphonic work really rises to majestic heights.

It was somewhat odd to have Bruckner bracketed with Brahms. The two have nothing in common except the first two letters of their names. Possibly Dr. Muck was seeking alliteration in the make-up of this D-minor programme. Brahms looked down contemptuously upon poor Bruckner and cordially allowed his partisan, Mme. Von Herzogenberg, to make the most satirical flings at his contemporary. He agreed with her when she compared Bruckner's music to a watery soup with just a speck of grease floating upon it, to deceive people into believing in its richness.

Mr. Bauer merged himself into the work with artistic zeal. He evidently played for the music-lover and not at the galleries. All the more is it the critic's duty to recog-ize the high worth of his interpretation. the audience, in this case, seemed to ize it too, for the applause was very us and very hearty, after the the work, and although the gramme had been reached, nce remained to recall Mr. and again.

Closes Weak.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 17,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

HALTING BRUCKNER AND FREED BRAHMS

A Singular Programme, That Had Its Curious Justification—Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, in Which Shortcoming More Than Genius Shone — Brahms's First Concerto, with Mr. Bauer and Dr. Muck to Make It Eloquent

BY common consent nowadays Bruckner in his nine symphonies was a "genius." That is to say, he was capable of moments when his music falls nothing short of inspiration, either in the melodies whence it springs or in the intensity of emotional utterance, or oftenest in both these attributes of high and spiritual invention and vision. He was a "genius," too, in the fulness with which he kept his faith in his own individual way and never once turned aside from it, however the world might judge it or ignore it. He was simple and single-hearted of vision; his emotions were all universal and elementary; yet he had no less the passion for large and intricate creation when he set himself to express it. Thereby is he a "genius" again. As much is he such by the weaker sides of that title; for when inspiration fails, then is a "genius" much less than a mere talent.

Hear Bruckner in some of his truly inspired music of great, intense, lambent, and transporting vision or of the outspoken play of elementary human moods—such music as he wrote in many a scherzo and many an adagio from the eighth symphony downward—hear him then and the listening ear and mind forgets all his shortcomings. He may lack the designing and the architectural faculty in tones; he may write music that is sheer emptiness; he may seem to be always beginning anew; he may use time and again the "great crescendi" that he loved; the inversions in which he delighted; the contrary motion of theme against theme that seemed to stir him; he may resort to his favorite tubas, to his horns, to his characteristic sublimated string tone as often as he likes. And so on with all his mannerisms, his weaknesses, his lacking faculties of a great and rounded composer. They come, they go, and no ear and no mind lingers over them before such melodies as he invents for his adagios or for his slow song in other movements, and bears upward to an ecstatic intensity that scarcely any other music attains, or such elemental rejoicing in melody and rhythm as that with which he fills his scherzi. Between such inspirations, the listener is too breathless to question.

On the other hand when the inspiration comes not or comes almost fitfuly; when Bruckner's spirit fails to conjure and outpour its visions; when the elemental impulse stirs not in the music, then is it hard indeed to endure. "Genius" refusing to function is monotonous weariness, and a mere "talent" seems in the pains and the tedium twenty times more pleasurable. Bruckner's "genius" functioned seldom and functioned fitfully in his ninth and final symphony that Dr. Muck chose to make his annual and just "homage" to a unique composer at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. It was the work of Bruckner's sickening and final years, and the weakness of imagination and accomplishment that neither resolute will nor intense longing could conquer is written large upon it. The Scherzo indeed summons the elemental wildness of mood and voice as in one last flare of the composer's spirit; but nowhere in the Adagio is the passion of ecstasy and of vision that flowed out of Bruckner into melodies that quiver with the beauty of this spiritual seeing and that well up into those piercing and shimmering songs that seem to rise out of universal aspiration to the heights of a John in Patmos writing his celestial revelation in tones.

Of such is the Adagio of the eighth symphony unmatched in its kind in all music. Of such are not the spent and relatively feeble strivings of the slow song of the ninth. As for the first movement, it seemed hard to recall under its tedious lengths, where else in many another of his symphonies, he has groped so often, written so many passages that are null and void, begun so many times afresh, and plied and exhausted all his idiosyncrasies. Only here and there in its incessant advance and recession, in its whirr of progression and in its clamorous sweeps of climax echoed the other Bruckner who was a genius. To hear was almost to pity and regret.

In the scherzo, the dying inspiration does shed light and heat again. The dissonances at the beginning are of the Brucknerian wildness fired afresh. Out of the fleetness of the music speaks the Brucknerian exhilaration in such movements. It thickens; it becomes definitely a dance tune and the sheer elementary gusto of melody and rhythm carries all before it. What play with timbres as with wild voices Bruckner makes. How the orchestra beats out his thrilling rhythms. How the strings weave a kind of joyous filagree in racing fancies about it. How readily he stills and deepens it into contrasting and sober song. The Bruckner who was a genius wrote this scherzo out of air and wire, thick-coming fancies and elate freedom. The work of it, perhaps, is upon many another scherzo that has been written since and very modernly—in the fleet dissonance, in the wild and frenzy play with timbres, in the airy fancies that coalesce of a rudder into sharply rythmed dance-tones.

Unique genius that he was, Bruckner has influenced the course of the music that came after him and not through Mahler's, which has its obvious kinships to his, alone. His "great crescendi," as some would say, have become a habit of our time. The long progression out of tonal [illegible] and tonal [illegible] through strug- [illegible] itself is almost a mannerism of contemporary music made in Germany and in many another country. No less than Bruckner, our composers love the voice of the horns and the hymning sonorities of the brass. They would have hut they often miss the shimmer that makes his melodies radiant, the fine intensity that gives them ecstatic voice. But therein there is no imitating Bruchner until his inspiration comes again. They are of the "genius" that has gone on a journey or is sleeping, like Baal in the Old Testament through all of this ninth symphony except the scherzo. As yet they have returned and awakened in no man. Yet their absence gave leisure for comforting reflection. And did not someone say in a farewell speech to Mr. Gericke that to do so was one of the purposes of the Symphony Concerts?

Strangely ordered as Dr. Muck's programme seemed with Brahms's first piano concerto in succession to this symphony of Bruckner, the outcome justified the singularity. For concerto, as some saw when it was first played fifty years ago, and as other still say when they hear it now, reach all the adventitous advantages that kindly fortune may give it. Yesterday the piece and the composer had them in plenty. In comparison with the Bruckner of the ninth symphony, Brahms, a composer that could and did say what he undertook to set forth; he never groped or heritated; he foresaw the end from the beginning; and he devised and ordered his means accordingly. Thus early in his career—he was in his twenties when he wrote the concerto—he is clearly a talent. Not a trace of genius is perceptible in it and therrin no doubt is Bruckner's compensation, if in the fields of the blest—and the famous—the two composers have not forgotten the open and the secret rivalries in which they dwelt in Vienna. In the final rondo of the concerto is melodic and rhythmic energy flowering into propulsive power, and Dr. Muck and Mr. Bauer together yesterday felt and heightened it in the new fashion that has opened the eloquence, heightened the power and warmed the beauty of Brahms's music. The song of the slow movement has its sober beauty of a Brahms who in his youth was already grave and musing of mood.

Mr. Bauer did not attempt in another new also a mistaken fashion with Brahms's to "emotionalize" the song. He was content to let its sober march in his pace and its serene beauty in the quiet colony of his tone speak its sober reflection. When Brahms saw a vision, as his caption of the movement, half implies, he saw in no Brucknesian ecstasies, but as the old sculptors saw the figures that move in grave and beauty across their friezes. The Brucknerian ecstasies ring eagerly in their transport; the Brahamsian ecstasies have these serene depths. They should sound nobly and Mr. Bauer gives them such voice. As for the first movement, it is music-making, not so abstruse as it first seemed and not so crabbed as some still call it, but music-making in which reflection and even calculation plays its part. A little, a very little of the Brucknerian "genius" would have bettered Brahms's invention with his melodies. No more of the Brucknerian intensity and mildness would have helped him in the working of them. For he does that and not too much more in his modulation and amplification of them. Mr. Bauer wise and practised pianist, in the fullness of maturity, saw the true course with the music. By the beauty of his tone, by the lucidity of his exposition, by a fine ordor to make the most of every suggestion it might bear, technical heightening here and imaginative felicity there, he actually made it sound as though these were a reticent eloquence of the thought that does no tquite dare to release its own emotion.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17,

Last and Uncompleted Great Orchestral Work of Vienna Composer Revived by Karl Muck for Twelfth Concert Program

HAROLD BAUER PLAYS

Presenting the Anton Bruckner symphony (unfinished) in D minor, No. 9, and the Johannes Brahms piano concerto in D minor, No. 1, with Harold Bauer as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed its twelfth program in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon to moderate applause.

The Bruckner work, considered in its parochial bearings, belongs among the Mahler, Rachmaninoff and Franck symphonies which Dr. Muck has put into the repertory this season. Its performance from the platform side is a tremendous achievement in conducting and from the auditorium side an extreme undertaking in appreciation. Of all these pieces, which for reasons either of length or of philosophical content are nothing short of vast, the Bruckner effort seems to have won the least general favor. If anybody hal held a stop-watch over the handclapping that occurred between movements and at the close of all the presentations, Bruckner would unquestionably have the smallest number of seconds in the record. It is an extraordinary thing for the rehearsal audience to grant the conductor less than three recalls after he has made such an effort as Dr. Muck made in the first [illegible] [illegible] regard for interpreter and players when they have labored hard for its entertainment, regardless of its liking for the music. But respectful and open though the audience showed itself while the three movements of the Viennese symphonist's uncompleted composition was being played, it would not register its commendation by a third recall, with the implied demand that the musicians all stand and bo acknowledgement.

Intellectually, the Bruckner work is perhaps the greatest of all the big numbers that have been on the programs of the season, except the Franck symphony. It is by no means dull and inconsequent. It is not so pleasant to follow as the Mahler symphony; it is not so logical as the symphony of Rachmaninoff, but it does hold attention. The serious complaint a listener must make with it is that it is wanting in contrasts. Once the composer started in a mood he stayed in it until he exhausted it. That is where he falls below Mahler, who shifts his scene with the suddenness of Ariosto. That is where he falls below Rachmaninoff, whose fundamental themes are contrasted in feeling and so disclose variety in developcoment.

Mr. Bauer playing the Brahms concerto put his audience where he likes best to put it, back in the last days of the romantic period. Early Brahms is the same thing to him as late Schumann. The Brahms concerto in itself is not a greatly engrossing piece, but it has just the mood that appeals to the genius of Mr. Bauer and it must please under his interpretation.

* * *

HERALD. SATURDAY.

JANUARY 17. 1914.

ALMANAC HINT FOR CONCERTS

Bruckner's Symphony Chosen by Dr. Muck Suggests "About This Time."

IS COUPLED WITH BRAHMS

Harold Bauer Gives Impressive Performance of Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer was the pianist. The program was as follows: Bruckner's Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (unfinished), and Brahms's Concerto in D minor, No. 1, for the piano. The symphony had not been played here since November, 1907. Mr. Bauer, coming to this country for the first time in 1900, played for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston, and he then chose the concerto of Brahms, which had not then been heard here with the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Joseffy played the concerto here at a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra eight years ago tomorrow.

Was it a happy or a Mephistophelian thought that induced Dr. Muck to couple the names of Bruckner and Brahms on a program? He did not select the concerto. Mr. Bauer has been playing it in the West. His devotion to it is only equalled by the memorable instance in the Micawber family; he will never forsake it. But Dr. Muck surely chose the symphony. The Farmers' Almanac for concert goers might read in January or February, "about this time expect Bruckner." In February, 1887, 1889, 1910; in January, 1912, 1913; in December, 1901 and 1906, symphonies by Bruckner were played. Perhaps they are regarded as good substantial winter music.

Yesterday Bruckner and Brahms were closely associated. The Brucknerites, who in Boston, like the Conies of Holy Writ, are a feeble folk, hearing the concerto, might have said one to another: "Didn't I tell you? And they call Brahms great!" The Brahmsites, or Brahmins, dozing through the symphony, might have said: "And this man had his admirers in Vienna! And they dared to pit him against our St. Johannes. Now comes Mr. Bauer and we shall at last hear some music."

In spite of certain noble passages, the Ninth Symphony cannot be reckoned among Bruckner's greatest works. The first movement shows too often a curious deficiency in workmanship. From either a lack of fine taste in style or from an Olympian indifference, the composer frittered away the effect of a really grand thought by gingerbread ornamentation or inconsequential development. Then there are those irritating pauses, as though Bruckner, the organist, stopped in improvisation to shift the stops of an old-fashioned instrument, to make new combinations regardless of continuity in musical thought. These pauses excite anticipation, and, alas, too often lead to something trivial. The Scherzo is worked out with a firmer hand and has a more decided character. The close of the third [illegible] [illegible] impressive performance of the Concerto. He is one of the few truly musical pianists that visit us. Time has somewhat softened the austerities and the asperities of the work itself, and no one would today echo the complaints made against it when it was first played; that it was surcharged with dissonances. The first movement has a wild, demoniacal spirit in the beginning, but the wildness no longer dismays the hearer. It is a pity that the motto of the second movement in the manuscript score—"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"—was not retained in the published work, for it is singularly appropriate to the spirit of the music. Whether it were suggested by the death of Scnumann or not, this may be said today: the Rondo Finale does not seem in keeping with the movements that precede it.

The program of the concerts next week includes Debussy's Suite "Printemps," which will be played here for the first time; Tschaikowsky's violin concerto (Mr. Witek, violinist), and Liszt's symphonic poem "Hungaria," which will be played for the first time at these concerts.

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 17.

BAUER AROUSES GREAT APPLAUSE

Pianist Plays First Brahms Concerto at Symphony Concert.

Harold Bauer's poetical playing of Brahms's first piano concerto was the most popular feature of the Symphony matinee yesterday, but to those who are proof against Bruckner's long-windedness and can wait patiently for the inevitable, inspired theme, the noble and sympathetic performance of the Austrian composer's ninth "unfinished" symphony was equally impressive.

These two compositions make up this week's program, which will be performed again tonight.

Bauer made the Brahms concerto known to the present generation of Boston music-lovers when he chose it for his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1900-01. It is one of Brahms's early works and shows the promise that later was so richly fulfilled in his great first symphony. It aroused lively discussion when Brahms played it for the first time in 1859, but today it is received calmly by the most conservative, who still shiver at Strauss and Debussy. Mr. Bauer's performance, which was remarkable for its epic spirit and its tonal beauty, was warmly applauded.

The three movements of the Bruckner symphony afford a full hour's diversion. If the symphony had been finished it might easily be the longest in the whole catalogue. It bears marks of the composer's genius, notably the beautiful themes in the third movement, but it has long, dry stretches. Even the fine performance that Dr. Muck led failed to arouse any enthusiasm in the audience.

ADVERTISER

JANUARY 17.

BRUCKNER WORK IS VERY LONG

HAROLD BAUER STRONG IN BRAHMS CONCERTO

Both Works in D Minor, but of Diverse and Almost Opposite Schools.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Ninth Symphony. D minor. (Unfinished.)
Brahms—Piano Concerto, No. 1. D minor. Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

The programme of yesterday afternoon reads as if it were very short. But a Bruckner Symphony, even if it is unfinished, is something to be reckoned with and eats up time remorselessly. At a first glance also it might appear as if the audience were very deeply steeped in D minor, but the modern modulations made sufficient excursions through surrounding and even distant keys, even if the music of both works frequently came back to roost in D minor.

There were some points of coincidence that came uncontrollably to mind. One could not but think of another "ninth symphony" which was considered very long in its day, yet even in its complete state was less prolonged than this uncompleted work. Then also, one thought of another "Unfinished" symphony which was much more grateful to the ear than this colossal composition. Yet Bruckner was not as prolix, nor as puzzling as many of his successors have become, and some of his symphonic work really rises to majestic heights.

That the simple-hearted contrapuntist was very sincere in his work no one may doubt, and that is saying something in these days when one has cause to suspect even Richard Strauss, and very many of the lesser tonal conundrum-manufacturers. The naive dedication of a very earnest part of this symphony "To God," meant something not at all ludicrous to the devout Bruckner.

The Bruckner Work.

The symphony is not a marvel of orchestration, as many recent symphonic poems are. It does not rely entirely upon dazzling effects of tone-color, but could bear the effect of piano transcription very well, which is equivalent to saying that it has musical ideas: it has many of these, and great ones, too, but Bruckner is not so melodic as Brahms, and he is sometimes misled by his skill into very much prolixity, so that instead of saying—"A modern symphony, at length," the critic exclaims—"A symphony, at very great length!"

There are great climaxes in the first movement, and Dr. Muck took these grandly. The orchestra must have worked most assiduously to win such a good result. The Adagio sinned most in its prolixity, and makes a rather poor ending for the work. Of course, we must remember that it was not intended for an ending at all.

In spite of the asceticism of the work one constantly felt that Bruckner was far above the experimentalists of the Holbrooke or Scriabine type, more coherent than Mahler, and of surer touch than Sibelius.

The second movement, the Scherzo, is masterly, and seems the best part of the symphony; it is very bizarre and original, but here we have a rhythmic sweep, and some figures, worthy of Beethoven. It is the movement that is easiest comprehended, and the wild rush of that remarkable figure made up of a single tone seven times repeated, reminded of what Beethoven had done with similar repetition in his seventh symphony.

Brahms Concerto.

It was somewhat odd to have Bruckner bracketed with Brahms. The two have nothing in common except the first two letters of their names. Possibly Dr. Muck was seeking alliteration in the make-up of this D-minor programme. Brahms looked down contemptuously upon poor Bruckner and cordially allowed his partisan, Mme. Von Herzogenberg, to make the most satirical flings at his contemporary. He agreed with her when she compared Bruckner's music to a watery soup with just a speck of grease floating upon it, to deceive people into believing in its richness.

This may indicate that there was more good contrast in this programme than appears upon the face of it, and this fact came to light as one listened to the two diverse and almost opposite schools. Brahms had the advantage of it in presenting the more agreeable and more comprehensible work, and his surety in handling his themes, his serenity of melody, his clear and logical development, all made a composition which it was a delight to listen to, most especially when such a great artist as Harold Bauer was presenting the principal part.

And the first concerto had the charm of novelty, for it has been so overshadowed by the second (Op. 83, in B-flat) that it is practically a new work to modern auditors. It is a youthful composition (Op. 15), but Brahms was a giant in his youth, as his piano sonata (Op. 5) and even earlier works may prove. It is a self-abnegatory work, without much display for the pianist, who must sink himself in the ensemble and play for the music's sake and not for virtuosity. Even the difficulties (and they are great) are not made manifest. Brahms' difficulties were not made for the sake of display, but they are always there for an artistic purpose.

The present writer recalls what the late Prof. Baermann told him while he was practicing the second Brahms Concerto: "At first I was repelled by the difficulties and thought them merely crabbedness and eccentricity, but when I had mastered the work, I saw that every difficulty had an artistic purpose behind." The musical world has grown since the Leipsic "Signale" said of this first concerto— [illegible] bligato, in [illegible] the [illegible] grateful as possible, and the orchestral part a series of lacerating chords."

Today the first movement seems gloriously passionate,—for Brahms,—and the other movements melodic enough. Yet the first movement still seems the gem of the work, and was given with an ensemble and beauty that will cause the performance long to be remembered.

Mr. Bauer's Artistry.

Mr. Bauer merged himself into the work with artistic zeal. He evidently played for the music-lover and not at the galleries. All the more is it the critic's duty to recognize the high worth of his interpretation. And the audience, in this case, seemed to recognize it too, for the applause was very spontaneous and very hearty, after the conclusion of the work, and although the end of the programme had been reached, all the audience remained to recall Mr. Bauer again and again.

His broad playing of the chief theme of the first movement, his solo work in the subordinate theme, his chord and octave work in the development, his romantic vein in the Adagio (without becoming at all sentimental), his triumphant style and his wonderful trills in the Finale—all these and other beauties that could be spoken of, made a noble ending to the concert, and the unity of orchestra and soloist causes Dr. Muck to share in this artistic triumph.

SUNDAY GLOBE

JANUARY 18.

Mr Witek Soloist at the Symphony Concerts

Anton Witek, the admired concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, will make his annual appearance as soloist at the 13th rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr Witek will play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Two novelties are on the program, one by Debussy and one by Liszt. The new Debussy piece will be his suite, "Printemps." This is not to be confused with his "Rondes de Printemps" played by Mr Fiedler several years since. It was a piece he "sent back" from Rome which for some reason was never published.

After he returned to Paris he made it into a piece for two pianos. Within the last year he has rewritten it for orchestra and pianos and it had its first performance in Paris last Spring. Its first performance in America was a few weeks ago in New York by the New York Symphony Society, under Walter Damrosch.

The Liszt novelty will be the symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This is the ninth of the series of symphonic poems by Liszt. Curiously enough it has never been played at a Symphony concert, and it is questionable whether it has ever been played in Boston.

Alexander Bloch, a New Violinist, in Recital

Alexander Bloch, a new violinist, will give a recital at Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon. He studied with Prof Sevcik of Vienna and later became one of the pupils of the famous Leopold Auer. At the completion of his studies Mr Bloch was offered an engagement as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra of Tiflis and was the first American, in fact the first foreigner, to fill this position, formerly held only by native Russians.

He was reengaged for the coming season, but decided to return to America. He made his New York debut in November. In his program here Mr Bloch will have the assistance of Dr William Crane Carl of New York, organist.

The program is as follows:

Sonata, E major....................................Haendel
Concerto, E minor...............................Mendelssohn
Chaconne ....Vitalli
(For violin and organ.)
(a) Priere et Berceuse.....Alexander Guilmant
(b) Fugue in D major...................J. S. Bach (Organ)
(a) Humoresk...............................Tor Aulin
(b) Nocturne..............................Chopin-Auer
(c) Hungarian dance, G minor, Brahms-Joachim

Miss Ruth Deyo's Recital Next Thursday Afternoon

Miss Ruth Deyo, who recently made an appearance as pianist at the Symphony concerts, announces a recital at Jordan Hall for Thursday afternoon. Her program will include Bach's toccata in C minor, Schumann's Phantasie op. 17, and a barcarolle, nocturne (op. 48, No. 1), Mazurka (op 6, No. 1) and scherzo (op. 39) by Chopin.

Second Longy Program With Number by Marquarre

At its second concert in Jordan Hall next Thursday evening the Longy Club will have the assistance of Joseph Keller, 'cellist; Ernest Huber, contra-bass, and Edward Miersch, horn. The program will be as follows:

Edouard Flament—Fantasia con Fuga (Op. 28), for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, bassoon and horn. (First time.)
A. Maquarre—Three romantic numbers for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
V. d'Indy—Fantaisie sur des Theme populaires Francais, for oboe and piano.
A. Dvorak—Serenade (Op. 44), for two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, three horns, 'cello and bass.

Week's Opera Schedule

Culp-Carreno Concert.

The concert which Julia Culp and Teresa Carreno are to give in Symphony Hall a week from this afternoon will be for many the most attractive of the Winter series. Julia Culp in her few appearances here has established herself in the favor of Boston as has been the fortune of the very few other singers. Mme Carreno likewise has a large and loyal public who will welcome her appearance here.

Mme Culp will sing three groups of songs, the first will be by Schumann, the second by Hugo Wolf and the third will be English, Scotch and Irish songs. Mme Carreno's numbers will be announced in a few days.

Ysaye in Concert Today at Symphony Hall

The recital in Symphony Hall this afternoon by Eugene Ysaye at 3:30 will complete the list of concerts given this year by the great violinists of the world. We have had Kreisler, Thibaud and Elman, and it will be interesting to observe wherein Ysaye differs from the younger men who have followed him. He will have the assistance of his accomplished accompanist, Camille Decreus.

As the great chorus stage will be in [illegible] Hall this evening, [illegible] to sell seats on [illegible] rable for the [illegible] afternoon [illegible] international con- [illegible] organized selfishness

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 19.

YSAYE GIVES FIRST RECITAL

Violinist Delights Large Audience at Symphony Hall

Eugene Ysaye, returning to Boston, played for the first time this season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He was assisted by Camille Decreus, pianist. The programme included Faure's A major sonata, the Mendelssohn violin concerto, an aria of Handel, Saint-Saens' Havanaise and Wieniawski's D minor concerto.

Mr. Ysaye again demonstrated his overwhelming greatness as an artist, for in spite of some minor shortcomings he interpreted music of many schools with a masterly comprehension and with that recreative spirit which characterizes the performances of himself and a very few other great artists.

The violin part of Faure's sonata was played in a manner that at once revealed the innermost secret of the delicate music and lifted the beautiful work to a plane of the highest art. In his sincerity Mr. Ysaye made no attempt to distort the concerto out of all resemblance to itself for the sake of singular effects or individual interpretation; yet he played with such feeling and such a magnificent grasp of the formal qualities of the work that neither faulty intonation in one or two places nor an occasional unsteadiness of tone made the performance anything but memorable.

The aria of Handel was in a spirit that made the beautiful melody one of the great moments of the afternoon. The audience was large, and a number of seats on the stage were filled.

BOSTON HERALD.

JANUARY 19.

YSAYE PLAYS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Violinist's Work Uneven—Falls Below His Own Very High Standard.

IRRITATED BY LATE COMERS

His Intonation Not Always Secure and Tone Wobbles—Some Flashes of Genius.

Eugene Ysaye gave a recital yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Camille Decreus was the accompanist. The program was as follows: Faure, Sonata in A-major; Mendelssohn, concerto in E-minor; Handel, aria; Saint-Saens, Havanaise; Wieniawski, concerto No. 2 in D-minor.

Mr. Ysaye's playing was uneven. He was evidently not in the vein. No doubt he was vexed and irritated at the beginning of the recital by the arrival of late comers, who thus habitually show discourtesy to the artist on the stage and mar the enjoyment of those already seated. Faure's sonata is intimate music, perhaps better suited to a smaller hall. Its effectiveness is not enhanced, however, by disturbances between each movement.

On the whole, Mr. Ysaye fell below his own extraordinarily high standard, both in technique and aesthetic expression. His intonation was not always secure. His tone sometimes wobbled. He was not technically at his best.

Yet there were occasional flashes of genius. There were moments of fire and brilliance in the first and third movements of Mendelssohn's Concerto, while Handel's Aria was played with rare dignity and taste.

Mr. Ysaye played Wieniawski's concerto con amore. At times, in this, as in Saint-Saens' Havanaise, the beauty of his tone, charged with poignant emotional significance, his incomparable phrasing, enchanted the hearer and Mr. Ysaye was again the supreme artist, the inspired interpreter.

Mr. Decreus's accompaniments were sympathtetic and admirable.

A large audience was warmly appreciative and Mr. Ysaye was generous in adding to the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL

JANUARY 19.

YSAYE CONCERT ATTRACTS MANY

Representative Audience Enjoys Program Offered by Violinist.

Ysaye is still a name to conjure with. The veteran Belgian violinist, pupil of the famous Vieuxtemps, gave his first recital of the season in Boston at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and attracted an audience that completely filled the hall. Even the seats on the stage which were put up for the choral concert that took place in the same hall last night were all occupied.

The audience, furthermore, was unusually representative in that it included not only those seeking intellectual diversion after the customary Sunday midday dinner, but also a great many musicians. There were enough Symphony fiddlers present, for instance, to make up an orchestra for a Bach suite.

Nearly twenty years have gone by since Ysaye made his Boston debut at a Symphony concert, and the premier violinist is now in his 55th year. But time has used him kindly. His gigantic frame still wears a sturdy aspect; his hair is still coal-black, and curled out at the back like an Elizabethan ruff; his tone, at its best, possesses the same ravishing beauty as of yore, and he has retained much of the magical technique that for so many years kept him beyond rivalry.

There were scratchy and slipshod measures yesterday, and there were exaggerations of style and sentiment; but, by and large, it was a splendid performance, such as only a supreme master of the violin could attain. The peccadillos were insignificant in comparison with the extraordinary achievements in tone and technique.

All but the Saint-Saens "Havanaise" number was new on an Ysaye program in Boston. The Faure sonata in A-major, which Ysaye played sitting down; the Mendelssohn concerto in E-minor; the Handel "Aria" and the second Wieniawski concerto in D-minor all represented departures from previous programs offered by the Belgian giant.

The more critical liked him best in the "Havanaise," which he performed with fairly blazing skill and spirit; but there was also a thrilling outburst of applause after the first movement of the Mendelssohn concerto. After the recital there was a half-hour of encores.

Ysaye is to be the soloist at the Opera House concert on Sunday, Feb. 8, and he is to play again at Symphony Hall on Feb. 21, with Godowsky and Gerardy.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date JAN 19 1914

Es 1884

THE "STAR" SOLOIST

May His Day End for the Symphony Concert.

To the Editor of The Tribune.

Sir: Last night's regular Philharmonic concert, with a "star" soloist, failed to draw a fairly large audience, while exactly a week ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the same hall and without the magnetic attraction of soloists, played to hundreds of "standees." Referring to last night's performance, your music reviewer suggests that "if Mr. Elman is unable to fill the house, it is about time to ask what is the matter with the musical situation." As he does not hazard an answer himself, I wish the scholarly Mr. Krehbiel would attempt to resolve this serious mystery and tell us just what is the matter with a musical community which no longer grows hysterical over its Mischa Elmans.

A couple of years ago the writer, in a communication to this newspaper, incidentally alluded to the significant fact that many mature music lovers ardently hope for the day when "stars" at symphonic concerts shall become as unnecessary financially as they are usually undesirable artistically. The number of "starless" symphony concerts since courageously given by our leading orchestral organizations would seem to forecast the coming of that happy day—or is the wish father to the thought again?

DAVID A. MODELL.
New York, Jan. 16, 1914.

BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 19.

YSAYE NOT IN FORM.

People's Choral Union in Mixed Program.

Miss Lucrezia Bori Is the Feature of Concert at Opera House.

Sunday has become a day of concerts. Mr Ysaye at Symphony Hall in the afternoon, Miss Bori at the Opera House in the evening and finally the concert by the People's Choral Union all drew their audiences. The great Belgian violinist made his first appearance here this season. The excellent pianist, Camille Decreus, assisted him. Mr Ysaye was not in the mood, and played in a manner hard to reconcile with his recitals here last season. He appeared wearied and uncertain of himself, falling into sentimental and slovenly traits of style and into indifferent bowing and intonation.

Now and then, as in the finale of the Mendelssohn concerto, he roused himself himself into something of the old technical brilliance and emotional fire. There were moments, as in the first movement of the Faure sonato (A major), when there were echoes of the incomparable caress with which Ysaye can sing a melody, but oftenest the bow was unsteady on the string and it was labored or cheapened playing.

The singing of the chorus was particularly spirited in the first stanza of Mr Wodell's madrigal, a melodic piece of part-writing of clear voice leading, sufficiently varied in harmony to afford color and agreeably contrasted in dynamics. The chorus sings with enthusiasm, with commendable distinctness in enunciation, with careful heed to the conductor in shading, and upon occasion can rise to a telling climax of tone.

The soloists were not equal to the usual standard of these concerts. Mr Frick has been heard of from time to time in Berlin and showed some of the worst traits of German singing. Mr Finnegan has a pretty voice and uses it prettily. The audience was liberal with its applause.

BOSTON GLOBE—

JANUARY 17.

HAROLD BAUER REDEEMS PROGRAM

Pianist Plays Brilliantly in Brahms Concerto.

Bruckner's "Unfinished" Symphony Long Enough as It Is.

It is well Bruckner left his ninth symphony "unfinished." There are other ninth symphonies with which it hardly will rank, and an hour is a fair allotment for three movements. One day Anton, honest soul that he was, rushed into his classroom wildly waving a letter in his hand, stammering and inarticulate in the very suffocation of joy. As speech was restored to him, he confided to his eager pupils that the letter was from Wagner and that the master had addressed to him these heavenly words: "What I am to the music drama you are to the symphony." The summit of Walhalla was at hand and the gods robbed of their glory.

The great Richard had not yet sat through this ninth symphony or he would have inserted a qualifying phrase or a footnote. Yesterday we had the joy of it at the Symphony rehearsal. It is said that Dr Muck considers it a righteous duty to play one of Bruckner's symphonies a year. Even if this austere resolve upon penance be true, it is possible to live nine years before a repetition of yesterday's experience again is necessary, for there are eight others to choose from.

What strangely antithetical music. Holding out golden promises in one moment and wearisome to extinction for half an hour thereafter. All the pedantic, finical, meticulous, petty and provincial earmarks that thrust themselves into the earlier symphonies occasionally and even often are the chief materials here for a succession of worn and tedious formulas that are the offspring of a brain and inspiration atrophied and dried up by a life of drudgery in the classroom.

The arresting nobility of thought, the grandeur of expression in a few isolated passages grip the mind and feeling and cause wonder that they should consort with any such a meandering herd of commonplaces. If there is obvious music, mathematical to the last reduction of an equation; fearful lest the hearer may not arrive at the precise conclusion from a given premise, honest, untiring and relentless in its insistence upon sequence when the whole idea as inflated into a column is not worth a paragraph—if there is obvious, laborious and prolix music extant as a warning to those persons not sure that they are called to compose, verily this symphony is it. Even the scouring given the tenor tubas—those traditional badges of Wagnerism—could not lighten this dreary hour. May Dr Muck tie up the score securely and lay it reverently upon the highest shelf.

Johannes Brahms, the darling of the arch foes of Wagner, the one against whose symphonies those of Bruckner were pitted in competition by the Wagner camp, followed hard upon, separated by a bare 15 minutes of intermission to ease their souls. The great [illegible] has written music deeply [illegible] the spirits of the Wagnerites and the Brucknerian satellites, among it his D minor concerto for piano, a grave and austere piece, in the first movement of which the solo instrument should have been some terrible engine of war, emitting solemn thunder.

In short the afternoon was a solemn occasion. Had it been the anniversary of the death both of Bruckner and Brahms—two of the three B's—rolled into one, it would have been a fitting celebration. Mr Bauer, however, is not without resources in such a catastrophe. He put on as a cheerful a countenance as possible and played as though the end of art was not yet. Rarely has he triumphed more victoriously by the sheer force of his superb art. In the last movement the composer relented to the extent of a jocular vein in the German manner, and Mr Bauer made the most of it. His performance was dignified and established a variety in moods which are not inevitably furnished by the music. The pianist was warmly rewarded.

Liszt's "Hungaria" was for some reason exhumed by Dr. Muck and given an exceedingly brilliant performance, for the first time at these concerts. The reason for this being the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the piece was made clear by its performance. Despite a vigorous march theme with a spirited Hungarian twist and a few orchestral effects that are dramatic as well as astonishing, the piece is one of the emptiest, taken as a whole, of the compositions of Liszt that we have heard. Roaring, swaggering emptiness. Why not some noise? Why not an anvil or two? Why not a portion of P. T. Barnum's admirable forces set agoing on the stage? For this trapeze music, there is, thank heaven, no use in a concert hall. The audience was a little bored and rather astonished and somewhat displeased. For a rarity, the audience was right.

POST, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 24,

DEBUSSY WORK BY SYMPHONY

WiteK Qualifies as Master in TschaiKowsKy Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Debussy's early "suite symphonique" for orchestra with pianos, "Printemps," was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. This suite was the second "envoi" or composition which Debussy sent back from Italy to Paris as proof of his progress, after having won the prix de Rome in 1884 with his cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue." The piece was condemned by the worthy gentlemen of the Academy as "unduly modern, insufficiently precise in form and design." And among these learned gentlemen were Ambrose Thomas, Delibes, Reyer, Massenet and Saint-Saens. The Academy approved of Debussy's third envoi, surprisingly enough, since the music is rather more modern than the suite heard yesterday. They offered to perform the latter composition. Debussy insisted that if "Le Damoiselle Elue" was performed, the "Printemps" would have to be played also. As this was refused, the piece was withdrawn for some years. Debussy showed his sense of tone-color by composing it in the unwarrantable key of F sharp major. This, too, displeased the gentlemen of the Academy.

Effective Instrumentation

For the advanced Debussyites, the music may have seemed tame compared to the later compositions of Debussy. The majority of those present, however, were delighted by the freshness and the spirit of the composition, by the exceptional beauty of the instrumentation, of which it may be said that familiar instruments are used with unfamiliar and exquisite effect, and instruments that are unfamiliar in the orchestral sense of the word are employed with the happiest results. Note the singular skill with which the two pianos are employed—instruments supposed to be almost incompatible with orchestral homogeneity of tone. The composition was heartily applauded.

Mr. Witek played the Tschaikowsky concerto. Contrary to custom, he had not resigned his duties as concertmeister in the orchestra, simply because he was to appear as a soloist. When the time came, he stepped very simply from his chair in the orchestra and commenced to play.

Mr. Witek's remarkably beautiful and classic performance of the Beethoven concerto, some seasons ago, is still remembered. Since that time, when he made his debut as a soloist in this city, he has shown various aspects of his art. But there were few who suspected that he would play the concerto of Tschikowsky with an unweakened sense of form and style, and yet retain in his interpretation all the savagery of the music. He did, indeed, make certain passages more artistic than they had ever before appeared to this writer, but the flavor of Vodka was there in spite of the consummate artistry. Soloist and conductor vied with each other in the interpretation of a music which is Slav to the core. To marvel at Mr. Witek's superb performance was only half; it was necessary to give continual homage to Dr. Muck during the accompaniment which he played for the first two movements. It was as though one man and one instrument were playing the concerto, rather than two men and an orchestra composed of many individuals of varying tastes and dispositions. Occasionally in the last moment the orchestra was the merest trifle back of the accented beat.

To particularize on the excellences of Mr. Witek's performance would take much space and perhaps prove unprofitable. His performance was engrossing in its expensiveness and its fire; in the lordly announcement of certain themes and in the sensuous singing of others; in the proportion and the coherence of the conception; in the deliberate roughness that was observed in the rendering of rough and barbaric music. A master interpretation which made a curious concerto almost stronger and finer than it was, and that with the loss of no essential characteristic.

SUNDAY POST,

JANUARY 25,

SCHUMANN-HEINK

The annual song recital of Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink is always one of the welcome events of a season. The singer will appear in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Feb. 1, at 3:30. This will be her first appearance in Boston in a year, and it will be her only recital.

FLONZALEY QUARTET

The second concert of the Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 29, at 8:15. The programme will begin with Mozart's adagio and fugue in C minor. The second number will be Schoenberg's quartet in D minor, opus 7, which was recently given a private performance at Mrs. John L. Gardiner's Fenway Palace, and which has not as yet been performed publicly in this city. The last number is Beethoven's quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2.

ETHEL NEWCOMB

Ethel Newcomb, a brilliant American pianist, will make her debut in this city at a recital in Jordan Hall Friday afternoon, Jan. 30. Miss Newcomb has appeared as soloist with orchestra in Berlin, Vienna and London. Her programme comprises Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Beethoven's sonata No. 3, a group of Chopin and Schumann numbers, Rachmaninoff's serenade, Debussy's "Poissons d'Or" and Leschetizky's "Tarantella."

CULP-CARRENO

The concert is Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given by Teresa Carreno, pianist, and Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano. Madame Carreno will play three times, including the Appassionata Sonata of Beethoven, and Madame Culp will sing three groups of songs. The programme is as follows:

Sonate, op. 57....................Beethoven
Mme. Carreno.
Waldesgesprach ....Schumann
Die Kartenlegerin ....Schumann
Mondnacht ....Schumann
Lied eines Schmiedes....................Schumann
Mme. Culp.
Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2....................Chopin
Etude, G flat ....Chopin
Polonaise, A flat, op. 53....................Chopin
Mme. Carreno.
Verborgenheit ....Hugo Wolf
In den Schatten meiner Locken....Hugo Wolf
Mausfallen-Spruchlein ....Hugo Wolf
Er ist's ....Hugo Wolf
Mme. Culp.
Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3..........Schubert
Marche militaire ....Schubert-Taussig
Mme. Carreno.
On the Banks of Allen Water....C. E. Horn
The Cottage Maid....................Beethoven
Robin Adair ....Beethoven
I've Been Roaming............Old English

JACQUES THIBAUD

Jacques Thibaud, violinist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon, Jan. 31. The programme includes Bruch's concerto in D minor, a group of short pieces by Beethoven, Bach and Desplanes; Saint-Saens' fantasie for harp and violin, and the last number will be three short pieces

---

SUNDAY GLOBE—

JANUARY 25.

Carreno and Culp Today at Symphony Hall.

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be given by those two superb women artists, Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp. Carreno has long had a large and admiring public in Boston and in two sesions Julia Culp has attained to most extraordinary popularity. Mme Carreno will play three times, including the Appassionata sonata of Beethoven; Mme Culp will sing three groups of songs. The program is as follows:

Sonate, opus 57....................Beethoven
Mme Carreno.
Waldesgesprach; Die Kartenlegerin; Mondnacht; Lied Eines Schmiedes.....Schumann
Mme Culp.
Nocturne, opus 37, No. 2; Etude, G flat; Polonaise, A flat, opus 53...........Chopin
Mme Carreno.
Verborgenheit; In den Schatten Meiner Locken; Mausfallen-Spruchlein; Er Ist's.Hugo Wolf
Mme Culp.
Impromptu, opus 90, No. 3 (Schubert); Marche Militaire (Schubert-Tausig).
Mme Carreno.
On the Banks of Allen Water (Chas. E. Horn); The Cottage Maid (Beethoven); Robin Adair (Beethoven); I've Been Roaming (old English), Mme Culp.

Symphony Orchestra This Week on Western Trip.

The Symphony Orchestra will leave Boston tonight with practically its entire personnel for its annual tour in the Middle West. It will give, as usual, six concerts. Monday night it plays in Syracuse; Tuesday, Buffalo; Wednesday, Pittsburg; Thursday, Cleveland; Friday, Columbus; Saturday, Detroit. Directly after the Detroit concert it returns to Boston.

The [illegible] travel in special train, comprising three sleepers, a baggage car and dining car. Dr Muck will go. Last year he was prevented from going West by his serious illness which incapacitated him for several weeks.

The 14th Symphony program to be played Friday afternoon, Feb 6, and Saturday evening, Feb 7, will present Teresa Carreno as soloist. The orchestral numbers will be Brahm's "Emperor" concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Brahm's fourth symphony, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 26.

NOTED ARTISTES IN SUNDAY CONCERT

Manager Mudgett's popular Sunday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall yesterday had as stars two of the most prominent artistes in the musical world today, Teresa Carreno, the pianist, and Julia Culp, the lieder singer. This twain extraordinary proved magnetic enough to fill the big hall with music lovers. Even the platform held its enthusiastic contingent.

Mme. Carreno is one of the most remarkable women in professional life. She gave her first recital here fifty-one years ago this month; and she was then a juvenile prodigy, in her 10th year. Later she returned here as an opera singer. In Venezuela, her native land, she has conducted opera. She also composed the Venezuelan national hymn. Two distinguished musicians, Emile Sauret, the violinist, and Eugene d'Albert, the pianist, have been among her husbands, and at one time she was celebrated for her beauty no less than for her artistry. When she first appeared in Paris, as a pianist, she was described as being as "beautiful as a Galatea just leaving the chisel of a Pygmalion." She is a handsome woman today, an Amazon among pianists, and her playing yesterday excited great applause. She played as many encores as regular numbers. But her art has lost some of its old luster.

The audience also waxed applausive over the delightful singing of Mme. Culp and the masterly accompaniments played on the piano by Conraad V. Bos, who, like the mezzo-soprano herself, hails from Holland.

The soloist next Sunday will be Mme. Schumann-Heink.

TRANSCRIPT,

, JANUARY 24,

THE SYMPHONY

As a wise conductor should occasionally do, Dr. Muck amused and pleasured his audience at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon with a light programme. It filled no more than an hour and a half, and so satisfied those elder matrons who set their unchangeable standards in such things in Mr. Gericke's relatively easy-goingtime and who cannot conceive of a conductor ambitious to have more than seventy minutes for the actual performance of music through twenty-four weeks of the year and of conductors eager to hear more than that hour and ten minutes of it. Yesterday the conductor was considerate of them, though he did sybject them to the strain of more than one "fake" climax and "fake" close—as the mountain climbers say of summits—in Liszt's "Hungarii," so that there was much reaching for hats before the appointed end. All this, however, ran merely by the way beside the pretty pleasure of Debussy's new suite, "The Spring," to hear which at Dr. Muck's and the orchestra's hands was like hearing lyrically pensive and lyrically berse read by an actor of exquisite beauty of intonation and as fine a sensitiveness of feeling; or beside the more glowing joys of Tscharkowsky's concerto for violin as Mr. Watek played it; or beside the ample—the somewhat too ample—satisfactions of Liszt's large sonorities, sharp-set rhythms and variously excited mood in "Hungaria." Everyone listened happily; applauded generously and departed contentedly.

Meanwhile a few simpleminded auditors had a private satisfaction of their own in a little custom that Mr. Welek—with the coöperation of Dr. Muck—wisely restored. Annually, the two first violinists, and the first 'cellist of the orchestra plays the solo part in a concerto. He is not exactly an "assisting artist" as the visiting virtuosi are; he is rather one of the foremost members of the orchestra entitled to his day of individual prominence and distinction. As a part of the glories of orchestra, in token indeed of his esprit de corp; toward it, and in service to simplicity at our concerts, he should bear his share in the rest of the programme, rise from his place to begin his concerto and return to it when it is done. Mr. Hess, who had his human vanities, wished to be a "soloist" in the full sense of the word and to go and come, outside the rest of the concert, after the manner of a Kreisler or a Graye. He did so when he played a concerto and the other solo violinists of the orchestra have rather blindly followed year after year in his change of custom. Yesterday, Mr. Welek happily restored the simpler way and the way that marks the soloist as a "member of the orchestra before he is a virtuoso. After all, to be a member so close for a concerto, is not a small distinction.

[105]

[illegible] esthetically sainted in the youthful years in which he wrote "The Spring," and other more or less familiar pieces that he and the curiosity of the public have revived in the years of his vogue and middle age; but there are degrees, none the less, among them. His cantata made opera, "The Prodigal Son," is pale and thin music with very apparent obligations to the late Monsieur Massenet and the trailings of the conservatory. Some of the piano pieces that other hands than his have scored for orchestra out of his young years are scarcely more interesting or individual. "The Spring," on the other hand, especially in such performance as it received yesterday, charms the ear, stirs answering fancy and is believably of Debussy even in the years of his schooling at Rome. With reason, he seems to have kept an affection for the piece, to have remodelled it more than once and finally to have shifted it himself from the voice of the piano to the voices of the orchestra with the piano played by four hands stiull joined to them. Moreover, with a very adroit skill and with a curious faculty for retrospective imagination as it were, he has written in the new version as a young Debussy might have written it. With sly ingenuity that must have pleased his GoGthic sense of irony and innuendo, the harmonic and the instrumental coloring of "The Spring" sounds as though it were anticipating the ways of the Debussy of maturity.

In itself, moreover, the suite is fanciful, individual and pleasurable music. Each of the two movements has its suggestion of mood. The first mood is of intmiate and inner response to the coming of the spring. The sun becomes warmer; the light brightens; trees and flowers into leafage bloom; the spirits of men quicken; and all the world is alive with a new radiance and a new vitality, and thick again with young and tender fancies. To the youth of the world a youth of the spirit. So Debussy writes the first movement of his suite, luminous of melody, luminous of harmony, lightly radiant with color, stirring to bright rhythms—a little tone-poem of soft and awakening lights. The spring deepens; the first gentle elation becomes gayety; to meditation succeeds joy and the second movement of the suite by no means as fabulous and fanciful of melody and coloring, as the first run of its lively and ebullient course. And then the music is gone like a rush of spring wind, through the spring sunshine. Debussy might almost have called it a "Moment Musicale.'

SUNDAY HERALD,

JANUARY 25,

CULP-CARRENO

The concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be by Mmes. Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp. Mme. Carreno has long had a large and admiring public in Boston and in two seasons Julia Culp has attained great popularity. The programme will be as follows:

Sonate, Op. 57..................Beethoven
Mme. Carreno.
Waldesgespraech
Die Kartenlegerin
Mondnacht
Lied eines Schmiedes } ....Schumann
Mme. Culp.
(a) Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 2
(b) Etude, G-flat
(c) Polonaise, A-flat, Op. 53 } .....Chopin
Mme. Carreno.
Verborgenheit
In den Schatten meiner Locken
Mausfallen-Spruchlein
Er ist's } ..H. Wolf
Mme. Culp.
(a) Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3....Schubert
(b) Marche Militaire......Schubert-Tausig
Mme. Carreno.
On the Banks of Allen Water........Horn
The Cottage Maid
Robin Adair ....Beethoven
I've Been Roaming.................Horn
Mme. Culp.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony orchestra is leaving Boston tomorrow night with practically its entire personnel for its annual tour in the middle West. It will give six concerts. Monday night it plays in Syracuse, Tuesday in Buffalo, Wednesday in Pittsburgh, Thursday in Cleveland, Friday in Columbus, and Saturday in Detroit. Directly after the Detroit concert it returns to Boston. The orchestra will travel by special train, comprising three sleepers, a baggage car and dining car. Dr. Muck, of course, goes along. Last year he was prevented from going West by his serious illness which incapacitated him for several weeks.

The program for the 14th public rehearsal concert Friday afternoon, Feb. 6, and Saturday evening, Feb. 7, will include Brahms's Fourth Symphony, the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Beethoven's concerto No. 5, with Mme. Carreno, pianist.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 24,

A NEW DEBUSSY WORK IS HEARD

DR. MUCK PRESENTS THE "PRINTEMPS" SUITE

Liszt's "Hungaria" and Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto—Mr. Witek the Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Debussy—Orchestral Suite. "Printemps."
Tschaikowsky—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem. "Hungaria."

A reasonably short programme, as Muck programmes go, and one that had some contrasts. From the charm of Debussy to the glitter of Liszt was a long step, with the Tschaikowsky concerto as a buffer between the two. This concerto is as difficult as any modern work for the violin that we know of. But there are no technical difficulties for Mr. Anton Witek. Let a work bristle with technical thorns, he plays on, as imperturbably as if it were Kreutzer study. Sometimes we wish that there were a little more of human emotion in his work; that he were not so remote and calm and Jove-like. But his performance was something memorable even in this "violin year"

The concerto is in some degree musician's music, and is often more beloved by the artist who plays it than by the auditor who hears it. But its middle movement is ground where musician and non-musician can meet in full appreciation. This Canzonetta was given with great charm, but the first movement was, on the whole, the most powerful and effective. The Finale too was wonderfully played, but one has become accustomed to the inebriated merriment of the Muscovite and to the "damnable iteration" which accompanies it.

The caprices of tempo were caught up perfectly both by Mr. Witek and Dr. Muck, and the ensemble was excellent, the work being more elastic than we have heard it in a long time. At the end Mr. Witek was called out again and again, and certainly deserved the great enthusiasm that he evoked.

One can only wonder that this strong concerto aroused such intense opposition and bitter criticism at the outset of its career; even Tschaikowsky's friends looked at it askance, while his enemies fairly danced upon it.

The Opening of Spring.

The chief interest of the concert centered in a new work by Debussy. The opening season of the year is responsible for many things; Spring bonnets, Spring medicine, Spring chickens, Spring poems, and considerable Spring music. In the evening we had Wagner's views on Spring, at the Opera, in Walther's song, "So rief der Lenz," and in the afternoon, in Symphony Hall, we had Debussy's more extended views upon the same subject. Well, for once we had a work by Debussy that we can cordially admire from beginning to end, and grow enthusiastic over. There was a harmonic flow of beauty from the very first; there was tangible melody, beautiful and logical figure treatment, and the delicacy of many parts of the score was most refreshing in these days of monster orchestras.

It is a short Suite, of two movements only. The first pensive, sweet and dreamy the second more resolute and triumphant. In the second Debussy uses more brass than is his wont, but this is not a fault by any means. As long ago as Glinka the piano was used as an orchestral tone-color, but we have seldom heard it so effectively interwoven into a score as in this composition. It is played four-handed, and the artistic excellence of Messrs. De Voto and Gebhardt may account for the fine effect attained.

In the second movement the harp was beautifully used and beautifully played. There were bold contrasts and sudden changes in this movement; the piccolo was incisive, the trombones had impressive passages and the kettle-drummer had his innings, too.

There were some noble climaxes in this part of the work and Dr. Muck brought them out with telling effect. The rhythmic swing of an eight-noted figure that is very clearly developed was inspiring, and the elfin march in the early part of the movement was also a fine touch. Altogether, then, this was a different Debussy from the sea-sick composer in "La Mer," or even the elusive one who pictured that "mauvais quart d'heure" of the Faun, and the audience sensed this, too, and applauded the work with vigor.

As to Hungaria.

After the Slav there came the Magyar, and Liszt followed Tschaikowsky to his own disadvantage.

Liszt's "Hungaria," was also new, at least at these concerts. It is not quite in the class of his Hungarian Fantasie, nor as spontaneous as some of his well-known Rhapsodies inspired by the same country. Recently some Hungarian writers have begun to maintain that Liszt's Hungarian works are not really national at all, but Gypsy compositions. Nevertheless, as we have heard the Gypsy music from one end of Hungary to the other, and as the Hungarians seem to accept it as their own, we need not heed the voice which cries that Hungarian music is really more like the old Gregorian, that it is essentially religious, and that the Gypsy tunes misrepresent it.

This symphonic poem is founded on a Hungarian march, which was well roared out, coming a close second to Strauss's "Festliches Praeludium." It ran in alternate layers of pianissimo and fortissimo, and one found some memories of the Rakoczy March as arranged by Berlioz, floating around in the turmoil. Of course there were mysterious pauses and also triumphant trumpet fanfares. The modern composer changes Hoyle's well-known rule into "When in doubt play trumpets!"

The kettle-drummer had a good chance [illegible] If he had active busi- [illegible]

BOSTON GLOBE

JANUARY 24,

WITEK AS SOLOIST.

Plays the Tschaikowsky Concerto Superbly.

Debussy's Youthful "Printemps" of Exquisite Imagination.

At the 13th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon Dr Muck brought to a first hearing in Boston Debussy's youthful "Printemps," written during the composer's sojourn at Rome as a grand prize student. It proved a work of absorbing charm and spirit and made one wonder where it had been all these years. Mr Witek, the concert master, made the concert more notable by giving a superb performance of Tschaikowsky's titanic concerto in D major, a feat the more overpowering for the corresponding virtuosity and emotional furor of conductor and orchestra, who here appear as associate soloists.

Debussy's work reveals the fine and delicate texture of a sensitive mind and imagination, a spirit open to the liquid beauty of Nature in the Southern capital and reflecting its tranquility and its ardors. It is inherently the expression of a poet whose ear and heart are intimately and happily attuned to life, and who sings for sheer joy in song.

There are no promises of the harmonic characteristics of the composer's later style. There is the usual diatonic scale, but the elusive and vaporous grace of the orchestral fabric, the sheen of color which plays upon it, and the succeeding procession of ideas, now evolving from what precedes, but more often dissolving as by the mystery of night into some contrasting, unlooked for fancy, arresting in its difference, yet never abrupt or incongruous—these traits point to the fuller development, the matchless and incomparable individuality of style that was to follow in "The Afternoon of a Faun," in "Pelleas and Melisande" and "Iberia." There are two movements—the first one of serene and exquisite beauty as of the potentiality of youth and all that is vernal, and the second, the glory the upspring exultation of its unfolding and accomplishment. Both numbers were interpreted con amore and as with the instinct of poetry. The piano four hands—how marvelously Debussy sensed its power in tone color—was played by Messrs Gebhard and De Voto.

Mr Witek, who arose from his chair in the orchestra after playing in the Debussy number, proceeded with the concerto without the usual entrance and flourish usually the expected incident to a solo appearance. How many of the heralded virtuosi could have duplicated the masterful performance Mr Witek gave of this terrific work? It was the playing of a sovereign technician, a scholar, a spirited and imaginative interpreter.

The eminent violinist has not a heroic G string, and there were moments when he seemed about to crowd its capacity for tone, but these were fleeting. In the passion and abandon of bravura, in pyrotechnic flights, in the difficult cadenzas, and particularly in the noble song of the slow movement, in which Tschaikowsky avoids the banality that in other evil moments has beset him, Mr Witek distinguished himself and brought glory to the orchestra of which he is a member. He merited his ovation. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," was played for the first time at these concerts as a closing number. Next week the orchestra will make its annual Western trip.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

JANUARY 24.

WITEK ACHIEVES BRILLIANT SUCCESS

Plays Concerto by Tschaikowsky at Symphony Concert.

Anton Witek, the concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra, achieved his greatest success yesterday, when he gave a skilful and sympathetic performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major. The audience gave him a friendly greeting when he rose from his regular place, which he had modestly occupied during the performance of the first number of the program; it waxed enthusiastic over the sparkling technique he displayed in the first movement, as well as the grace with which he rendered the ingratiating melodies, and it recalled him again and again at the brilliant finish of the concerto.

It was a genuine success—a demonstration of the concert-master's expertness as a violinist and, at the same time, a great credit to this band of virtuosi. The bristling difficulties of the cadenza in the first movement were met with surety, and, though Mr. Witek's tone is not large, the glowing themes with which the concerto is liberally gemmed were given with telling effect. The tunes, for once, did not seem sickly sweet, for Mr. Witek did not sentimentalize over them. Other cities should hear this performance, in which the orchestra appears with a glory that is not borrowed.

Debussy's symphonic suite, "Printemps," a melodious work written when the composer was studying in Rome over twenty-five years ago, was heard here yesterday for the first time. Heinrich Gebhard and Alfred de Voto played the piano parts. The second movement, with its rhapsod[illegible]

HERALD, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 24. 1914.

REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Witek, as Solo Violinist, Wins Well-Deserved Applause for Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. Mr. Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Printemps: Suite Symphonique....Debussy
First time in Boston.
Concerto for violin.........Tschaikowsky
"Hungaria," Symphonic poem, No. 9..Liszt
First time at these concerts.

Debussy's "Printemps" was composed when, having taken the "prix de Rome," he was at the Villa Medicis. It was sent to Paris as one of the required "envois," but the highly respectable committee of the Institute looked sourly on it. The music was "dangerously modern"; no God-fearing composer should presume to write in the key of F sharp major, and a chorus should sing words. So when Debussy returned the Suite was rejected, and he refused to allow the performance of his "Blessed Damozel." This was about 1887. "Printemps" was written originally for orchestra, piano and a chorus (without words). Debussy transcribed this score for two pianos and a chorus; then again for piano (four hands) and a chorus, and this arrangement was published in 1904. The present orchestral score was published in 1913 and the first performance was at Paris last April.

We do not know how closely in contents and orchestral expression the present Suite resembles the original draught; whether the Debussy of the later years Debussyized the youth at Rome. This may be said: "Printemps," as it was played yesterday, has melodic thoughts that show the influence of Massenet, and there are harmonic progressions and orchestral devices that characterize the composer of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." The first movement is almost constantly beautiful; simple in thought for the most part, but thought and expression are poetic. It cannot be said of this music that consonances are so rare that they seem dissonances. The first movement is of an idyllic nature, and it suggests a Spring that, alas, is not known in New England. There is no need of a program or even a motto.

The second movement is of a more exuberant nature and there is a sort of glorified "double-shuffle," the exultation of nature and man in the freshness and life of Spring. While in the first movement the orchestration is charming in its ingenuity, it is more fantastic in the second, more deliberately sought out. Thus the two movements are in effective contrast, and both made yesterday a strong appeal to the audience, the former by its beauty of thought and its euphony, the latter by its sharply defined rhythms, its lively theme that might easily have been yulgar if it had been treated by a less skilful composer, and its prevailing joyousness. The performance was an admirable one.

Mr. Witek went back to the good old habit of rising from the concertmaster's seat to play the concerto. Some years ago a concertmaster of this orchestra instituted the practice of coming on the stage as a visitor who would not deign to play in the piece preceding or following. Mr. Witek played throughout the concert, nor did this impair in the slightest degree his performance of Tschaikowsky's work or lessen the esteem in which he is held by the public. On the contrary, the audience thought the better of him.

His interpretation of the concerto was that of a commanding virtuoso and an excellent musician. He displayed an emotional quality in the first movement and in the Canzonetta that has not always been observed in his solo work, sound and excellent as it has been, and this may also be said of the spirit with which he played the Cadenza; of the dash and fury he imparted to the Finale. Well did he deserve the enthusiastic and prolonged applause that rewarded him.

Listz's "Hungaria" had been performed here only once until yesterday, and that was by the old Philharmonic orchestra led by Bernard Listemann in 1891. The performance then was necessarily unsatisfactory. This symphonic poem was one of Liszt's answers to a Hungarian poet, Vorosmarty, who urged him to sing the woes and battles and glory of their country in music. Pages of this work are rhapsodic after the manner of Liszt's characteristic national works for the piano. The chief theme was taken from a Hungarian march composed some years before, and that in turn was derived from a "Revolutionary" symphony that was never completed. "Hungaria" cannot be ranked with the best of the symphonic poems; there is not a little bombast; there are inconsequential repetitions of pompously trivial thoughts; there is bathos instead of pathos; it is on the whole rather theatrical and long spun-out. Yet there are a few exciting pages and the final "Hurrah!" stirs the phlegmatic and assures them that music after all has its uses.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 6, 7 will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Beethoven, piano concerto No 5 (Mme Carreno, pianist); [illegible]

JANUARY 24.

TRAVELER

MR. WITEK PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

The 13th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was notable for the first Boston performance of Debussy's "Printemps" suite. The remainder of the program consisted of Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin played by Mr. Witek and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

"Printemps" is one of Debussy's earlier compositions and therefore it is not so strongly individual as the music that has been more recently associated with his name. Some of the newer Debussy may have crept in when he rewrote the piece for orchestra last year. Yesterday's performance was delightful and was well received by the audience.

Following Debussy, Mr. Witek modestly rose from his seat in the orchestra and played the concerto. Rarely, if ever, has he been heard to better advantage. He was the skilled musician, the authoritative interpreter. There was emotion and intelligence in every sweep of his bow. The audience gave him a deserved ovation.

Liszt's stirring tone-poem was played with all the fire and dash which Dr. Muck k[illegible] how to bring out, and it was an [illegible] a remarkable concert.

RECORD.

JANUARY 24.

A NEW DEBUSSY WORK IS HEARD

PROGRAMME.

Debussy—Orchestral Suite. "Printemps."
Tschaikowsky—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem. "Hungaria."

A reasonably short programme, as Muck programmes go, and one that had some

ALFRED DE VOTO,
Who with Mr. Gebhardt plays the piano part of the Debussy number.

Spring chickens, Spring poems, and considerable Spring music. In the evening we had Wagner's views on Spring, at the contrasts. From the charm of Debussy to the glitter of Liszt was a long step, with the Tschaikowsky concerto as a buffer between the two. This concerto is as difficult as any modern work for the violin that we know of. But there are no technical difficulties for Mr. Anton Witek. Let a work bristle with technical thorns, he plays on as imperturbably as if it were Kreutzer study. Sometimes we wish that there were a little more of human emotion in his work; that he were not so remote and calm and Jove-like. But his performance was something memorable even in this "violin year," says Louis C. Elson in his symphony review in the Advertiser.

The chief interest of the concert centered in a new work by Debussy. The opening season of the year is responsible for many things; Spring bonnets, Spring medicine, Opera, in Walther's song, "So rief der Lenz," and in the afternoon, in Symphony Hall, we had Debussy's more extended views upon the same subject. Well, for once we had a work by Debussy that we can cordially admire from beginning to end, and grow enthusiastic over. There was a harmonic flow of beauty from the very first; there was tangible melody, beautiful and logical figure treatment, and the delicacy of many parts of the score was most refreshing in these days of monster orchestras.

It is a short Suite, of two movements only. The first pensive, sweet and dreamy, the second more resolute and triumphant. In the second Debussy uses more brass than is his wont, but this is not a fault by any means. As long ago as Glinka the piano was used as an orchestral tone-color, but we have seldom heard it so effectively interwoven into a score as in this composition. It is played four-handed, and the artistic excellence of Messrs. De Voto and Gebhardt may account for the fine effect attained.

MONITOR.

JANUARY 24, 1914

Rewritten Early Compositic Debussy and Unfamiliar Poem of Liszt Hold Atter of Symphony Concert H

ANTON WITEK PLA

Producing Debussy's "Spring," an early composition which the composer has revised in the manner of his cantata, "The Prodigal Son," introducing into the repertory the symphonic poem of Liszt entitled "Hungaria" and presenting the Tschaikowsky violin concerto with Anton Witek as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra delighted its rehearsal subscribers on Friday afternoon with music of lighter demand on attention and appreciation than that which it has played at the earlier concerts of the month. The Debussy suite was a little more in line with what Bostonians have lately been regarding as characteristically French than the Cesar Franck symphony of three weeks ago; the Liszt piece, though new to the public, and unimportant compared with the familiar works of the composer, evoked a more spontaneous response than the vast Bruckner ninth symphony of last week.

The event of the concert and one of the events to mark high in the record of the orchestra for the year was the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto. A soloist has some excusable place in a symphony concert program when he comes forward from the orchestra itself, in that way that Mr. Witek presented himself on Friday, and when he has the artistic support and understanding of the accompanying artists and of the conductor as the concertmaster had on this occasion. It would be an ideal condition if an orchestra could confine its solo numbers to works which, like the Tschaikowsky concerto, could be handled by men right in the organization. The effect in general is better than when a touring artist is invited in to assist, even if the visitor is a virtuoso of great renown. And the effect when a performer of Mr. Witek's talents is available is not to be surpassed. Since Dr. Muck began his second period of conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra, there has been no solo violin work played with such all-around brilliance as the second number of this program. The concerto was a true symphonic piece, as it was interpreted by Dr. Muck, the men on the general instrumental parts and the man reading the solo violin line. It was an enterprise to be credited to the institution as a whole rather than to the soloist, remarkably as he acquitted himself. One other presentation in recent seasons may be put beside this one, the playing last year of the Beethoven concerto with Fritz Kreisler at the front of the platform. From the moment Mr. Kreisler delivered the cadenza in the first movement of that piece he was a popular artist in Boston. Mr. Witek could lay claim to abilities of the first order in his pronouncement of the Tschaikowsky cadenza. But the declaiming of the cadenza soliloquy was not the important thing of the afternoon. The point which the record should emphasize is that conductor, orchestra and concertmaster gave a production of the Russian composer's work in the manner of a symphony, and gave it with extraordinary success.

The only thing out of the usual rehearsal routine in Mr. Witek's deportment was his quitting his chair at the front desk of the first violin section, standing close to the director, and taking the attitude of one speaking to the house. His manner as a player was no different from what it has been when he has recited little incidental solo violin passages which have occurred from time to time in the performance by the orchestra lately of modern tone poems and symphonies. He addressed the house not as a virtuoso engaged at vast expense to give a half hour of special entertainment, but as a representative of labor of Mr. Witek as its concertmaster.

The rehearsal house was enthusiastic in its applause of the solo number. It was also pleased with the new French music with which the program began. In particular it liked the second of the two movements of "Spring," which is in the Debussian humorous vein. The composer of "Pelleas" and of "The Afternoon" has let his fun show itself more often in his piano pieces than in his orchestral scores. His satire is as individual and delicious expressed through the larger as through the smaller vehicle. His orchestra is elegantly witty, [illegible] of a famous

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 21 1914

Estab

Symphony Concert.

Among those in the audience at the third symphony concert in Infantry Hall last evening were President Faunce of Brown University, Rev. Dr. George McClellan Fiske and Mrs. Fiske, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Dr. Jules Jordan, Mr. Alexander D. Chapin, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Rush Sturges, Mr. Lauriston H. Hazard, Mrs. Livingston Ham, Miss Mary Foster, Mr. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Jr., Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Mr. F. Ellis Jackson, Miss Georgia Francis Fiske, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Keefe, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. George A. Freeman, Mrs. A. Curtis Tingley, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber, Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Mary Comstock, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Emerson, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Helen Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Morris Conant, Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Buttolph, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles E. Longley, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Miss Gertrude Lawson, Miss Isabel R. Brown and Miss Barbara Littlefield.

From SUN
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 27 1914

Esta

Conductor Karl Muck And His Orchestra

Tomorrow night in Carnegie Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the closing concert in the Ellis series. Dr. Muck is declared to be the leading orchestral conductor of the world, and unusual interest is manifest in his first visit to Pittsburgh. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, is a violinist known throughout Europe and America. The program announced has also been received with great favor, for it contains two new works to be heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, the Glazounoff symphony No. 5, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes. Bizet and Liszt will be represented in two old favorites, the "L'Arlesienne" suite, and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

SCHUMANN-HEINK CONCERT

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 28 1914

Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Tonight

rk, 1

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in the city this morning with his organization of 100 players for the closing concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie Music Hall tonight. The coniert promises to be even more brilliant than the three preceding ones in this most notable series. It is Dr. Muck's first visit to Pittsburgh. The following program will be given:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5........ Glazounoff
Caprice on Spanish themes........ Rimsky-Korsakoff
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1"........ Bizet
Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes........ Liszt

From
Address
Date JAN 2 1914

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT HERE THIS EVENING

34

The climax of Buffalo's musical season is the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with practically its entire membership of between 90 and 100 men, with its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with Ruth Lewis-Ashley as soloist, will give a concert tonight in the Elmwood Music Hall, the fourth in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

A rarely beautiful program is announced for tonight, opening with Beethoven's seventh symphony. Miss Ashley will sing the Delilah aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," and Schubert's Erlking, with orchestral accompaniment. Bizet's suite L'Arlesienne and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," will complete the program, which will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

[107]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 25 1914

Esta

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 3, the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, the most extraordinary woman pianist of our time.

Madame Carreno, who is of Spanish blood, a native of Venezuela, is now in her 61st year and has been a professional musician since 1862. In London, in 1912, she celebrated the 50th anniversary of her first appearance in public. For 40 of these 50 years she has held a unique place among the pianists of her time. Of that group of extraordinary women which includes, besides herself, Essi Poff and Menter, Carreno alone has been able to maintain her place among the world's gifted pianists, and to-day is playing with the same sweeping technique and the same fervid temperament that made her famous as a girl.

At the coming Symphony Orchestra concert she will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, which, like his violin concerto, has been for over 100 years accepted as a final test of a pianist's ability. Other and modern concertos may be more difficult from a purely technical point of view, but Beethoven makes the greatest demands on the mind and the heart.

For the orchestral part of the concert Dr. Muck has selected the D-minor Symphony of Cesar Franck and Dvorak's brilliant "Husitska" overture.

* * *

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 27 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra conductor and concertmaster.

DR. KARL MUCK.

, 1884

Noted Orchestra to Close Concert Series

The last in the series of Ellis concerts will be given in Carnegie Music Hall tomorrow evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, under Dr. Karl Muck, in whose first visit to Pittsburgh there is unusual interest. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, is a violinist known throughout Europe and America. His friends here will welcome his return.

The program contains two new works to be heard for the first time in Pittsburgh: the Glazounoff Symphony No. 5 and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish themes. Bizet and Liszt will be represented in two old favorites, the "L'Arlesienne" Suite and the Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

JANUARY 24.

TRAVELER

MR. WITEK PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

The 13th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was notable for the first Boston performance of Debussy's "Printemps" suite. The remainder of the program consisted of Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin played by Mr. Witek and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." "Printemps" is one of Debussy's earlier compositions and therefore it is not so strongly individual as the music that has been more recently associated with his name. Some of the newer Debussy may have crept in when he rewrote the piece for orchestra last year. Yesterday's performance was delightful and was well received by the audience.

Following Debussy, Mr. Witek modestly rose from his seat in the orchestra and played the concerto. Rarely, if ever, has he been heard to better advantage. He was the skilled musician, the authoritative interpreter. There was emotion and intelligence in every sweep of his bow. The audience gave him a deserved ovation.

Liszt's stirring tone-poem was played with all the fire and dash which Dr. Muck k[illegible] [illegible]ll how to bring out, and it was an [illegible] a remarkable concert.

RECORD.

JANUARY 24.

A NEW DEBUSSY WORK IS HEARD

PROGRAMME.

Debussy—Orchestral Suite. "Printemps."
Tschaikowsky—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Anton Witek.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem. "Hungaria."

A reasonably short programme, as Muck programmes go, and one that had some

ALFRED DE VOTO,
Who with Mr. Gebhardt plays the piano part of the Debussy number.

Spring chickens, Spring poems, and considerable Spring music. In the evening we had Wagner's views on Spring, at the contrasts. From the charm of Debussy to the glitter of Liszt was a long step, with the Tschaikowsky concerto as a buffer between the two. This concerto is as difficult as any modern work for the violin that we know of. But there are no technical difficulties for Mr. Anton Witek. Let a work bristle with technical thorns, he plays on as imperturbably as if it were Kreutzer study. Sometimes we wish that there were a little more of human emotion in his work; that he were not so remote and calm and Jove-like. But his performance was something memorable even in this "violin year," says Louis C. Elson in his symphony review in the Advertiser.

The chief interest of the concert centered in a new work by Debussy. The opening season of the year is responsible for many things; Spring bonnets, Spring medicine, Opera, in Walther's song, "So rief der Lenz," and in the afternoon, in Symphony Hall, we had Debussy's more extended views upon the same subject. Well, for once we had a work by Debussy that we can cordially admire from beginning to end, and grow enthusiastic over. There was a harmonic flow of beauty from the very first; there was tangible melody, beautiful and logical figure treatment, and the delicacy of many parts of the score was most refreshing in these days of monster orchestras.

It is a short Suite, of two movements only. The first pensive, sweet and dreamy, the second more resolute and triumphant. In the second Debussy uses more brass than is his wont, but this is not a fault by any means. As long ago as Glinka the piano was used as an orchestral tone-color, but we have seldom heard it so effectively interwoven into a score as in this composition. It is played four-handed, and the artistic excellence of Messrs. De Voto and Gebhardt may account for the fine effect attained.

MONITOR.

JANUARY 24, 1914

Rewritten Early Composition of Debussy and Unfamiliar Tone Poem of Liszt Hold Attention of Symphony Concert House

ANTON WITEK PLAYS

Producing Debussy's "Spring," an early composition which the composer has revised in the manner of his cantata, "The Prodigal Son," introducing into the repertory the symphonic poem of Liszt entitled "Hungaria" and presenting the Tschaikowsky violin concerto with Anton Witek as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra delighted its rehearsal subscribers on Friday afternoon with music of lighter demand on attention and appreciation than that which it has played at the earlier concerts of the month. The Debussy suite was a little more in line with what Bostonians have lately been regarding as characteristically French than the Cesar Franck symphony of three weeks ago; the Liszt piece, though new to the public, and unimportant compared with the familiar works of the composer, evoked a more spontaneous response than the vast Bruckner ninth symphony of last week.

The event of the concert and one of the events to mark high in the record of the orchestra for the year was the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto. A soloist has some excusable place in a symphony concert program when he comes forward from the orchestra itself, in that way that Mr. Witek presented himself on Friday, and when he has the artistic support and understanding of the accompanying artists and of the conductor as the concertmaster had on this occasion. It would be an ideal condition if an orchestra could confine its solo numbers to works which, like the Tschaikowsky concerto, could be handled by men right in the organization. The effect in general is better than when a touring artist is invited in to assist, even if the visitor is a virtuoso of great renown. And the effect when a performer of Mr. Witek's talents is available is not to be surpassed. Since Dr. Muck began his second period of conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra, there has been no solo violin work played with such all-around brilliance as the second number of this program. The concerto was a true symphonic piece, as it was interpreted by Dr. Muck, the men on the general instrumental parts and the man reading the solo violin line. It was an enterprise to be credited to the institution as a whole rather than to the soloist, remarkably as he acquitted himself. One other presentation in recent seasons may be put beside this one, the playing last year of the Beethoven concerto with Fritz Kreisler at the front of the platform. From the moment Mr. Kreisler delivered the cadenza in the first movement of that piece he was a popular artist in Boston. Mr. Witek could lay claim to abilities of the first order in his pronouncement of the Tschaikowsky cadenza. But the declaiming of the cadenza soliloquy was not the important thing of the afternoon. The point which the record should emphasize is that conductor, orchestra and concertmaster gave a production of the Russian composer's work in the manner of a symphony, and gave it with extraordinary success.

The only thing out of the usual rehearsal routine in Mr. Witek's deportment was his quitting his chair at the front desk of the first violin section, standing close to the director, and taking the attitude of one speaking to the house. His manner as a player was no different from what it has been when he has recited little incidental solo violin passages which have occurred from time to time in the performance by the orchestra lately of modern tone poems and symphonies. He addressed the house not as a virtuoso engaged at vast expense to give a half hour of special entertainment, but as a representative of labor of Mr. Witek as its concertmaster.

The rehearsal house was enthusiastic in its applause of the solo number. It was also pleased with the new French music with which the program began. In particular it liked the second of the two movements of "Spring," which is in the Debussian humorous vein. The composer of "Pelleas" and of "The Afternoon" has let his fun show itself more often in his piano pieces than in his orchestral scores. His satire is as individual and delicious expressed through the larger as through the smaller vehicle. His orchestra is elegantly witty, [illegible] of a famous

---

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.

[illegible] 1913

Symphony Concert.

Among those in the audience at the third symphony concert in Infantry Hall last evening were President Faunce of Brown University, Rev. Dr. George Mc-Clellan Fiske and Mrs. Fiske, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Dr. Jules Jordan, Mr. Alexander D. Chapin, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Rush Sturges, Mr. Lauriston H. azard, Mrs. Livingston Ham, Miss Mary oster, Mr. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. arles H. Merriman, Jr., Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Mr. F. Ellis Jackson, Miss Georgia Francis Fiske, Miss Maria L. Corliss, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Keefe, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. George A. Freeman, Mrs. A. Curtis Tingley, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber, Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Mary Comstock, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Emerson, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Helen Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Morris Conant, Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Buttolph, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Miss Alice Thurber, Mrs. Charles E. Longley, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Miss Gertrude Lawson, Miss Isabel R. Brown and Miss Barbara Littlefield.

From SUN
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 27 1914

Esta

Conductor Karl Muck And His Orchestra

Tomorrow night in Carnegie Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the closing concert in the Ellis series. Dr. Muck is declared to be the leading orchestral conductor of the world, and unusual interest is manifest in his first visit to Pittsburgh. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, is a violinist known throughout Europe and America. The program announced has also been received with great favor, for it contains two new works to be heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, the Glazounoff symphony No. 5, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes. Bizet and Liszt will be represented in two old favorites, the "L'Arlesienne" suite, and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

4

SCHUMANN-HEINK CONCERT

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 28 1914

Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Tonight

rk, 1

Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in the city this morning with his organization of 100 players for the closing concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie Music Hall tonight. The coniert promises to be even more brilliant than the three preceding ones in this most notable series. It is Dr. Muck's first visit to Pittsburgh. The following program will be given:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5........ Glazounoff
Caprice on Spanish themes........ Rimsky-Korsakoff
Suite, "L'Arlesienne No. 1"........ Bizet
Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes........ Liszt

From
Address
Date JAN 2 1914

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT HERE THIS EVENING

34

The climax of Buffalo's musical season is the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with practically its entire membership of between 90 and 100 men, with its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with Ruth Lewis-Ashley as soloist, will give a concert tonight in the Elmwood Music Hall, the fourth in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

A rarely beautiful program is announced for tonight, opening with Beethoven's seventh symphony. Miss Ashley will sing the Delilah aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," and Schubert's Erlking, with orchestral accompaniment. Bizet's suite L'Arlesienne and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," will complete the program, which will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 25 1914

Esta

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 3, the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, the most extraordinary woman pianist of our time.

Madame Carreno, who is of Spanish blood, a native of Venezuela, is now in her 61st year and has been a professional musician since 1862. In London, in 1912, she celebrated the 50th anniversary of her first appearance in public. For 40 of these 50 years she has held a unique place among the pianists of her time. Of that group of extraordinary women which includes, besides herself, Essi Poff and Menter, Carreno alone has been able to maintain her place among the world's gifted pianists, and to-day is playing with the same sweeping technique and the same fervid temperament that made her famous as a girl.

At the coming Symphony Orchestra concert she will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, which, like his violin concerto, has been for over 100 years accepted as a final test of a pianist's ability. Other and modern concertos may be more difficult from a purely technical point of view, but Beethoven makes the greatest demands on the mind and the heart.

For the orchestral part of the concert Dr. Muck has selected the D-minor Symphony of Cesar Franck and Dvorak's brilliant "Husitska" overture.

* * *

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 27 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra conductor and concertmaster.

DR. KARL MUCK.

, 1884

Noted Orchestra to Close Concert Series

The last in the series of Ellis concerts will be given in Carnegie Music Hall tomorrow evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, under Dr. Karl Muck, in whose first visit to Pittsburgh there is unusual interest. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, is a violinist known throughout Europe and America. His friends here will welcome his return.

The program contains two new works to be heard for the first time in Pittsburgh: the Glazounoff Symphony No. 5 and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish themes. Bizet and Liszt will be represented in two old favorites, the "L'Arlesienne" Suite and the Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

From Commercial
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

DR. KARL MUCK

Famous Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Had Vast Operatic Experience.

The career of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual Buffalo concert tonight, has been devoted chiefly to operatic work. From the time he began his work as a chorus master in Zurich 35 years ago until he ended his engagement with the Berlin Opera in the spring of 1912 he had always held positions in opera houses. His principal engagments were in Graz, Prague and Berlin. He was in the latter city for twenty years. He did more or less concert work in all of these cities. The two years he spent in America, 1906-07 and 1907-08, on leave of absence, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were really the first in which he conducted no opera in the winter months.

Dr. Muck's operatic experience and routine is extraordinary. When he was leaving Berlin in the fall of 1912 to resume his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Boerson Courier in an article lamenting his departure printed statistics to show the enormous achievements he had accomplished in the twenty years he was conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera.

It seems that in that time he conducted 1,701 performances of 103 operas and 21 performances of seven plays with music. Of these 35 were novelties which he placed on the stage himself and 23 were important revivals. Moreover, he had given 28 performances without rehearsal and more astonishing than this he conducted 13 performances of opera reading the scores at first sight.

The great gain that orchestral music made in Dr. Muck's coming to Boston was a very serious loss to the stage, but he will still do more or less operatic work in the summer. During next July and August he will conduct the festival performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth which has been his exclusive work for several years past. The end of August he goes to Salzburg to take part in the festival which celebrates the opening of the Mozarteum in that city. He will conduct two concerts and a performance of "Don Giovanni."

From
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

SPLENDID CONCERT BY ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony, with Dr. Karl Muck Directing, and Miss Ruth Lewis-Ashley, Soloist, Score Complete Triumph at Elmwood Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual Buffalo concert last night in Elmwood music hall, before a brilliant audience. Nearly every seat in the big auditorium was occupied, and enthusiasm was abundant during the evening. Dr. Karl Muck, the director, was given a hearty welcome, which he thoroughly deserved. It was his first appearance with the orchestra in Buffalo in five years. The soloist of the evening, Miss Ruth Lewis-Ashley, a Buffalo singer who has attained an international reputation, contributed one of the most enjoyable parts of the programme.

The programme opened with the rendition of Beethoven's seventh symphony, a magnificent work, played by the orchestra in superb style and almost flawlessy. The interpretation throughout showed the effects of careful training and of great skill on the part of each musician in the great orchestra and the masterly leadership of Dr. Muck. This number was a distinct triumph, and was received by the audience as such.

Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1, was a rare treat and was charmingly interpreted, the entrancing strains of the harmony evoking heartly applause. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," which was the last orchestral number of the evening, is a most unusual composition and was thoroughly enjoyed.

Miss Ashley sang two selections, the first being the aria, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Delilah," and the second, Schubert's "Der Erlkoenig." Both were sung with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Ashley has a rich contralto voice of wide range, fullness, warmth and beauty, and although the orchestra at times over-shadowed her lower notes, this was no fault of the singer. Her stage presence is commanding and added another factor to the triumph which she scored.

The fifth in the series of these con-

From Enquirer
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TONIGHT

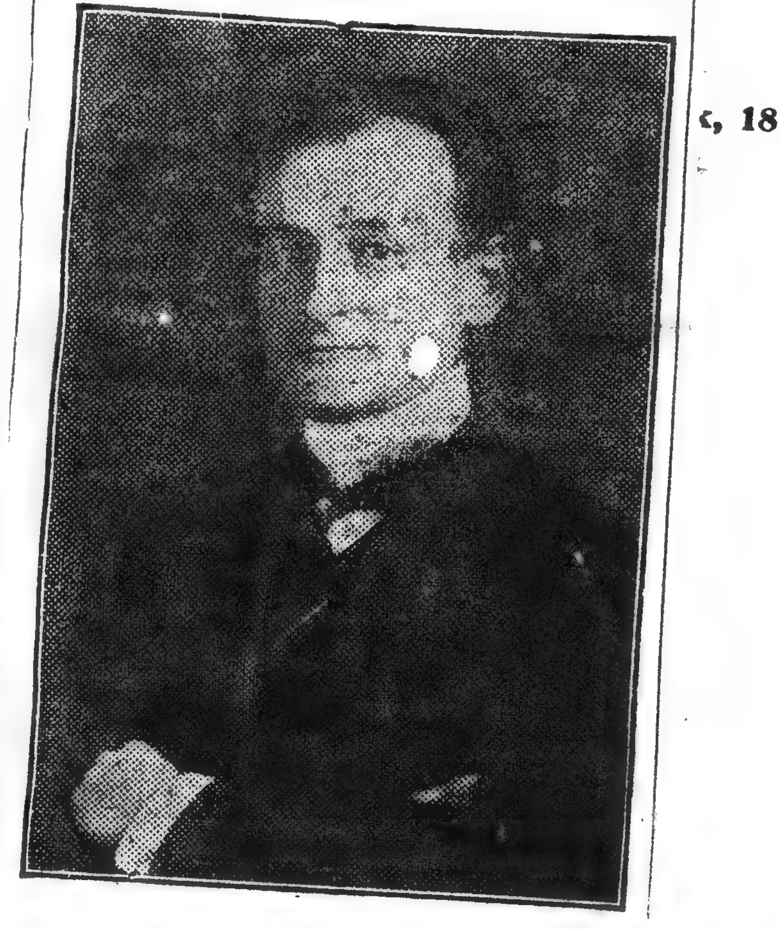
The climax of Buffalo's musical season is the annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, with practically its entire membership of between ninety and 100 men, with its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with Ruth Lewis-Ashley as soloist, will give a concert tonight in the Elmwood Music hall, the fourth in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

A rarely beautiful programme is announced for tonight, opening with Beethoven's seventh symphony. Miss Ashley will sing the Delilah aria, "Mon couer s'ouvere a ta voix," and Schubert's "Erlking, with orchestral accompaniment. Bizet's suite "L'Arlesienne," and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," will complete the programme, which will begin at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in arrival at the hall will be advisable, for it will take time to seat the large audience, and none will be admitted while the orchestra is playing, late comers missing the opening movement of the sympony.

From Journal
Address Syracuse N.Y.
Date JAN 24 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The great artistic event of the coming week will be the Boston Symphony concert in the Wieting Monday evening.



DR. KARL MUCK, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Wieting.

The orchestra visits Syracuse to give its first concert of the annual Western trip. Other concerts are be given in Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleland, Columbus and Detroit. The wo ing season of Boston's great orches is 30 weeks, 24 of which are spent its home city, five in giving concerts New York, Philadelphia, Washingt Baltimore and Brooklyn and one in Middle West.

The orchestra comes to Syrac with practically its entire membersh With it will come, of course, Dr. K Muck, its famous conductor, who make his first appearance in this c at that time. On its last two visi here its conductor was Max Fiedle who for four years had charge of the orchestra during the time that Dr. Muck was kept in Germany by his Berlin engagement. The orchestra naturally brings all of its famous men with it. Witek and Noack at the first desk of the violins; Warnke and Urak at its first desk of 'cellos; Ferir and Gietzen at the first desk of the violas; Habenicht and Fiumara at the first desk of the second violins; and all its famous players of wind instruemnts.

The program which has been arranged while representative of the best might almost be called popular. The symphony will be that in B flat No. 5 by the Russian, Alexander Glazounoff. Glazounoff if not a composer of great genius like Tschaikowsky writes in a brilliant melodious vein and his music is filled with the color of the nation he represents. This will make the first part of the program.

Three pieces will make the second part. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, Bizet's First L'Aresienne Suite and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Rimsky-Korsakoff was the master and teacher of Glazounoff. As a technician he was the most talented member of that group of brilliant composers that Russia provided in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The Boston Symphony has already played in Syracuse his fascinating Oriental Suite, "Scheherazade." As in that Rimsky-Korsakoff assimilated color of the Orient so in this Spanish Caprice does he assimilate the color of the music of Spain. The piece is in five parts but played without pause. The first is an Alborada, the second a set of Variations, the third an Alborada, the fourth Scene and Gypsy Song and the fifth a wild Fandango of the Asturias.

From Times
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

GREAT CROWD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley Scored Pronounced Success as SoloistXWelcome for Dr. Karl Muck.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra's inestimable worth is fully appreciated by the music-loving public of Buffalo was attested by the very large audience that it attracted to Elmwood Music Hall last evening. Dr. Karl Muck, its eminent conductor, who was unable to be present at the Buffalo appearance last season, was accorded a warm welcome. The marvelous composure with which Dr. Muck directs, and the excellent results he obtains with so slight effort prove the thoroughnes of the training which his men receive.

The various sections of the orchestra are perfectly balanced and of a mellow, rich timbre, due to the fine instruments with which the orchestra is equipped. There are among its personnel many soloists of distinction, this fact accounting for its remarkable unity and its artistic achcievements.

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, Bizet's Suite, No. 1, from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," and Smetana's "Overture to The Sold Bride." Amazingly delicate pianissimos were obtained in the third movement of the Beethoven number and in the Minutte of the Bizet number. In the latter number the beautiful legato melody received a poetic rendering. The buoyant, virile rythms of the finals number formed a stirring close to the enjoyable program.

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, the assisting soloist, is one of Buffalo's own and upon her entrance she received an ovation. A pleasing and graceful stage presence, added to a voice of loevely sympathetic quality, gave to her work an artistic enjoyment. Though her voice is small in volume it was never formed beyond its limitations. She sang "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saens', "Samson and Delilah," and Schubert's "Der Elrkonig."

The nextc oncert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, will be given by the Minneapolis Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Oberhoffer, with Teresa Carreno, the eminant pianist, as soloist, on Tuesday evening, February 24th.

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 8 1914

BOSTON PROG UP TO PR

We had fondly cherished hopes, after the first two concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, that Dr. Muck was getting more into touch with the tastes of his Baltimore audience, but the program of last night rudely dispelled these illusions. The numbers played were the Symphony in E Minor of Rachmaninoff and the celebrated Beethoven Concerto in E flat, two works of great dimensions, altogether unrelieved by any incidental numbers. It would have been at least more fitting had the order of the two works been reversed, works of the older school, from the point of view of color at any rate, naturally suffering by comparison with the more elaborate developments of the orchestra of today.

Of the Symphony it may be said that the value of its material does not justify its length. The themes of the first movement in particular are of the most meager description, and one is tempted almost to admire the audacity of a composer who could expect to keep up the interest of his audience in such vague wanderings, for such a length of time. The second movement, however, was a decided relief with its vivacious rhythm and admirable color. The opening of the third movement showed glimpses of real beauty and feeling, but this movement as a whole was never entirely satisfying, and deteriorated in interest towards the close.

The best movement undoubtedly was the last. Here the interest was sustained throughout, but taken as a whole, this Symphony is but a poor representative of the Russian school when compared with the best works of Borodin, Tschaikowsky and even Glazounoff.

can [illegible] rence on her [illegible] thoven [illegible] only the most finished technique but admirable taste, understanding, and above all, self-effacement thoroughly in keeping with the classical style of the composition.

It is unfortunate that, as in the case of her recital lately at the Peabody, she used a piano, which, with all its delicacy, utterly lacked the resonance necessary for a concert hall.

The fitness of the title, "Emperor," as applied to this concerto, has been very much disputed in some quarters. The first movement, however, fully justifies the name, with its noble proportions, dignity and largeness of conception. The second movement, though opening with one of the very most beautiful themes to be found in the realm of music, falls flat in its development in a way very unusual with such a master as Beethoven, while the last movement, though full of beautiful passages, and in spite of its vigorous opening theme, is never characterized by the majesty and distinction of the first.

H. D. P.

From Post Standard
Address Syracuse N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

BRILLIANT MUSIC HEARD BY 2,000

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Programme of Four Numbers.

WIETING THEATER CROWDED

Dr. Muck, on First Syracuse Appearance, Brings Players to Stirring Finales in Heroic Numbers.

Syracuse paid a remarkable tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, when 2,000 persons assembled at the Wieting Opera House to hear this famous organization in a programme of four numbers by celebrated composers of the Russian, French and German schools.

It took less than two hours to render the programme, and after the concluding number the great audience remained seated for several minutes in hopes that Dr. Muck would cast aside the rule concerning encores, just for once, at least for the sake of Syracuse's enthusiasm. The rule, however, was not broken.

It requires an entertainment of extraordinary attainments to bring out an audience of the size that greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, and such a generous response on the part of the music loving people of this community was believed to be entitled to a brilliant soloist along with America's greatest orchestra.

No matter how magnificently an orchestra may play, it is always refreshing to have a little break in the programme through the presentation of a talented soloist, and such is the proceeding with this orchestra at many of its concerts in the bigger cities. Syracuse bought all the seats in the house for the sake of the orchestra, and this in itself is a great compliment to the organization.

Dr. Muck Makes Debut.

Dr. Muck made his debut in Syracuse last night as a conductor. He was graciously received when he first appeared, and after each number he was recalled a number of times. As modest as he is skilled, Dr. Muck caused his players to share the honors of the evening with him. Throughout the concert Dr. Muck brought his players up to brilliant finales, and for the most part the numbers were of a heroic character.

One of the loveliest moments of the evening came in the andante of the Glazounoff symphony, when the beauty of tone was soul stirring. The Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice on Spanish themes had many attractive moments and the Bizet suite was especially captivating in its minuetto and adagietto.

The Liszt symphonic poem brought the delightful concert to a close, and while all the numbers were big and superbly rendered, the audience regretted having to leave.

All that Toscanini and other celebrated orchestral conductors have said about the Boston Symphony is the truth and the whole truth.

Orchestra Reflects Credit.

It is gratifying that this country can support in such a creditable manner an institution of this character. It reflects credit upon the men who have made it possible and Syracuse, after last night's tribute, should be included each year in its tour to the important music centers.

With hundreds of limousines lined up in front of the theater and the guests of the concert departing in a state of animation, the scene was one of the most interesting of the winter at any of the amusement places. It was a fashionable gathering as well as music loving and many handsome gowns were in evidence. The

From Commercial
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

DR. KARL MUCK

Famous Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Had Vast Operatic Experience.

The career of Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its annual Buffalo concert tonight, has been devoted chiefly to operatic work. From the time he began his work as a chorus master in Zurich 35 years ago until he ended his engagement with the Berlin Opera in the spring of 1912 he had always held positions in opera houses. His principal engagments were in Graz, Prague and Berlin. He was in the latter city for twenty years. He did more or less concert work in all of these cities. The two years he spent in America, 1906-07 and 1907-08, on leave of absence, when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were really the first in which he conducted no opera in the winter months.

Dr. Muck's operatic experience and routine is extraordinary. When he was leaving Berlin in the fall of 1912 to resume his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Boerson Courier in an article lamenting his departure printed statistics to show the enormous achievements he had accomplished in the twenty years he was conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera.

It seems that in that time he conducted 1,701 performances of 103 operas and 21 performances of seven plays with music. Of these 35 were novelties which he placed on the stage himself and 23 were important revivals. Moreover, he had given 28 performances without rehearsal and more astonishing than this he conducted 13 performances of opera reading the scores at first sight.

The great gain that orchestral music made in Dr. Muck's coming to Boston was a very serious loss to the stage, but he will still do more or less operatic work in the summer. During next July and August he will conduct the festival performance of "Parsifal" in Bayreuth which has been his exclusive work for several years past. The end of August he goes to Salzburg to take part in the festival which celebrates the opening of the Mozarteum in that city. He will conduct two concerts and a performance of "Don Giovanni."

From [illegible]
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

SPLENDID CONCERT BY ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony, with Dr. Karl Muck Directing, and Miss Ruth Lewis-Ashley, Soloist, Score Complete Triumph at Elmwood Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual Buffalo concert last night in Elmwood music hall, before a brilliant audience. Nearly every seat in the big auditorium was occupied, and enthusiasm was abundant during the evening. Dr. Karl Muck, the director, was given a hearty welcome, which he thoroughly deserved. It was his first appearance with the orchestra in Buffalo in five years. The soloist of the evening, Miss Ruth Lewis-Ashley, a Buffalo singer who has attained an international reputation, contributed one of the most enjoyable parts of the programme.

The programme opened with the rendition of Beethoven's seventh symphony, a magnificent work, played by the orchestra in superb style and almost flawlessly. The interpretation throughout showed the effects of careful training and of great skill on the part of each musician in the great orchestra and the masterly leadership of Dr. Muck. This number was a distinct triumph, and was received by the audience as such.

Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1, was a rare treat and was charmingly interpreted, the entrancing strains of the harmony evoking heartly applause. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," which was the last orchestral number of the evening, is a most unusual composition and was thoroughly enjoyed.

Miss Ashley sang two selections, the first being the aria, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Delilah," and the second, Schubert's "Der Erlkoenig." Both were sung with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Ashley has a rich contralto voice of wide range, fullness, warmth and beauty, and although the orchestra at times over-shadowed her lower notes, this was no fault of the singer. Her stage presence is commanding, and added another factor to the triumph which she scored.

The fifth in the series of these con

From Enquirer
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TONIGHT

The climax of Buffalo's musical season is the annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, with practically its entire membership of between ninety and 100 men, with its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and with Ruth Lewis-Ashley as soloist, will give a concert tonight in the Elmwood Music hall, the fourth in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

A rarely beautiful programme is announced for tonight, opening with Beethoven's seventh symphony. Miss Ashley will sing the Delilah aria, "Mon couer s'ouvere a ta voix," and Schubert's "Erlking, with orchestral accompaniment. Bizet's suite "L'Arlesienne," and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," will complete the programme, which will begin at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in arrival at the hall will be advisable, for it will take time to seat the large audience, and none will be admitted while the orchestra is playing, late comers missing the opening movement of the sympony.

From Journal
Address Syracuse N.Y.
Date JAN 24 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The great artistic event of the coming week will be the Boston Symphony

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Wieting.

concert in the Wieting Monday evening. The orchestra visits Syracuse to give its first concert of the annual Western trip. Other concerts are to be given in Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Columbus and Detroit. The working season of Boston's great orchestra is 30 weeks, 24 of which are spent in its home city, five in giving concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn and one in the Middle West.

The orchestra comes to Syracuse with practically its entire membership. With it will come, of course, Dr. Karl Muck, its famous conductor, who will make his first appearance in this city at that time. On its last two visits here its conductor was Max Fiedler, who for four years had charge of the orchestra during the time that Dr. Muck was kept in Germany by his Berlin engagement. The orchestra naturally brings all of its famous men with it. Witek and Noack at the first desk of the violins; Warnke and Urak at its first desk of 'cellos; Ferir and Gietzen at the first desk of the violas; Habenicht and Fiumara at the first desk of the second violins; and all its famous players of wind instruemnts.

The program which has been arranged while representative of the best might almost be called popular. The symphony will be that in B flat No. 5 by the Russian, Alexander Glazounoff. Glazounoff if not a composer of great genius like Tschaikowsky writes in a brilliant melodious vein and his music is filled with the color of the nation he represents. This will make the first part of the program.

Three pieces will make the second part. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, Bizet's First L'Aresienne Suite and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Rimsky-Korsakoff was the master and teacher of Glazounoff. As a technician he was the most talented member of that group of brilliant composers that Russia provided in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The Boston Symphony has already played in Syracuse his fascinating Oriental Suite, "Scheherazade." As in that Rimsky-Korsakoff assimilated color of the Orient so in this Spanish Caprice does he assimilate the color of the music of Spain. The piece is in five parts but played without pause. The first is an Alborada, the second a set of Variations, the third an Alborada, the fourth Scene and Gypsy Song and the fifth a wild Fandango of the Asturias.

From Times
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

GREAT CROWD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley Scored Pronounced Success as SoloistXWelcome for Dr. Karl Muck.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra's inestimable worth is fully appreciated by the music-loving public of Buffalo was attested by the very large audience that it attracted to Elmwood Music Hall last evening. Dr. Karl Muck, its eminent conductor, who was unable to be present at the Buffalo appearance last season, was accorded a warm welcome. The marvelous composure with which Dr. Muck directs, and the excellent results he obtains with so slight effort prove the thoroughnes of the training which his men receive.

The various sections of the orchestra are perfectly balanced and of a mellow, rich timbre, due to the fine instruments with which the orchestra is equipped. There are among its personnel many soloists of distinction, this fact accounting for its remarkable unity and its artistic achcievements.

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, Bizet's Suite, No. 1, from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," and Smetana's "Overture to The Sold Bride." Amazingly delicate pianissimos were obtained in the third movement of the Beethoven number and in the Minutte of the Bizet number. In the latter number the beautiful legato melody received a poetic rendering. The buoyant, virile rythms of the finals number formed a stirring close to the enjoyable program.

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, the assisting soloist, is one of Buffalo's own and upon her entrance she received an ovation. A pleasing and graceful stage presence, added to a voice of loevely sympathetic quality, gave to her work an artistic enjoyment. Though her voice is small in volume it was never formed beyond its limitations. She sang "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saens', "Samson and Delilah," and Schubert's "Der Elrkonig."

The nextc oncert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, will be given by the Minneapolis Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Oberhoffer, with Teresa Carreno, the eminant pianist, as soloist, on Tuesday evening, February 24th.

ING NEWS
ore, Md.
JAN 8-1914

STON PROC UP TO PR

We had fondly cherished hopes, after the first two concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, that Dr. Muck was getting more into touch with the tastes of his Baltimore audience, but the program of last night rudely dispelled these illusions. The numbers played were the Symphony in E Minor of Rachmaninoff and the celebrated Beethoven Concerto in E flat, two works of great dimensions, altogether unrelieved by any incidental numbers. It would have been at least more fitting had the order of the two works been reversed, works of the older school, from the point of view of color at any rate, naturally suffering by comparison with the more elaborate developments of the orchestra of today.

Of tho Symphony it may be said that the value of its material does not justify its length. The themes of the first movement in particular are of the most meager description, and one is tempted almost to admire the audacity of a composer who could expect to keep up the interest of his audience in such vague wanderings, for such a length of time. The second movement, however, was a decided relief with its vivacious rhythm and admirable color. The opening of the third movement showed glimpses of real beauty and feeling, but this movement as a whole was never entirely satisfying, and deteriorated in interest towards the close.

The best movement undoubtedly was the last. Here the interest was sustained throughout, but taken as a whole, this Symphony is but a poor representative of the Russian school when compared with the best works of Borodin, Tschaikowsky and even Glazounoff.

---

can con [illegible]
reng on her [illegible]
tho [illegible]
only the [illegible] technique, but admirable taste, understanding, and above all, self-effacement thoroughly in keeping with the classical style of the composition.

It is unfortunate that, as in the case of her recital lately at the Peabody, she used a piano, which, with all its delicacy, utterly lacked the resonance necessary for a concert hall.

The fitness of the title, "Emperor," as applied to this concerto, has been very much disputed in some quarters. The first movement, however, fully justifies the name, with its noble proportions, dignity and largeness of conception. The second movement, though opening with one of the very most beautiful themes to be found in the realm of music, falls flat in its development in a way very unusual with such a master as Beethoven, while the last movement, though full of beautiful passages, and in spite of its vigorous opening theme, is never characterized by the majesty and distinction of the first.

H. D. P.

From Post-Standard
Address Syracuse N.Y.
Date JAN 27 1914

BRILLIANT MUSIC HEARD BY 2,000

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Programme of Four Numbers.

WIETING THEATER CROWDED

Dr. Muck, on First Syracuse Appearance, Brings Players to Stirring Finales in Heroic Numbers.

Syracuse paid a remarkable tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, when 2,000 persons assembled at the Wieting Opera House to hear this famous organization in a programme of four numbers by celebrated composers of the Russian, French and German schools.

It took less than two hours to render the programme, and after the concluding number the great audience remained seated for several minutes in hopes that Dr. Muck would cast aside the rule concerning encores, just for once, at least for the sake of Syracuse's enthusiasm. The rule, however, was not broken.

It requires an entertainment of extraordinary attainments to bring out an audience of the size that greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, and such a generous response on the part of the music loving people of this community was believed to be entitled to a brilliant soloist along with America's greatest orchestra.

No matter how magnificently an orchestra may play, it is always refreshing to have a little break in the programme through the presentation of a talented soloist, and such is the proceeding with this orchestra at many of its concerts in the bigger cities. Syracuse bought all the seats in the house for the sake of the orchestra, and this in itself is a great compliment to the organization.

Dr. Muck Makes Debut.

Dr. Muck made his debut in Syracuse last night as a conductor. He was graciously received when he first appeared, and after each number he was recalled a number of times. As modest as he is skilled, Dr. Muck caused his players to share the honors of the evening with him. Throughout the concert Dr. Muck brought his players up to brilliant finales, and for the most part the numbers were of a heroic character.

One of the loveliest moments of the evening came in the andante of the Glazounoff symphony, when the beauty of tone was soul stirring. The Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice on Spanish themes had many attractive moments and the Bizet suite was especially captivating in its minuetto and adagietto.

The Liszt symphonic poem brought the delightful concert to a close, and while all the numbers were big and superbly rendered, the audience regretted having to leave.

All that Toscanini and other celebrated orchestral conductors have said about the Boston Symphony is the truth and the whole truth.

Orchestra Reflects Credit.

It is gratifying that this country can support in such a creditable manner an institution of this character. It reflects credit upon the men who have made it possible and Syracuse, after last night's tribute, should be included each year in its tour to the important music centers.

With hundreds of limousines lined up in front of the theater and the guests of the concert departing in a state of animation, the scene was one of the most interesting of the winter at any of the amusement places. It was a fashionable gathering as well as music loving people, and handsome gowns were in evidence. The

Volksblatt und Freiheits-Freund –

Erleſener muſikaliſcher Genuß.

Begeiſterter Beifall dem Boſtoner Künſtler-Orcheſter gezollt.

Das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter und ſein ausgezeichneter Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck haben die hohen Erwartungen, welche man von ihnen hegte, in dem geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall gegebenen Konzert noch übertroffen. Das Orcheſter erfreute ſich während ſeines langjährigen Beſtehens ſtets hervorragenden Anſehens in der Muſikwelt, ſeit wir es vor mehreren Jahren hier zum letzten Mal gehört haben,, iſt aber ein weiterer bedeutender Schritt zur höchſten Vollkommenheit unverkennbar. Jeder einzige von den Muſikern iſt trefflich geſchult. Die Deutſchen und Amerikaner ſcheinen unter den Streichern und Blechinſtrumenten zu überwiegen, die Franzoſen unter den Holzbläſern. Unerachtet dieſer Internatinalität iſt Alles vollendetſtes Ebenmaß, höchſte Reinheit, wundervolle Klangfülle.

Ein Geiſt beſeelt Alle.

Es iſt, als ob ein Geiſt Alle beſeelte, und thatſächlich iſt es ja auch ein Geiſt, der Geiſt des ſchlanken Mannes auf dem Podium, welcher mit wahrhaft klaſſiſcher Ruhe daſteht und mit Gelaſſenheit, ohne unnöthige Geſten, den Stab ſchwingt, dem die Schaar der Virtuoſen völlig ſich unterordnet. Dr. Karl Muck dirigiren zu ſehen, iſt an ſich ſchon erfreulich. Man erhält gleich die Ueberzeugung, daß uns etwas Gediegenes beſcheert wird. Er iſt eine überaus intereſſante Erſcheinung. Der Ausdruck ſeines Auges, ſein ganzes Weſen verräth eine Künſtlernatur, die alle erforderlichen Fähigkeiten in ſich vereinigt. Man merkt es ihm an, mit welchem Ernſt er bei der Sache iſt, und man fühlt, wie er in hohem Grade inſpirirend auf die Muſiker wirkt, wie er ihnen den Geiſt des Komponiſten, der gerade geſpielt wird, einzuflößen verſteht.

Die Symphonie.

Als Hauptnummer des intereſſanten Programms hatte Dr. Muck die fünfte Symphonie von Glazounoff gewählt, ein Werk, das durch verſchiedene Eigenſchaften und Vorzüg des Komponiſten, Originalität, E findungsreichthum und peinlich ſorg fältige Ausarbeitung, anſpricht. Al ihr innewohnenden Schönheiten wu den vom Dirigenten prächtig herau gearbeitet. Auffaſſung und Ausfü rung entſprachen dem Charakter de Tonſchöpfung vollkommen, die Qua lität des Geſammttones war in alle Schattirungen von eindringliche Wirkung. Die gleichmäßige, ſchme zende Tonmaſſe ſchlug angenehm an' Ohr. Das Ganze war vollendet, ei erleſener muſikaliſcher Genuß. Die einzelnen Sätze wurden mit großer Präziſion geſpielt, namentlich das Scherzo und der Schlußſatz mit ſeiner Steigerung.

Die anderen Darbietungen.

Die übrigen Werke erfuhren ebenfalls eine höchſt würdige Interpretation, ſo wurden mit geſunder Auffaſſung, viel Temperament und ſtraffer Rhythmik dirigirt. Gefiel die „Spaniſche Kaprize", Rimsky = ſakoff's launenhaftes Tonſtück, ob Sinnes des Komponiſten für harmoniſche Werthe und Klan men, ſo zogen nicht minder die heiten der reizvollen Bizet Suite „L'Arleſienne" den Zuhör hren Bann. Dieſe Kompoſi wurde mit trefflicher Zartheit ſpielt, inſonderheit das entzü Adagietto. In der „Span Kaprize" boten einzelne Solove ungen dem Konzertmeiſter Anton ek, ſowie dem Flötiſten, Klari ſten und anderen Gruppenführern Gelegenheit, ihr vornehmes Spiel darzuthun. Den Schluß des Konzertes bildete Liszt's Symphoniſches Gedicht „Les Preludes", das gleichfalls meiſterhafte Wiedergabe fand. Das Haus war faſt ganz ausverkauft und das Publikum nahm ſämmtliche Darbietungen mit begeiſtertem Beifall auf.

TRANSCRIPT, F

JANUARY 30, 1914

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Petition to Symphony Hall

FIVE or six times in the course of a season, the concert on Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall consists wholly of songs, many of which are sure to be unfamiliar to most of the audience. Mr. de Gogorza and Mme Alda, for example, have put together such a programme for next Sunday. Once or twice in the course of a year, the singers or their managers or the management of the concerts in general, provide the hearers with a programme that contains texts and translations of the songs. Thereby the audience discovers the course and the mood of the pieces, better appreciates the singer's imparting skill with them and generally receives more and keener pleasure from the concert. Oftener, the hearer receives only a leaf bearing the titles of the songs and gropes as best he may about what little of the texts the singer makes intelligible or that runs in a language that he can understand. Many times he hears, perforce, only the voice of the singer and catches only vaguely the general mood of the song. In a word, he hears, but he does not understand or feel. The management of Symphony Hall is hardly matched in this country for intelligence, liberality and sense of obligation to the public. On these scores it has even its just reputation in Europe. Is it not time, then, that when it arranges a concert of twenty-odd songs, it should regularly provide the audience with a "book of words?" So doing it would keep to its standards and please a loyal public.

FEBRUARY 2.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS PLEASE AUDIENCE

Mme. Frances Alda, the opera singer, and Emilo de Gogorza, the barytone, were the soloists at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon. Between them they sang thirty songs, to the delight of a large audience—thirty songs in five different languages. Among them were half a dozen songs in the barytone's native Spanish.

Mme. Alda has made marked progress since she last appeared here in opera. Some of this is due to the coaching of Frank LaForge, who accompanied her yesterday so sympathetically and who was formerly accompanist for Mme. Sembrich. This was probably the Metropolitan prima donna's only visit to Boston this season, since Victor Herbert's "Madeleine," the opera recently produced in New York, will not be given at the Boston Opera House. It fared poorly in old Manhattan.

Mr. de Gogorza sang with much of his old spirit, although his voice seemed to lack some of the old resonance

---

From EVG. SUN

Address: New York

Date [illegible]

JUST arrived by the George Washington this week is Elizabeth van Endert, a Berlin lyric soprano, said to be one of the most beautiful women on the stage. She sang Octavian in "Rose Cavalier" forty times at the Kaiser's Royal Opera, and she joined the general exodus of artists last September to the neighboring German Opera House of Charlottenburg. Mme. Van Endert comes to America for the first time for a brief tour under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the tours of Farrar, Kreisler and Paderewski.

Van Endert's career began in concert in 1907, followed by two seasons in opera at Dresden. Since then at Berlin she has held the roles formerly taken by Farrar and Destinn.

W. B. CHASE.

1884

From EVENING GLOBE

Address: New York City.

Date. JAN 29 1914

MUSICAL BRIEFS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not usually introduce unknown soloists to New York at its concerts here, but on Thursday evening, Feb. 19, it promises to make known unto us Mme Elisabeth van Endert, a lyric soprano from the Berlin Royal Opera. Mme van Endert is in America for a few weeks, and will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the New York concert of that organization on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 21, there will be no soloist.

Esta 884

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 2,

Symphony Orchestra's New Singer

(Photograph by Gerlach of Berlin)

Mme. Boehm van Endert

ONE more German singer of distinction at home is about to try her fortunes in America and this time under the auspices of the Sympny Orchestra—Mme. Boehm van Ent. For two or three years past, the nagement of the orchestra has invited ne eminent virtuoso or singer to pay a f visit to America and to appear only its concerts and in a few supplementary itals. Two years ago it so summoned Hofmann, the pianist. A year ago it ed Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. This it has chosen Mme. van Endert. will appear first at the Symphony concerts of next week, go with the orchestra on its "February trip" to New York and to other cities southward, sing in Cambridge and finally venture a recital of her own in Boston and in New York. Mme. van Endert is a young and comely woman, a lyric soprano who began to win her reputation at the Court Opera in Dresden—one of the best operatic schools in Europe—and passed thence to the Royal Opera in Berlin and to the new German Opera in Charlottenburg. At all three she made her way in lyric parts by the quality of her voice, her artistry in song, and her skill in impersonation and interpretation. Of late she has ventured song recitals with hardly less praise and it is as a concert singer that she comes now to Boston and to appear with Dr. Muck again.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT TUESDAY WILL BE TREAT

Mme. Teresa Carreno to be Soloist, Playing Beethoven.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and her appearance will be one of the treats of the musical season. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

Last Sunday afternoon, with Julia Culp, she appeared in a concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, and her success was considered remarkable, even in Boston, where she is a great favorite. The criticisms of her playing the next day were eulogistic in the extreme.

The sale of seats for the concert here opens Saturday morning.

Est 884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York

Date FEB 1 - 1914

The fourth pair of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. There will be no soloist at the matinee concert. The soloist for the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the German opera in Charlottenburg, who will make her first appearance in this city. Madame Van Endert is in America for a few weeks, during which she will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Es 884

From PRESS

Address: New York

Date FEB 1 - 1914

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. There will be no soloist at the matinee concert. The soloist for Thursday's evening concert will be Mme. Elisabeth von Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Es 884

olksblatt und Freiheits-Freund —

Erleſener muſikaliſcher Genuß.

Begeiſterter Beifall dem Boſtoner Künſtler-Orcheſter gezollt.

Das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter und ſein ausgezeichneter Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck haben die hohen Erwartungen, welche man von ihnen hegte, in dem geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall gegebenen Konzert noch übertroffen. Das Orcheſter erfreute ſich während ſeines langjährigen Beſtehens ſtets hervorragenden Anſehens in der Muſikwelt, ſeit wir es vor mehreren Jahren hier zum letzten Mal gehört haben, iſt aber ein weiterer bedeutender Schritt zur höchſten Vollkommenheit unverkennbar. Jeder einzige von den Muſikern iſt trefflich geſchult. Die Deutſchen und Amerikaner ſcheinen unter den Streichern und Blechinſtrumenten zu überwiegen, die Franzoſen unter den Holzbläſern. Unerachtet dieſer Internatinalität iſt Alles vollendetſtes Ebenmaß, höchſte Reinheit, wundervolle Klangfülle.

Ein Geiſt beſeelt Alle.

Es iſt, als ob ein Geiſt Alle beſeelte, und thatſächlich iſt es ja auch ein Geiſt, der Geiſt des ſchlanken [illegible] auf dem Podium, welcher mit wahrhaft klaſſiſcher Ruhe daſteht und mit Gelaſſenheit, ohne unnöthige Geſten, den Stab ſchwingt, dem die Schaar der Virtuoſen völlig ſich unterordnet. Dr. Karl Muck dirigiren zu ſehen, iſt an ſich ſchon erfreulich. Man erhält gleich die Ueberzeugung, daß uns etwas Gediegenes beſcheert wird. Er iſt eine überaus intereſſante Erſcheinung. Der Ausdruck ſeines Auges, ſein ganzes Weſen verräth eine Künſtlernatur, die alle erforderlichen Fähigkeiten in ſich vereinigt. Man merkt es ihm an, mit welchem Ernſt er bei der Sache iſt, und man fühlt, wie er in hohem Grade inſpirirend auf die Muſiker wirkt, wie er ihnen den Geiſt des Komponiſten, der gerade geſpielt wird, einzuflößen verſteht.

Die Symphonie.

Als Hauptnummer des intereſſanten Programms hatte Dr. Muck die fünfte Symphonie von Glazounoff gewählt, ein Werk, das durch verſchiedene Eigenſchaften und Vorzüge des Komponiſten, Originalität, Erfindungsreichthum und peinlich ſorgfältige Ausarbeitung, anſpricht. Alle ihr innewohnenden Schönheiten wurden vom Dirigenten prächtig herausgearbeitet. Auffaſſung und Ausführung entſprachen dem Charakter der Tonſchöpfung vollkommen, die Qualität des Geſammttones war in allen Schattirungen von eindringlicher Wirkung. Die gleichmäßige, ſchmelzende Tonmaſſe ſchlug angenehm an's Ohr. Das Ganze war vollendet, ein erleſener muſikaliſcher Genuß. Die einzelnen Sätze wurden mit großer Präziſion geſpielt, namentlich das Scherzo und der Schlußſatz mit ſeiner Steigerung.

Die anderen Darbietungen.

Die übrigen Werke erfuhren ebenfalls eine höchſt würdige Interpretation, ſo wurden mit geſunder Auffaſſung, viel Temperament und ſtraffer Rhythmik dirigirt. Gefiel die „Spaniſche Kaprize", Rimsky-Korſakoff's launenhaftes Tonſtück, ob des Sinnes des Komponiſten für neue harmoniſche Werthe und Klangformen, ſo zogen nicht minder die Feinheiten der reizvollen Bizet'ſchen Suite „L'Arleſienne" den Zuhörer in ihren Bann. Dieſe Kompoſition wurde mit trefflicher Zartheit geſpielt, inſonderheit das entzückende Adagietto. In der „Spaniſchen Kaprize" boten einzelne Soloverzierungen dem Konzertmeiſter Anton Witek, ſowie dem Flötiſten, Klarinettiſten und anderen Gruppenführern Gelegenheit, ihr vornehmes Spiel darzuthun. Den Schluß des Konzertes bildete Liszt's Symphoniſches Gedicht „Les Preludes", das gleichfalls meiſterhafte Wiedergabe fand. Das Haus war faſt ganz ausverkauft und das Publikum nahm ſämmtliche Darbietungen mit begeiſtertem Beifall auf.

TRANSCRIPT, F

JANUARY 30, 1914

NEWS OF MUSIC

A Petition to Symphony Hall

FIVE or six times in the course of a season, the concert on Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall consists wholly of songs, many of which are sure to be unfamiliar to most of the audience. Mr. de Gogorza and Mme Alda, for example, have put together such a programme for next Sunday. Once or twice in the course of a year, the singers or their managers or the management of the concerts in general, provide the hearers with a programme that contains texts and translations of the songs. Thereby the audience discovers the course and the mood of the pieces, better appreciates the singer's imparting skill with them and generally receives more and keener pleasure from the concert. Oftener, the hearer receives only a leaf bearing the titles of the songs and gropes as best he may about what little of the texts the singer makes intelligible or that runs in a language that he can understand. Many times he hears, perforce, only the voice of the singer and catches only vaguely the general mood of the song. In a word, he hears, but he does not understand or feel. The management of Symphony Hall is hardly matched in this country for intelligence, liberality and sense of obligation to the public. On these scores it has even its just reputation in Europe. Is it not time, then, that when it arranges a concert of twenty-odd songs, it should regularly provide the audience with a "book of words?" So doing it would keep to its standards and please a loyal public.

FEBRUARY 2.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS PLEASE AUDIENCE

Mme. Frances Alda, the opera singer, and Emilo de Gogorza, the barytone, were the soloists at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon. Between them they sang thirty songs, to the delight of a large audience—thirty songs in five different languages. Among them were half a dozen songs in the barytone's native Spanish.

Mme. Alda has made marked progress since she last appeared here in opera. Some of this is due to the coaching of Frank LaForge, who accompanied her yesterday so sympathetically and who was formerly accompanist for Mme. Sembrich. This was probably the Metropolitan prima donna's only visit to Boston this season, since Victor Herbert's "Madeleine," the opera recently produced in New York, will not be given at the Boston Opera House. It fared poorly in old Manhattan.

Mr. de Gogorza sang with much of his old spirit, although his voice seemed to lack some of the old resonance

---

EVG. SUN

New York

[illegible] 0 191

ST arrived by the George Washington this week is Elizabeth van En‑t, a Berlin lyric soprano, said to b e of the most beautiful women on age. She sang Octavian in "Rose er" forty times at the Kaiser's pera, and she joined the general artists last September to the ne ring German Opera House of Charlo nburg. Mme. Van Endert comes t merica for the first time for a brief tour under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the tours of Farrar, Kreisler and Paderewski.

Van Endert's career began in concert in 1907, followed by two seasons in opera at Dresden. Since then at Berlin she has held the roles formerly taken by Farrar and Destinn.

W. B. CHASE.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City.

JAN 29 1914

MUSICAL BRIEFS.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra s not usually introduce unknown oists to New York at its concerts , but on Thursday evening, Feb. t promises to make known unto me Elisabeth van Endert, a lyric ano from the Berlin Royal Opera. van Endert is in America for a weeks, and will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the New York concert of that organization on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 21, there will be no soloist.

884

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 2,

Symphony Orchestra's New Singer

(Photograph by Gerlach of Berlin)

Mme. Boehm van Endert

ONE more German singer of distinction at home is about to try her fortunes in America and this time under the auspices of the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Boehm van Endert. For two or three years past, the management of the orchestra has invited some eminent virtuoso or singer to pay a brief visit to America and to appear only at its concerts and in a few supplementary recitals. Two years ago it so summoned Mr. Hofmann, the pianist. A year ago it called Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. This year it has chosen Mme. van Endert. She will appear first at the Symphony concerts of next week, go with the orchestra on its "February trip" to New York and to other cities southward, sing in Cambridge and finally venture a recital of her own in Boston and in New York. Mme. van Endert is a young and comely woman, a lyric soprano who began to win her reputation at the Court Opera in Dresden—one of the best operatic schools in Europe—and passed thence to the Royal Opera in Berlin and to the new German Opera in Charlottenburg. At all three she made her way in lyric parts by the quality of her voice, her artistry in song, and her skill in impersonation and interpretation. Of late she has ventured song recitals with hardly less praise and it is as a concert singer that she comes now to Boston and to appear with Dr. Muck again.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT TUESDAY WILL BE TREAT

Mme. Teresa Carreno to be Soloist, Playing Beethoven.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and her appearance will be one of the treats of the musical season. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

Last Sunday afternoon, with Julia Culp, she appeared in a concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, and her success was considered remarkable, even in Boston, where she is a great favorite. The criticisms of her playing the next day were eulogistic in the extreme.

The sale of seats for the concert here opens Saturday morning.

Est 384

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York

Date FEB 1 - 1914

The fourth pair of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. There will be no soloist at the matinee concert. The soloist for the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the German opera in Charlottenburg, who will make her first appearance in this city. Madame Van Endert is in America for a few weeks, during which she will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

884

From PRESS

Address: New York

Date FEB 1 - 1914

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. There will be no soloist at the matinee concert. The soloist for Thursday's evening concert will be Mme. Elisabeth von Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Es 884

From CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 29 1914

Modern Russian Music Under Muck's Baton

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Artistic Performance of Topheavy Program.

CONDUCTING REACHES FINE ART

The Ellis series of concerts had a brilliant close with the appearance at Carnegie Hall last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck director. The attraction was a powerful one—so powerful that the house had been sold out a week in advance and standing room was in large demand. This was to be expected, considering that the Boston orchestra enjoys deservedly the reputation of being a perfect musical machine, excelled by none on either side of the Atlantic, and governed, moreover, by a director who stands among the three or four masters of his craft whose fame is international. It is to the credit of the management of the orchestra that its full membership is brought en tour instead of falling back on the too common and too easily tolerated device of a traveling organization of inadequate strength.

The program presented was not compellingly attractive, the first part being given up entirely to the No. 5 Symphony of the Russian Glazounoff, which, for obvious reasons, is the least known of this composer's symphonic works, the fourth and sixth symphonies having an apparent monopoly of public favor. This work, to put the matter in a nutshell, while rich in the gorgeous instrumental effects which are the long suit of the modern Russian school, has not sufficient thematic interest to keep mind and heart enchained during the 45 minutes or thereabouts which it takes to perform it. There are many fascinating passages, such, for instance, as in the first movement, a cantilena for flute and clarinet with an accompaniment of harp arpeggios and strings pizzicato; and the fairly-like measures of the Scherzo and the barbaric, tempestuous Finale, bringing out all the powers of the orchestra, proved stirring enough; but in the main, the lack of symmetry and coherency gave the hearer a sense of strain rather than of enjoyment and left one wondering why, on the occasion of Dr. Muck's one visit to Pittsburgh this season, he should make this his piece de resistance.

As to the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" which opened the second part of the program, there could be no such complaint. On every new hearing of a Rimsky-Korsakoff work of this type, one is well-nigh moved to reaffirm Tschaikowsky's dictum to the effect that his gifted colleague stands in the very forefront of masters of orchestration. In the Caprice, the effects produced by the treatment of individual instruments, running in succession the whole gamut of the orchestra, by the use of groups for tonal contrast and by the ever-varying tone-colors employed, are indescribably beautiful. Now it is a song-like theme given to the horns against a rocking accompaniment for strings; now it is a solo violin playing a quaint cadenza against a pianissimo roll of the snare drum; now it is a clarinet passage, with an uncanny roll of cymbals as a background; or perhaps it is a combination of harp and triangle or of violins with the blare of trombones and tubas. In each new variation, each new solo cadenza, there is an element of surprise that is full of charm. And throughout the mood is there—the mood of Spanish gipsy life from the fantastic morning serenade with which the rhapsodic work begins to the whirling fandango at the finish.

As if to relax the tension after this tour de force, the next offering was the "Arlesienne" Suite of Bizet, that gently pleasing production which every patron of popular concerts knows and on which the symphony orchestras fall back for rest and recreation. After a wild fandango with Russian trimmings, the bliss of doing an Adagietto at a tempo which ran exactly one and two-thirds seconds to the beat must have been ineffable

Another popular standby in the shape of Liszt's "Les Preludes" was used to close the program, and the melodic beauties of this work and the incident exploitation of all the resources of the orchestra seemed to be much enjoyed.

Dr. Muck's methods are a revelatio in the fine art of conducting. He i not spectacular. He does not pose. H never lashes himself into a fine frenzy Uniformly quiet and self-contained, h exercises, nevertheless, perfect contro over his forces and secures a sensitiv response to his slightest motion. Unde his hand there is absolute certainty o attack and what may be described a absolute unity of thought and impulse It is as if the orchestra were one ma instead of a body of one hundred men so homogeneous is its work and so un failingly does it reflect the emotions o its leader. No matter what the pro gram may be, the mere hearing of suc an orchestra is well worth while.

ARTHUR G. BURGOYNE.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 1 1914

Die nächſten Konzerte der Boſtoner finden am Abend des 19., reſp. am Nachmittag des 21. Februar in Carnegie Hall unter Leitung von Dr. Muck ſtatt. Am Abend iſt die Sopranſängerin Frau Eliſabeth Böhm v. Endert die Soliſtin, welche die lyriſche Sopraniſtin der königlichen Oper in Berlin iſt. Die Künſtlerin weilt hier zu ſehr kurzem Aufenthalt, währenddeſſen ſie mehrere Mal im Rahmen der Boſtoner Konzerte ſingen wird. In der Samstag-Matinee giebt es keinen Soliſten.

From Herald
Address Syracuse [illegible]
Date [illegible]

GOOD HOUSE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wieting Filled Almost to Its Capacity.

CONCERT WAS SUPERB

Glazounoff Symphony Appropriate as Its Nucleus—Liszt Tone Poem a Stirring Climax — More Good Things in Prospect.

When America's two foremost concert orchestras were announced for dates within a few weeks of each other, the musical appreciation of Central New York was put on trial for its always precarious life, and the outlook was rather depressing. Therefore, its unanimous and enthusiastic acquittal last night on the first of the two counts is a rare joy to all concerned, including at least one chronicler.

That the Boston Symphony orchestra would give a superb concert went without saying. It does nothing else; the poster of bills advertising its coming serves notice on his fellow townsmen that superb things are to be done. From me, at least, the orchestra and its music will get no compliments. I would as soon be found complimenting Velsaquer on his Philips, or catching an edition with a sonnet to Aconcagua. All the compliments in order must go to the people who had sense enough to pack the Wieting almost to its capacity, and to Miss A. Kathleen King, who has persisted in bringing first class musical attractions to Syracuse when failure after failure seeemd inevitable. Last night she had a measure of reward, and I cannot think that anyone will deny that she had earned it.

As to a Soloist.

For the view that a great orchestra is cheapened by habitual concerts with a soloist, I hold no brief. If the soloist is what he should be, I love such concerts as well as anybody. But I shall find it hard to be patient with the man who may tell me that last night's concert would have been made more enjoyable by a soloist. If the Boston Symphony orchestra cannot find favor for its own sake, what musical organization can? And in the opinion of some musicians, that since the Boston Symphony orchestra comes but once in four or five years, a greater and better established symphony than Glazounoff's Fifth would have been a better nucleus for the programme, I cannot join. The Glazounoff symphony, poetic, mellifluous, readily understood, seems to me just the sort of symphony that should be played to do the greatest good to the greatest number in a city which great orchestras rarely visit. So appealing were the first three movements that until the fourth, with its bold dissonances and tempestuous climax, one almost felt cheated out of his modern Russian composer.

The more familiar Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish themes followed suit. No listener not tone deaf could have found it hard to keep his thoughts on music so sensuous. Almost all the Bizet 'L'Arlesienne' suit was downright "pretty;" the symphonic poem of Liszt came as a relief, a little fortissimo after much lovely piano. And wonderful it was to hear the great orchestra build up that mighty climax with consummate ease, a wealth of reserve power being evident.

Beauty of Tone.

Sheer beauty of tone (especially as to the strings), and perfect respons to the director's interpretation coul hardly go farther. One always read the work of a celebrated director re viewed as if he had been playing o an organ, or the waving of his bato had actually produced the sound Much of this is arrant nonsense, bu the absolute musical sympathy of D Muck and his players would mak some printed ecstacy allowable. Th severest criticism of the concert whic I have heard made by musicians i that the later numbers were playe in rapid succession, and the listene had almost no respite.

We may now breathe easier, con fident that the New York Philharmoni orchestra, coming with that great an deservedly popular violinist, Mischa Elman, will have such another reception.

C. McK.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date JAN 28 19

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston Organization Gives Excellent Concert Here.

KARL MUCK LEADS

Conductor of Elegance, With Vigor and Refinement.

MISS RUTH LEWIS ASHLEY

Buffalo Singer, Soloist of the Evening, Scores a Triumph.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last evening in Elmwood Music Hall its annual concert, under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. It was attended by the usual large audience, it was characterized by more than the usual amount of enthusiasm, and with justice, for never has the famous organization given in this city a performance reaching a higher pinnacle of nobility and beauty than that of last night. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, is a leader who is able to draw forth from his men the best that is in them. He is also a musician who can, at the same time, preserve the bold outlines and the delicacy of detail, so that his readings have both vigor and refinement. He is essentially a conductor of elegance, polishing each passage and phrase till it glows and sparkles with beauty and color.

It was indeed a pleasure to hear the Beethoven seventh symphony with which the programme began. The work is rarely heard, yet it is one which Beethoven called "one of my best." With the exception of the Allegretto, which is written more in the mood of mystery, the dance element prevails in this symphony, and in no other of the immortal nine is shown more strikingly this composer's exhaustless fertility and the genius which can make a few simple themes flower out into such luxuriant forms. Dr. Muck emphasized in his readings the gayety and buoyancy which characterizes the work and it would be difficult to imagine a lovelier interpretation of the fairy-like Scherzo than he gave.

While each section of the orchestra was beyond criticism in its tonal beauty, special attention was called to the fine quality of the woodwinds in the Vivace of the first movement, where the listener knew not which to admire the most, as oboes, clarinets, flutes and bassoons alternated in the melodic phrases. It was all a delight to the ear. Small wonder that the conductor was recalled time and again at the end of the symphony, and his sharing of honors with his players was an act both gracious and just.

Other orchestral numbers were Bizet's L'Arlesienne suite No. 1 and Smetana's overture to The Sold Bride. Standing out promiently in its loveliness was the Adagietto from the suite, where the solo voices of strings, woodwind or bass floated upon a sea of sound like swans mirrored upon a lake, so smooth, so serenely beautiful was the playing of this movement. The entire suite was ideal in its performance and it evoked some of the heartiest applause of the evening.

The prophet without honor in his own country axiom was rendered null and void in the case of Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, soloist of the evening. The Buffalo singer was given so overwhelmingly cordial a reception on her appearance that it was some time before Dr. Muck was able to proceed with her first number, the aria, My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice, from Samson and Delilah. Miss Ashley sang the well-known air in German, with a richness and opulence of voice which surprised even those who have been aware of her great vocal gifts. With the exception of an occasional low tone, which was sometimes eclipsed by the orchestral accompaniment, the voice rose above the tonal background of the instruments with gratifying fullness and with beauty and warmth which compelled genuine admiration. Miss Ashley was called back four times after the aria, and it was only when the audience found Dr. Muck inexorable in the rule of "no encores" that they allowed the singer to retire.

Miss Ashley's second number was The Erl-King, with orchestration by Franz Liszt. Here again she aroused an outburst of enthusiasm by her singing, an admirable factor of which is her fine diction. Her dignity and charm of presence made another factor in her success, which was one of largest measure.

The next concert in Mrs. Smith's series will take place on February 24th, when the Mineapolis Orchestra will play, with Teresa Carreno as soloist.

M. M. H.

From COMMERCIAL
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BRILLIANT CONCERT

Annual Visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Enjoyed By Large Audience.

RUTH LEWIS-ASHLEY.

Local Singer Was the Soloist—Dr. Karl Muck an Ideal Conductor.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience at Elmwood Music Hall last evening. This was the fourth concert in the series of six arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith and it can truthfully be said that it was one of the finest concerts heard in Buffalo in many seasons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is classed among the few best orchestras in existence. Each year the members of [illegible] wonderful organization improve, and now such a standard of excellence has been attained that it does not seem possible to be more perfect. The strings are technically correct and the tones of violins, violas, 'cellos and basses are pure and noble. The reed instruments were especially fine last evening and the tones of the horns and brasses were even and never harsh, not even in the utmost forte passages.

No finer playing or more perfect ensemble has been heard in Buffalo. The Boston Symphony Orchestra learned long ago everything that pertains to the noblest aspect of this art. The players have wrested from it secrets that have been hidden from most other orchestral players.

Dr. Karl Muck leads his men with a surety that is convincing. He is a musician that brings out every little detail; he is master of dignified breadth and effective contrasts and yet at no time does he sacrifice beauty for the sake of effect. Dr. Muck possesses all the qualities which might be expected to lure one to the concert room—poetry, originality, passion and charm. When he raises his baton the instruments awaken and the men respond as if inspired. Few conductors can get such wonderful results with so little effort as Dr. Muck. His reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony was immense. All the movements were interpreted with such faultless poise, yet with such a wealth of warm, glowing emotion that the audience applauded vigorously after each number. It was the supreme art of full maturity that finds contemplative joy in beauty as well as exuberant joy in the consciousness of achievement.

The "Allegretto" was played with richness of tone and fine balance and the "Scherzo" marked the highest point of perfection.

Bizet's suite No. 1 from "L' Arlesienne" and "The Sold Bride" overture by Smetana were the other orchestral numbers.

The charming "Minuetto" and the lovely "Adagietto" were rendered with striking effects.

Ruth Lewis-Ashley, one of Buffalo's leading singers, was the soloist and her first appearance was the signal for an ovation that was indeed flattering. Miss Lewis-Ashley has not been heard in public in Buffalo since her return from Europe where she won a great measure of success as an opera singer. She was heard last night in "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from Saint-Saen's "Samson and Delilah" and Der Erlkoenig" by Schubert.

Miss Lewis-Ashley has a voice of much power and especially pleasing are the notes of her upper register. She sings with much skill and her voice rings out clear and true. There is a spontaneity and freshness that is pleasing and her ennunciation is very good.

She was given a warm reception after each number and had to bow her acknowledgements [illegible]

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT TUESDAY WILL BE TREAT

Mme. Teresa Carreno to be Soloist, Playing Beethoven.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and her appearance will be one of the treats of the musical season. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

Last Sunday afternoon, with Julia Culp, she appeared in a concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, and her success was considered remarkable, even in Boston, where she is a great favorite. The criticisms of her playing the next day were eulogistic in the extreme.

From CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 29 1914

Modern Russian Music Under Muck's Baton

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Artistic Performance of Topheavy Program.

CONDUCTING REACHES FINE ART

The Ellis series of concerts had a brilliant close with the appearance at Carnegie Hall last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck director. The attraction was a powerful one—so powerful that the house had been sold out a week in advance and standing room was in large demand. This was to be expected, considering that the Boston orchestra enjoys deservedly the reputation of being a perfect musical machine, excelled by none on either side of the Atlantic, and governed, moreover, by a director who stands among the three or four masters of his craft whose fame is international. It is to the credit of the management of the orchestra that its full membership is brought en tour instead of falling back on the too common and too easily tolerated device of a traveling organization of inadequate strength.

The program presented was not compellingly attractive, the first part being given up entirely to the No. 5 Symphony of the Russian Glazounoff, which, for obvious reasons, is the least known of this composer's symphonic works, the fourth and sixth symphonies having an apparent monopoly of public favor. This work, to put the matter in a nutshell, while rich in the gorgeous instrumental effects which are the long suit of the modern Russian school, has not sufficient thematic interest to keep mind and heart enchained during the 45 minutes or thereabouts which it takes to perform it. There are many fascinating passages, such, for instance, as in the first movement, a cantilena for flute and clarinet with an accompaniment of harp arpeggios and strings pizzicato; and the fairly-like measures of the Scherzo and the barbaric, tempestuous Finale, bringing out all the powers of the orchestra, proved stirring enough; but in the main, the lack of symmetry and coherency gave the hearer a sense of strain rather than of enjoyment and left one wondering why, on the occasion of Dr. Muck's one visit to Pittsburgh this season, he should make this his piece de resistance.

As to the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" which opened the second part of the program, there could be no such complaint. On every new hearing of a Rimsky-Korsakoff work of this type, one is well-nigh moved to reaffirm Tschaikowsky's dictum to the effect that his gifted colleague stands in the very forefront of masters of orchestration. In the Caprice, the effects produced by the treatment of individual instruments, running in succession the whole gamut of the orchestra, by the use of groups for tonal contrast and by the ever-varying tone-colors employed, are indescribably beautiful. Now it is a song-like theme given to the horns against a rocking accompaniment for strings; now it is a solo violin playing a quaint cadenza against a pianissimo roll of the snare drum; now it is a clarinet passage, with an uncanny roll of cymbals as a background; or perhaps it is a combination of harp and triangle or of violins with the blare of trombones and tubas. In each new variation, each new solo cadenza, there is an element of surprise that is full of charm. And throughout the mood is there—the mood of Spanish gipsy life from the fantastic morning serenade with which the rhapsodic work begins to the whirling fandango at the finish.

As if to relax the tension after this tour de force, the next offering was the "Arlesienne" Suite of Bizet, that gently pleasing production which every patron of popular concerts knows and on which the symphony orchestras fall back for rest and recreation. After a wild fandango with Russian trimmings, the bliss of doing an Adagietto at a tempo which ran exactly one and two-thirds seconds to the beat must have been ineffable.

Another popular standby in the shape of Liszt's "Les Preludes" was used to close the program, and the melodic beauties of this work and the incident exploitation of all the resources of the orchestra seemed to be much enjoyed.

Dr. Muck's methods are a revelation in the fine art of conducting. He is not spectacular. He does not pose. He never lashes himself into a fine frenzy. Uniformly quiet and self-contained, he exercises, nevertheless, perfect control over his forces and secures a sensitive response to his slightest motion. Under his hand there is absolute certainty of attack and what may be described as absolute unity of thought and impulse. It is as if the orchestra were one man instead of a body of one hundred men, so homogeneous is its work and so unfailingly does it reflect the emotions of its leader. No matter what the program may be, the mere hearing of such an orchestra is well worth while.

ARTHUR G. BURGOYNE.

STAATSZEITUNG
dress: New York City.
Date FEB 1 1914

Die nächſten Konzerte der Boſtoner finden am Abend des 19., reſp. am Nachmittag des 21. Februar in Carnegie Hall unter Leitung von Dr. Muck ſtatt. Am Abend iſt die Sopranſängerin Frau Eliſabeth Böhm v. Endert die Soliſtin, welche die lyriſche Sopraniſtin der königlichen Oper in Berlin iſt. Die Künſtlerin weilt hier zu ſehr kurzem Aufenthalt, währenddeſſen ſie mehrere Mal im Rahmen der Boſtoner Konzerte ſingen wird. In der Samstag-Matinee giebt es keinen Soliſten.

k, 1884

From Herald
Address [illegible]
Date [illegible]

Esta 84

GOOD HOUSE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wieting Filled Almost to Its Capacity.

CONCERT WAS SUPERB

Glazounoff Symphony Appropriate as Its Nucleus—Liszt Tone Poem a Stirring Climax—More Good Things in Prospect.

When America's two foremost concert orchestras were announced for dates within a few weeks of each other, the musical appreciation of Central New York was put on trial for its always precarious life, and the outlook was rather depressing. Therefore, its unanimous and enthusiastic acquittal last night on the first of the two counts is a rare joy to all concerned, including at least one chronicler.

That the Boston Symphony orchestra would give a superb concert went without saying. It does nothing else; the poster of bills advertising its coming serves notice on his fellow townsmen that superb things are to be done. From me, at least, the orchestra and its music will get no compliments. I would as soon be found complimenting Velsaquer on his Philips, or catching an edition with a sonnet to Aconcagua. All the compliments in order must go to the people who had sense enough to pack the Wieting almost to its capacity, and to Miss A. Kathleen King, who has persisted in bringing first class musical attractions to Syracuse when failure after failure seeemd inevitable. Last night she had a measure of reward, and I cannot think that anyone will deny that she had earned it.

As to a Soloist.

For the view that a great orchestra is cheapened by habitual concerts with a soloist, I hold no brief. If the soloist is what he should be, I love such concerts as well as anybody. But I shall find it hard to be patient with the man who may tell me that last night's concert would have been made more enjoyable by a soloist. If the Boston Symphony orchestra cannot find favor for its own sake, what musical organization can? And in the opinion of some musicians, that since the Boston Symphony orchestra comes but once in four or five years, a greater and better established symphony than Glazounoff's Fifth would have been a better nucleus for the programme, I cannot join. The Glazounoff symphony, poetic, mellifluous, readily understood, seems to me just the sort of symphony that should be played to do the greatest good to the greatest number in a city which great orchestras rarely visit. So appealing were the first three movements that until the fourth, with its bold dissonances and tempestuous climax, one almost felt cheated out of his modern Russian composer.

The more familiar Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish themes followed suit. N o listener not tone deaf could have found it hard to keep his thoughts on music so sensuous. Almost all the Bizet 'L'Arlesienne' suit was downright "pretty;" the symphonic poem of Liszt came as a relief, a little fortissimo after much lovely piano. And wonderful it was to hear the great orchestra build up that mighty climax with consummate ease, a wealth of reserve power being evident.

Beauty of Tone.

Sheer beauty of tone (especially as to the strings), and perfect response to the director's interpretation could hardly go farther. One always reads the work of a celebrated director reviewed as if he had been playing on an organ, or the waving of his baton had actually produced the sound. Much of this is arrant nonsense, but the absolute musical sympathy of Dr. Muck and his players would make some printed ecstacy allowable. The severest criticism of the concert which I have heard made by musicians is that the later numbers were played in rapid succession, and the listener had almost no respite.

We may now breathe easier, confident that the New York Philharmonic orchestra, coming with that great and deservedly popular violinist, Mischa Elman, will have such another reception.

C. McK.

Address [illegible]
Date JAN 28 19

Esta

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston Organization Gives Excellent Concert Here.

KARL MUCK LEADS

Conductor of Elegance, With Vigor and Refinement.

MISS RUTH LEWIS ASHLEY

Buffalo Singer, Soloist of the Evening, Scores a Triumph.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last evening in Elmwood Music Hall its annual concert, under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. It was attended by the usual large audience, it was characterized by more than the usual amount of enthusiasm, and with justice, for never has the famous organization given in this city a performance reaching a higher pinnacle of nobility and beauty than that of last night. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra, is a leader who is able to draw forth from his men the best that is in them. He is also a musician who can, at the same time, preserve the bold outlines and the delicacy of detail, so that his readings have both vigor and refinement. He is essentially a conductor of elegance, polishing each passage and phrase till it glows and sparkles with beauty and color.

It was indeed a pleasure to hear the Beethoven seventh symphony with which the programme began. The work is rarely heard, yet it is one which Beethoven called "one of my best." With the exception of the Allegretto, which is written more in the mood of mystery, the dance element prevails in this symphony, and in no other of the immortal nine is shown more strikingly this composer's exhaustless fertility and the genius which can make a few simple themes flower out into such luxuriant forms. Dr. Muck emphasized in his readings the gayety and buoyancy which characterizes the work and it would be difficult to imagine a lovelier interpretation of the fairy-like Scherzo than he gave.

While each section of the orchestra was beyond criticism in its tonal beauty, special attention was called to the fine quality of the woodwinds in the Vivace of the first movement, where the listener knew not which to admire the most, as oboes, clarinets, flutes and bassoons alternated in the melodic phrases. It was all a delight to the ear. Small wonder that the conductor was recalled time and again at the end of the symphony, and his sharing of honors with his players was an act both gracious and just.

Other orchestral numbers were Bizet's L'Arlesienne suite No. 1 and Smetana's overture to The Sold Bride. Standing out promiently in its loveliness was the Adagietto from the suite, where the solo voices of strings, woodwind or bass floated upon a sea of sound like swans mirrored upon a lake, so smooth, so serenely beautiful was the playing of this movement. The entire suite was ideal in its performance and it evoked some of the heartiest applause of the evening.

The prophet without honor in his own country axiom was rendered null and void in the case of Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, soloist of the evening. The Buffalo singer was given so overwhelmingly cordial a reception on her appearance that it was some time before Dr. Muck was able to proceed with her first number, the aria, My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice, from Samson and Delilah. Miss Ashley sang the well-known air in German, with a richness and opulence of voice which surprised even those who have been aware of her great vocal gifts. With the exception of an occasional low tone, which was sometimes eclipsed by the orchestral accompaniment, the voice rose above the tonal background of the instruments with gratifying fullness and with beauty and warmth which compelled genuine admiration. Miss Ashley was called back four times after the aria, and it was only when the audience found Dr. Muck inexorable in the rule of "no encores" that they allowed the singer to retire.

Miss Ashley's second number was The Erl-King, with orchestration by Franz Liszt. Here again she aroused an outburst of enthusiasm by her singing, an admirable factor of which is her fine diction. Her dignity and charm of presence made another factor in her success, which was one of largest measure.

The next concert in Mrs. Smith's series will take place on February 24th, when the Mineapolis Orchestra will appear with Teresa Carreno as soloist.

M. M. H.

From COMMERCIAL
Address BUFFALO N Y
Date JAN 28 1914

Esta

BRILLIANT CONCERT

Annual Visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Enjoyed By Large Audience.

RUTH LEWIS-ASHLEY.

Local Singer Was the Soloist—Dr. Karl Muck an Ideal Conductor.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience at Elmwood Music Hall last evening. This was the fourth concert in the series of six arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith and it can truthfully be said that it was one of the finest concerts heard in Buffalo in many seasons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is classed among the few best orchestras in existence. Each year the members of this wonderful organization improve, and now such a standard of excellence has been attained that it does not seem possible to be more perfect. The strings are technically correct and the tones of violins, violas, 'cellos and basses are pure and noble. The reed instruments were especially fine last evening and the tones of the horns and brasses were even and never harsh, not even in the utmost forte passages.

No finer playing or more perfect ensemble has been heard in Buffalo. The Boston Symphony Orchestra learned long ago everything that pertains to the noblest aspect of this art. The players have wrested from it secrets that have been hidden from most other orchestral players.

Dr. Karl Muck leads his men with a surety that is convincing. He is a musician that brings out every little detail; he is master of dignified breadth and effective contrasts and yet at no time does he sacrifice beauty for the sake of effect. Dr. Muck possesses all the qualities which might be expected to lure one to the concert room—poetry, originality, passion and charm. When he raises his baton the instruments awaken and the men respond as if inspired. Few conductors can get such wonderful results with so little effort as Dr. Muck. His reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony was immense. All the movements were interpreted with such faultless poise, yet with such a wealth of warm, glowing emotion that the audience applauded vigorously after each number. It was the supreme art of full maturity that finds contemplative joy in beauty as well as exuberant joy in the consciousness of achievement.

The "Allegretto" was played with richness of tone and fine balance and the "Scherzo" marked the highest point of perfection.

Bizet's suite No. 1 from "L' Arlesienne" and "The Sold Bride" overture by Smetana were the other orchestral numbers.

The charming "Minuetto" and the lovely "Adagietto" were rendered with striking effects.

Ruth Lewis-Ashley, one of Buffalo's leading singers, was the soloist and her first appearance was the signal for an ovation that was indeed flattering. Miss Lewis-Ashley has not been heard in public in Buffalo since her return from Europe where she won a great measure of success as an opera singer. She was heard last night in "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" from Saint-Saen's "Samson and Delilah" and Der Erlkoenig" by Schubert.

Miss Lewis-Ashley has a voice of much power and especially pleasing are the notes of her upper register. She sings with much skill and her voice rings out clear and true. There is a spontaneity and freshness that is pleasing and her ennunciation is very good.

She was given a warm reception after each number and had to bow her acknowledgements time and again. She was excellently supported by the orchestra in both her numbers.

Esta 84

TUESDAY WILL BE TREAT

Mme. Teresa Carreno to be Soloist, Playing Beethoven.

At the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and her appearance will be one of the treats of the musical season. She will play the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

Last Sunday afternoon, with Julia Culp, she appeared in a concert at Symphony Hall, Boston, and her success was considered remarkable, even in Boston, where she is a great favorite. The criticisms of her playing the next day were eulogistic in the extreme.

The

From Pittsburg, Pa.
Address
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES NIGHT OF SUBLIME MUSIC

Auditors in Ecstasy Over Its Playing and Rhapsodize About Dr. Muck

The Ellis series of concerts came to a close last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous conductor, Dr. Muck, gave a memorable concert in Carnegie Music Hall. It was indeed a memorable concert, and it can safely be said that if any conductor of either continent can replace the great Gustav Mahler, whose wonderful concert of December, 1910, is still green in the memory of those who heart it, it is Dr. Muck. He has in his brains and heart the real spirit of the music he interprets. A subtle, active, penetrating intellect is the chief characteristic of this man.

But Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He appears to have no limitations, no wants, no chains.

The program served to introduce two compositions unfamiliar to local audiences. One was the B flat major symphony of Glazounoff, and the other, Caprice on Spanish themes, by Rimsy-Korsakoff—Listzt's famous pupil. The symphony began with a slow introduction which proved to be a fragmentary announcement of the second theme of the first movement, sung at length in its place after a rhythmic first theme. The rhythm of this first theme persisted throughout the movement in the accompaniment of the other theme. However ,this movement came nearer to being really symphonic than any one of the other three. Although the other movements had much charm, but were on the whole not profoundly interesting. In all, the music is disappointing in freshness and originality, in inventive design, in individuality of instrumental treatment, although splendidly and beautifully melodious. It pleases for the moment, but leaves no lasting and pleasant impression, except through the individual strokes of Dr. Muck. This symphony was first introduced in America under the baton of Anton Seidl in New York March 5, 1898. Of its lack of originality we might say with Kipling: "When 'Omar smoth 5is bloomin' lyre 'E'd 'eard men sing by land and sea, And what 'e thought 'e might require 'E went and took the same as me."

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprine on Spanish themes followed.

It is a brilliant and entertaining number in which the horns, flutes, clarinets and other instruments indulge in the merriest of pranks, while the kettle-drums, cymbals and triangles have the time of their life.

Bizet's Suite, "L'Arlesienne followed. From beginning to end, this music with its rare imagination and beauty thrilled the ears and melted the hearts of the listeners. The music is full of beautiful tone.

The program closed with Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, beautifully rendered of course. The audience completely filled the hall and Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra earned and got tremendous applause for each number. It was a night of song, of music—and of conducting, too. It is almost safe, and in these unemotional days, to write the word sublime.

C. J. E.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Teresa Carreno, Pianist to be Soloist at Concert Here Next Week.

Teresa Carreno, the veteran pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony at its fourth concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, aroused wildest enthusiasm last Sunday afternoon when she played to an overflowing audience in Symphony Hall, Boston. The papers the next day spoke of her work in the most eulogistic vein. The Boston Herald said:

"Mme. Carreno's performance was admirable throughout the afternoon. She displayed perfect mechanism, controlled by a supreme intelligence. There was unfailing sense of proportion, polished phrasing, tonal beauty, wealth of nuances. As interpreter of pronounced individuality, her rendering of Beethoven's sonata was absorbing. In this, as in Chopin's Polonaise and the Marche Militaire, she showed rare fire, brilliance, verve. There were, too, other memorable moments, such as her ending of the Nocturne, the feathery lightness of the Etude and the changing music of the Impromptu."

The sale of seats for this concert opens at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 31 19

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 20, will introduce to Brooklyn as soloist a singer new to this country of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is described as a woman of unusual talent and unusual beauty, and she is in America for a few weeks only, during which time she will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From Courrier
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MISS ASHLEY HEARD TOGETHER

Foremost Orchestra of Country, on Annual Visit Here, Attracts Usual Brilliant and Appreciative Audience.

DR. MUCK IN PERFECT FORM THROUGHOUT PROGRAMME

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis, Making First Public Appearance as Soloist Since Return From Abroad, Achieves

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the occasion for the gathering of a brilliant audience, and the one at Elmwood Music hall last night was a typical one.

The orchestra ranks first in our symphonic organizations, and for tonal quality, suavity, ensemble and unfailing precision and elegance of style stands supreme. Dr. Karl Muck is one of the few great conductors in the world and his second appearance in Buffalo at the head of this famous body of musicians was an event of interest. The conductor was in splendid form. Never departing from the character of the work, he disclosed his fine sense of rhythmic contrast and warm-glowing color.

Beethoven Work Charms.

He sounded the Beethoven message in the Symphony in A major No. 7, Op. 92 with a lofty eloquence of the maniold beauties and the uplifting joyousness of this most radiant of all Beethoven's works. Particularly in the wonderful massing of harmonies in the allegro of the second movement when the beauty of the strings and the equal hormany of the auxiliary bands of reeds and brasses, etc., offered a musical ensemble of richness and enchanting charm. The incisiveness and crystal clearness of the last movement offered another example of the work of the ripened performers in the rank and file of the various choirs of the orchestra.

A grateful novelty on the programme was the Suite No. 1 from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," in which the imposing beauty of the prelude and the captivating rhythm of the minuet aroused further demonstrations of approval.

Of equal interest was the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana, in which all the nuances and subleties of modern orchestration were called into play, the orchestra responding in true virtuoso style to the demands of the difficult score and Dr. Muck's inspired baton.

Miss Ashley Welcomed.

Another feature of local interest was the first public appearance of Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis of this city, as soloist since her return from Europe where she won success in grand opera in Germany.

Miss Ashley was accorded an ovation that would have ben flattering to any artist no matter how famous. She won instant success in her first number sung with the orchestra, the aria "My Heart at thy Dear Voice" from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens. Miss Ashley has sung the role of Delilah, and her operatic experience enhanced the beauty of her rendition of this favorite aria. Her voice is a warm, rich contralto of noble quality and amplitude in range and her admirable poise and stage presence, her command of legato and the dramatic fire and lyricism with which she invested this number won such applause she was recalled a half dozen times.

In Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," sung with the orchestra, she again disclosed her ability as a concert singer. In this number the excellence of her diction, the fine shading and the authority with which she sang the more dramatic passages and the delicacy of the softer pianissimo parts constituted another vocal achievement for this righly dowered young artist. She was recalled several times to bow her acknowledgements. The concert was under the local management of Mrs. Mae Davis Smith.

From Eve News
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON-SYMPHONY IN MAGNIFICENT CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck's Baton Reveals the True Beauty of Beethoven.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Elmwood Music hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The brilliant audience in attendance was ample testimony to the firm hold the Boston orchestra has on the Buffalo public. Dr. Karl Muck is universally recognized as one of the very greatest conductors of the present day, who may be companioned by a Nikisch, but almost no one else.

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley.

With an instrument of the perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a work like the "Seventh Symphony" of Beethoven, under Dr. Muck's baton, is a revelation of incomparable puissance. Beginning with the extended introduction, which opens to the hearer a tone picture as even with Beethoven is rarely met, the almost pastoral simplicity of the first movement's principal theme acuires a richness and variety, an eloquence of expression in its contrasts and development that attract and hold the listener with magnetic power.

The performance given the symphony by Dr. Muck was magnificent in its eloquent setting forth of themes ,its life-giving rhythm, its vivid contrast of mood.

The soloist was Ruth Lewis Ashley, contralto. The overwhelming welcome given Miss Lewis Ashley in this, her first public appearance in her native city since her return from a highly successful operatic career in Europe, must have unnereved the stoutest heart, and it was only after the opening of her arie, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," by Saint-Saens, the singer was heard to true advantage.

Gifted with a voice of remarkable quality and power, Miss Lewis Ashley has shown possession of a fine artistic standard in the development not only of her vocal technic, but of very especially insight into style, dramatic character, illumination of text as well as music—all, in short, that make of a performance an interpretation.

Most cordial praise is due Miss Lewis Ashley for her singing of Schubert's Erl King, in which her warmth of tone, dramatic portrayal and wonderful diction were alike a tribute to song and singer. The concert closed with Smetana's "Overture to the Sold Bride," played in incomparable manner.

BOSTON HERALD.
FEBRUARY 7.

TRIUMPH FOR INTERPRETING BRAHMS SPIRIT

Symphony Conducted by Dr. Muck for First Time in Boston.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. There was not a vacant seat. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4............Brahms
Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"........Wagner
Concerto for piano, E-flat major, No. 5....Beethoven
"Death and Transfiguration"...........Strauss

Dr. Muck conducted the symphony by Brahms for the first time in Boston. He put it on the program of March 28, 1908 but as he was then indisposed, Mr Wendling, the concert master, conducted in his place.

Yesterday the performance was an impressive one; first of all by a singularly skilful choice of tempi. We have heard, and within recent years, the first movement dragged out beyond endurance, so that there was little contrast between it and the Andante that follows. While Dr. Muck preserved the austere, granitic character of certain pages, and they are in the majority, the Andante was sung, and the inherent melancholy was contemplative, even tender, not wholly pessimistic.

The third movement, the one that Brahms's friends protested especially against when they first heard it, was played in the spirit indicated by the composer, i. e., in jocose manner and with amazing spirit, while the performance of the final variations was a triumph for leader and orchestra.

Some find in this symphony a program. This one says that the composer was influenced by Sophocles; that one sees in the Andante the desolate Campagna; the Finale suggests to still another the burial of a soldier. Let them rave. The fourth symphony may picture to Mr. Kalbeck the tragedy of human life. To Mr. Jones or Mr. Robinson it may portray the struggles of life, while Mr. Smith may think vague but gloomy thoughts throughout the performance.

To many of us this symphony is on the whole depressing; written in the vein of Ecclesiastes. Brahms thought much on death and he dreaded the inevitable end. Death to him was not the compassionate angel; it was the lean old fellow with the scythe. And this symphony reeks of death and is without the noble music that brings hope and confidence at the end of the one in C minor.

After a superb performance of the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," in which Dr. Muck worked a remarkable crescendo, a passionate performance without screeching—for the passion of some conducting this prelude is only caterwauling—Mme. Carreno played Beethoven's great concerto. She was last here in December, 1909, when she played Tschaikowsky's concerto with her accustomed fire. During her absence she celebrated the 50th anniversary of her appearance in public as a pianist. She has had an unusually long, brilliant, romantic career.

Yesterday she gave a sotto voce version of the concerto. Her playing was careful, exact. The runs were smooth and even; the phrasing was precise and neat; but the noble breadth and sweep, the chivalric dash, the imperial stateliness that should characterize the performance of this concerto—all were lacking, and the interpretation of the Adagio was pale.

The concert was a long one and many, unfortunately for them, left without hearing a most dramatic reading of Strauss's tone-poem. When this work was first played in New York a critic of that city described it as a charnel-house piece. It is true that Strauss's hero is a long time in dying and he dies hard, but the majesty, the sublimity of the "Transfiguration" section must excite admiration even in the minds of those prejudiced against "realistic program music." Death "may not be so difficult, may not be so terrible, as our fears whisper. The dead keep their secrets and in a little while we shall be as wise as they—and as taciturn." So wrote a man under sentence of death when he was still young. But when we hear such music as the "Transfiguration" we recall the saying of Sir Thomas Browne: "Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes and pompous in the grave."

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Cornelius, overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera will sing for the first time in this country. She will sing these songs with orchestra: Wolf, "Verborgenheit;" Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie"; Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert, "Venushymne."

From Pittsburg, Pa.
Address
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES NIGHT OF SUBLIME MUSIC

Auditors in Ecstasy Over Its Playing and Rhapsodize About Dr. Muck

The Ellis series of concerts came to a close last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous conductor, Dr. Muck, gave a memorable concert in Carnegie Music Hall. It was indeed a memorable concert, and it can safely be said that if any conductor of either continent can replace the great Gustav Mahler, whose wonderful concert of December, 1910, is still green in the memory of those who heart it, it is Dr. Muck. He has in his brains and heart the real spirit of the music he interprets. A subtle, active, penetrating intellect is the chief characteristic of this man.

But Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He appears to have no limitations, no wants, no chains.

The program served to introduce two compositions unfamiliar to local audiences. One was the B flat major symphony of Glazounoff, and the other, Caprice on Spanish themes, by Rimsy-Korsakoff—Liszt's famous pupil. The symphony began with a slow introduction which proved to be a fragmentary announcement of the second theme of the first movement, sung at length in its place after a rhythmic first theme. The rhythm of this first theme persisted throughout the movement in the accompaniment of the other theme. However ,this movement came nearer to being really symphonic than any one of the other three. Although the other movements had much charm, but were on the whole not profoundly interesting. In all, the music is disappointing in freshness and originality, in inventive design, in individuality of instrumental treatment, although splendidly and beautifully melodious. It pleases for the moment, but leaves no lasting and pleasant impression, except through the individual strokes of Dr. Muck. This symphony was first introduced in America under the baton of Anton Seidl in New York March 5, 1898. Of its lack of originality we might say with Kipling: "When 'Omar smoth 5is bloomin' lyre 'E'd 'eard men sing by land and sea, And what 'e thought 'e might require 'E went and took the same as me."

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprine on Spanish themes followed.

It is a brilliant and entertaining number in which the horns, flutes, clarinets and other instruments indulge in the merriest of pranks, while the kettle-drums, cymbals and triangles have the time of their life.

Bizet's Suite, "L'Arlesienne followed. From beginning to end, this music with its rare imagination and beauty thrilled the ears and melted the hearts of the listeners. The music is full of beautiful tone.

The program closed with Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, beautifully rendered of course. The audience completely filled the hall and Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra earned and got tremendous applause for each number. It was a night of song, of music—and of conducting, too. It is almost safe, and in these unemotional days, to write the word sublime.

C. J. E.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Teresa Carreno, Pianist to be Soloist at Concert Here Next Week.

Teresa Carreno, the veteran pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony at its fourth concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, aroused wildest enthusiasm last Sunday afternoon when she played to an overflowing audience in Symphony Hall, Boston. The papers the next day spoke of her work in the most eulogistic vein. The Boston Herald said:

"Mme. Carreno's performance was admirable throughout the afternoon. She displayed perfect mechanism, controlled by a supreme intelligence. There was unfailing sense of proportion, polished phrasing, tonal beauty, wealth of nuances. As interpreter of pronounced individuality, her rendering of Beethoven's sonata was absorbing. In this, as in Chopin's Polonaise and the Marche Militaire, she showed rare fire, brilliance, verve. There were, too, other memorable moments, such as her ending of the Nocturne, the feathery lightness of the Etude and the changing music of the Impromptu."

The sale of seats for this concert opens at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 31 19

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 20, will introduce to Brooklyn as soloist a singer new to this country of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is described as a woman of unusual talent and unusual beauty, and she is in America for a few weeks only, during which time she will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Courrier
From BUFFALO, N. Y.
Address
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MISS ASHLEY HEARD TOGETHER

Foremost Orchestra of Country, on Annual Visit Here, Attracts Usual Brilliant and Appreciative Audience.

DR. MUCK IN PERFECT FORM THROUGHOUT PROGRAMME

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis, Making First Public Appearance as Soloist Since Return From Abroad, Achieves

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the occasion for the gathering of a brilliant audience, and the one at Elmwood Music hall last night was a typical one.

The orchestra ranks first in our symphonic organizations, and for tonal quality, suavity, ensemble and unfailing precision and elegance of style stands supreme. Dr. Karl Muck is one of the few great conductors in the world and his second appearance in Buffalo at the head of this famous body of musicians was an event of interest. The conductor was in splendid form. Never departing from the character of the work, he disclosed his fine sense of rhythmic contrast and warm-glowing color.

Beethoven Work Charms.

He sounded the Beethoven message in the Symphony in A major No. 7, Op. 92 with a lofty eloquence of the maniold beauties and the uplifting joyousness of this most radiant of all Beethoven's works. Particularly in the wonderful massing of harmonies in the allegro of the second movement when the beauty of the strings and the equal hormany of the auxiliary bands of reeds and brasses, etc., offered a musical ensemble of richness and enchanting charm. The incisiveness and crystal clearness of the last movement offered another example of the work of the ripened performers in the rank and file of the various choirs of the orchestra.

A grateful novelty on the programme was the Suite No. 1 from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," in which the imposing beauty of the prelude and the captivating rhythm of the minuet aroused further demonstrations of approval.

Of equal interest was the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana, in which all the nuances and subleties of modern orchestration were called into play, the orchestra responding in true virtuoso style to the demands of the difficult score and Dr. Muck's inspired baton.

Miss Ashley Welcomed.

Another feature of local interest was the first public appearance of Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis of this city, as soloist since her return from Europe where she won success in grand opera in Germany.

Miss Ashley was accorded an ovation that would have ben flattering to any artist no matter how famous. She won instant success in her first number sung with the orchestra, the aria "My Heart at thy Dear Voice" from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens. Miss Ashley has sung the role of Delilah, and her operatic experience enhanced the beauty of her rendition of this favorite aria. Her voice is a warm, rich contralto of noble quality and amplitude in range and her admirable poise and stage presence, her command of legato and the dramatic fire and lyricism with which she invested this number won such applause she was recalled a half dozen times.

In Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," sung with the orchestra, she again disclosed her ability as a concert singer. In this number the excellence of her diction, the fine shading and the authority with which she sang the more dramatic passages and the delicacy of the softer pianissimo parts constituted another vocal achievement for this righly dowered young artist. She was recalled several times to bow her acknowledgements. The concert was under the local management of Mrs. Mae Davis Smith.

From Eve News
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON-SYMPHONY IN MAGNIFICENT CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck's Baton Reveals the True Beauty of Beethoven.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Elmwood Music hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The brilliant audience in attendance was ample testimony to the firm hold the Boston orchestra has on the Buffalo public. Dr. Karl Muck is universally recognized as one of the very greatest conductors of the present day, who may be companioned by a Nikisch, but almost no one else.

With an instrument of the perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a work like the "Seventh Symphony" of Beethoven, under Dr. Muck's baton, is a revelation of incomparable puissance. Beginning with the extended introduction, which opens to the hearer a tone picture as even with Beethoven is rarely met, the almost pastoral simplicity of the first movement's principal theme acuires a richness and variety, an eloquence of expression in its contrasts and development that attract and hold the listener with magnetic power.

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley.

The performance given the symphony by Dr. Muck was magnificent in its eloquent setting forth of themes its life-giving rhythm, its vivid contrast of mood.

The soloist was Ruth Lewis Ashley, contralto. The overwhelming welcome given Miss Lewis Ashley in this, her first public appearance in her native city since her return from a highly successful operatic career in Europe, must have unnereved the stoutest heart, and it was only after the opening of her arie, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," by Saint-Saens, the singer was heard to true advantage.

Gifted with a voice of remarkable quality and power, Miss Lewis Ashley has shown possession of a fine artistic standard in the development not only of her vocal technic, but of very especially insight into style, dramatic character, illumination of text as well as music—all, in short, that make of a performance an interpretation.

Most cordial praise is due Miss Lewis Ashley for her singing of Schubert's Erl King, in which her warmth of tone, dramatic portrayal and wonderful diction were alike a tribute to song and singer. The concert closed with Smetana's "Overture to the Sold Bride," played in incomparable manner.

BOSTON HERALD.
FEBRUARY 7.

TRIUMPH FOR INTERPRETING BRAHMS SPIRIT

Symphony Conducted by Dr. Muck for First Time in Boston.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. There was not a vacant seat. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4............Brahms
Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"........Wagner
Concerto for piano, E-flat major, No. 5.... Beethoven
"Death and Transfiguration"...........Strauss

Dr. Muck conducted the symphony by Brahms for the first time in Boston. He put it on the program of March 28, 1908 but as he was then indisposed, Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted in his place.

Yesterday the performance was an impressive one; first of all by a singularly skilful choice of tempi. We have heard, and within recent years, the first movement dragged out beyond endurance, so that there was little contrast between it and the Andante that follows. While Dr. Muck preserved the austere, granitic character of certain pages, and they are in the majority, the Andante was sung, and the inhcrent melancholy was contemplative, even tender, not wholly pessimistic.

The third movement, the one that Brahms's friends protested especially against when they first heard it, was played in the spirit indicated by the composer, i. e., in jocose manner and with amazing spirit, while the performance of the final variations was a triumph for leader and orchestra.

Some find in this symphony a program. This one says that the composer was influenced by Sophocles; that one sees in the Andante the desolate Campagna; the Finale suggests to still another the burial of a soldier. Let them rave. The fourth symphony may picture to Mr. Kalbeck the tragedy of human life. To Mr. Jones or Mr. Robinson it may portray the struggles of life, while Mr. Smith may think vague but gloomy thoughts throughout the performance.

To many of us this symphony is on the whole depressing; written in the vein of Ecclesiastes. Brahms thought much on death and he dreaded the inevitable end. Death to him was not the compassionate angel; it was the lean old fellow with the scythe. And this symphony reeks of death and is without the noble music that brings hope and confidence at the end of the one in C minor.

After a superb performance of the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," in which Dr. Muck worked a remarkable crescendo, a passionate performance without screeching—for the passion of some conducting this prelude is only caterwauling—Mme. Carreno played Beethoven's great concerto. She was last here in December, 1909, when she played Tschaikowsky's concerto with her accustomed fire. During her absence she celebrated the 50th anniversary of her appearance in public as a pianist. She has had an unusually long, brilliant, romantic career.

Yesterday she gave a sotto voce version of the concerto. Her playing was careful, exact. The runs were smooth and even; the phrasing was precise and neat; but the noble breadth and sweep, the chivalric dash, the imperial stateliness that should characterize the performance of this concerto—all were lacking, and the interpretation of the Adagio was pale.

The concert was a long one and many, unfortunately for them, left without hearing a most dramatic reading of Strauss's tone-poem. When this work was first played in New York a critic of that city described it as a charnel-house piece. It is true that Strauss's hero is a long time in dying and he dies hard, but the majesty, the sublimity of the "Transfiguration" section must excite admiration even in the minds of those prejudiced against "realistic program music." Death "may not be so difficult, may not be so terrible, as our fears whisper. The dead keep their secrets and in a little while we shall be as wise as they—and as taciturn." So wrote a man under sentence of death when he was still young. But when we hear such music as the "Transfiguration" we recall the saying of Sir Thomas Browne: "Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes and pompous in the grave."

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Cornelius, overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera will sing for the first time in this country. She will sing these songs with orchestra: Wolf, "Verborgenheit;" Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie"; Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert, "Venushymne."

From Pittsbu

Address

Date JAN 2

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDE NIGHT OF SUBLIME

Auditors in Ecstasy Over Playing and Rhapsodiz About Dr. Muck

The Ellis series of concerts came to a close last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous conductor, Dr. Muck, gave a memorable concert in Carnegie Music Hall. It was indeed a memorable concert, and it can safely be said that if any conductor of either continent can replace the great Gustav Mahler, whose wonderful concert of December, 1910, is still green in the memory of those who heart it, it is Dr. Muck. He has in his brains and heart the real spirit of the music he interprets. A subtle, active, penetrating intellect is the chief characteristic of this man.

But Dr. Muck knows how to lead, how to shade, how to express every passion and every mood. He appears to have no limitations, no wants, no chains.

The program served to introduce two compositions unfamiliar to local audiences. One was the B flat major symphony of Glazounoff, and the other, Caprice on Spanish themes, by Rimsy-Korsakoff—Listzt's famous pupil. The symphony began with a slow introduction which proved to be a fragmentary announcement of the second theme of the first movement, sung at length in its place after a rhythmic first theme. The rhythm of this first theme persisted throughout the movement in the accompaniment of the other theme. However ,this movement came nearer to being really symphonic than any one of the other three. Although the other movements had much charm, but were on the whole not profoundly interesting. In all, the music is disappointing in freshness and originality, in inventive design, in individuality of instrumental treatment, although splendidly and beautifully melodious. It pleases for the moment, but leaves no lasting and pleasant impression, except through the individual strokes of Dr. Muck. This symphony was first introduced in America under the baton of Anton Seidl in New York March 5, 1898. Of its lack of originality we might say with Kipling: "When 'Omar smoth 5is bloomin' lyre 'E'd 'eard men sing by land and sea, And what 'e thought 'e might require 'E went and took the same as me."

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprine on Spanish themes followed.

It is a brilliant and entertaining number in which the horns, flutes, clarinets and other instruments indulge in the merriest of pranks, while the kettle-drums, cymbals and triangles have the time of their life.

Bizet's Suite, "L'Arlesienne followed. From beginning to end, this music with its rare imagination and beauty thrilled the ears and melted the hearts of the listeners. The music is full of beautiful tone.

The program closed with Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, beautifully rendered of course. The audience completely filled the hall and Dr. Muck and his noble orchestra earned and got tremendous applause for each number. It was a night of song, of music—and of conducting, too. It is almost safe, and in these unemotional days, to write the word sublime.

C. J. E.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date JAN 29 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Teresa Carreno, Pianist to be Soloist at Concert Here Next Week.

Teresa Carreno, the veteran pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony at its fourth concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, arous wildest enthusiasm last Sunday aftern when she played to an overflowing audence in Symphony Hall, Boston. The papers the next day spoke of her work in the most eulogistic vein. The Boston Herald said:

"Mme. Carreno's performance was admirable throughout the afternoon. She displayed perfect mechanism, controlled by a supreme intelligence. There was unfailing sense of proportion, polished phrasing, tonal beauty, wealth of nuances. As interpreter of pronounced individuality, her rendering of Beethoven's sonata was absorbing. In this, as in Chopin's Polonaise and the Marche Militaire, she showed rare fire, brilliance, verve. There were, too, other memorable moments, such as her ending of the Nocturne, the feathery lightness of the Etude and the changing music of the Impromptu."

The sale of seats for this concert opens at Seddon's Newsstand, Butler Exchange, Saturday morning.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 31 1914

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 20, will introduce to Brooklyn as soloist a singer new to this country of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is described as a woman of unusual talent and unusual beauty, and she is in America for a few weeks only, during which time she will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From Courrier
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MISS ASHLEY HEARD TOGETHER

Foremost Orchestra of Country, on Annual Visit Here, Attracts Usual Brilliant and Appreciative Audience.

DR. MUCK IN PERFECT FORM THROUGHOUT PROGRAMME

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis, Making First Public Appearance as Soloist Since Return From Abroad, Achieves

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the occasion for the gathering of a brilliant audience, and the one at Elmwood Music hall last night was a typical one.

The orchestra ranks first in our symphonic organizations, and for tonal quality, suavity, ensemble and unfailing precision and elegance of style stands supreme. Dr. Karl Muck is one of the few great conductors in the world and his second appearance in Buffalo at the head of this famous body of musicians was an event of interest. The conductor was in splendid form. Never departing from the character of the work, he disclosed his fine sense of rhythmic contrast and warm-glowing color.

Beethoven Work Charms.

He sounded the Beethoven message in the Symphony in A major No. 7, Op. 92 with a lofty eloquence of the maniold beauties and the uplifting joyousness of this most radiant of all Beethoven's works. Particularly in the wonderful massing of harmonies in the allegro of the second movement when the beauty of the strings and the equal hormany of the auxiliary bands of reeds and brasses, etc., offered a musical ensemble of richness and enchanting charm. The incisiveness and crystal clearness of the last movement offered another example of the work of the ripened performers in the rank and file of the various choirs of the orchestra.

A grateful novelty on the programme was the Suite No. 1 from the music for Alphonse Daudet's play, "L'Arlesienne," in which the imposing beauty of the prelude and the captivating rhythm of the minuet aroused further demonstrations of approval.

Of equal interest was the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana, in which all the nuances and subleties of modern orchestration were called into play, the orchestra responding in true virtuoso style to the demands of the difficult score and Dr. Muck's inspired baton.

Miss Ashley Welcomed.

Another feature of local interest was the first public appearance of Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Lewis of this city, as soloist since her return from Europe where she won success in grand opera in Germany.

Miss Ashley was accorded an ovation that would have ben flattering to any artist no matter how famous. She won instant success in her first number sung with the orchestra, the aria "My Heart at thy Dear Voice" from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens. Miss Ashley has sung the role of Delilah, and her operatic experience enhanced the beauty of her rendition of this favorite aria. Her voice is a warm, rich contralto of noble quality and amplitude in range and her admirable poise and stage presence, her command of legato and the dramatic fire and lyricism with which she invested this number won such applause she was recalled a half dozen times.

[illegible] Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," sung [illegible] orchestra, she again disclosed [illegible] as a concert singer. In this [illegible] excellence of her diction, [illegible] and the authority with [illegible] more dramatic pas- [illegible] icacy of the softer [illegible] tituted another [illegible] this righly dow- [illegible] was recalled [illegible] her acknowledge- [illegible] rt was under the [illegible] of Mrs. Mae Davis

---

From Eve News
Address Buffalo N.Y.
Date JAN 28 1914

BOSTON-SYMPHONY IN MAGNIFICENT CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck's Baton Reveals the True Beauty of Beethoven.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Elmwood Music hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The brilliant audience in attendance was ample testimony to the firm hold the Boston orchestra has on the Buffalo public. Dr. Karl Muck is universally recognized as one of the very greatest conductors of the present day, who may be companioned by a Nikisch, but almost no one else.

With an instrument of the perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a work like the "Seventh Symphony" of Beethoven, under Dr. Muck's baton, is a revelation of incomparable puissance. Beginning with the extended introduction, which opens to the hearer a tone picture as even with Beethoven is rarely met, the almost pastoral simplicity of the first movement's principal theme acuires a richness and variety, an eloquence of expression in its contrasts and development that attract and hold the listener with magnetic power.

Miss Ruth Lewis Ashley.

The performance given the symphony by Dr. Muck was magnificent in its eloquent setting forth of themes ,its life-giving rhythm, its vivid contrast of mood.

The soloist was Ruth Lewis Ashley, contralto. The overwhelming welcome given Miss Lewis Ashley in this, her first public appearance in her native city since her return from a highly successful operatic career in Europe, must have unnereved the stoutest heart, and it was only after the opening of her arie, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," by Saint-Saens, the singer was heard to true advantage.

Gifted with a voice of remarkable quality and power, Miss Lewis Ashley has shown possession of a fine artistic standard in the development not only of her vocal technic, but of very especially insight into style, dramatic character, illumination of text as well as music—all, in short, that make of a performance an interpretation.

Most cordial praise is due Miss Lewis Ashley for her singing of Schubert's Erl King, in which her warmth of tone, dramatic portrayal and wonderful diction were alike a tribute to song and singer. The concert closed with Smetana's "Overture to the Sold Bride," played in incomparable manner.

BOSTON HERALD.
FEBRUARY 7.

TRIUMPH FOR INTERPRETING BRAHMS SPIRIT

Symphony Conducted by Dr. Muck for First Time in Boston.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. There was not a vacant seat. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4	Brahms
Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"	Wagner
Concerto for piano, E-flat major, No. 5	Beethoven
"Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss

Dr. Muck conducted the symphony by Brahms for the first time in Boston. He put it on the program of March 28, 1908 but as he was then indisposed, Mr. Wendling, the concert master, conducted in his place.

Yesterday the performance was an impressive one; first of all by a singularly skilful choice of tempi. We have heard, and within recent years, the first movement dragged out beyond endurance, so that there was little contrast between it and the Andante that follows. While Dr. Muck preserved the austere, granitic character of certain pages, and they are in the majority, the Andante was sung, and the inherent melancholy was contemplative, even tender, not wholly pessimistic.

The third movement, the one that Brahms's friends protested especially against when they first heard it, was played in the spirit indicated by the composer, i. e., in jocose manner and with amazing spirit, while the performance of the final variations was a triumph for leader and orchestra.

Some find in this symphony a program. This one says that the composer was influenced by Sophocles; that one sees in the Andante the desolate Campagna; the Finale suggests to still another the burial of a soldier. Let them rave. The fourth symphony may picture to Mr. Kalbeck the tragedy of human life. To Mr. Jones or Mr. Robinson it may portray the struggles of life, while Mr. Smith may think vague but gloomy thoughts throughout the performance.

To many of us this symphony is on the whole depressing; written in the vein of Ecclesiastes. Brahms thought much on death and he dreaded the inevitable end. Death to him was not the compassionate angel; it was the lean old fellow with the scythe. And this symphony reeks of death and is without the noble music that brings hope and confidence at the end of the one in C minor.

After a superb performance of the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," in which Dr. Muck worked a remarkable crescendo, a passionate performance without screeching—for the passion of some conducting this prelude is only caterwauling—Mme. Carreno played Beethoven's great concerto. She was last here in December, 1909, when she played Tschaikowsky's concerto with her accustomed fire. During her absence she celebrated the 50th anniversary of her appearance in public as a pianist. She has had an unusually long, brilliant, romantic career.

Yesterday she gave a sotto voce version of the concerto. Her playing was careful, exact. The runs were smooth and even; the phrasing was precise and neat; but the noble breadth and sweep, the chivalric dash, the imperial stateliness that should characterize the performance of this concerto—all were lacking, and the interpretation of the Adagio was pale.

The concert was a long one and many, unfortunately for them, left without hearing a most dramatic reading of Strauss's tone-poem. When this work was first played in New York a critic of that city described it as a charnel-house piece. It is true that Strauss's hero is a long time in dying and he dies hard, but the majesty, the sublimity of the "Transfiguration" section must excite admiration even in the minds of those prejudiced against "realistic program music." Death "may not be so difficult, may not be so terrible, as our fears whisper. The dead keep their secrets and in a little while we shall be as wise as they—and as taciturn." So wrote a man under sentence of death when he was still young. But when we hear such music as the "Transfiguration" we recall the saying of Sir Thomas Browne: "Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes and pompous in the grave."

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Cornelius, overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera will sing for the first time in this country. She will sing these songs with orchestra: Wolf, "Verborgenheit;" Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie"; Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert, "Venushymne."

ADVERTISER.

FEBRUARY 7

FINE PROGRAMME, BUT TOO LONG

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT MUSIC NOBLE

Brahms, Wagner, Beethoven and Strauss, With Mme. Carreno as Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Fourth Symphony. E minor.
Wagner—Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Beethoven—Fifth Piano Concerto. E-flat.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration." Tone Poem.

A great programme from beginning to end, even if somewhat spoiled by its length.

Such noble music made us ponder upon the tonal troubles now descending upon us, and wonder whether composers will ever accept such works as models again. Yet there were different schools and different epochs represented and Strauss and Brahms were as far apart as the poles.

Brahms' fourth symphony is one of the masterpieces that did not go begging in its early days, for the composer received about ten thousand dollars for it. When the wonderful figure-treatment of this symphony is spoken of, this great figure ought not to be forgotten. Some of its effects are bold enough, but never ugly. The beginning of the slow movement, for example, is in a very unexpected mode, the third Gregorian tone, but it immediately changes to a strange mixture of major and minor, which, although strange, is very beautiful. Somehow the older composers did not sacrifice beauty while making experiments.

The Scherzo (almost a Rondo) is not as playful as most Scherzi, but is brusque and bizarre. Brahms and Schumann were not born Scherzo-composers, the one was too phlegmatic, the other too pensive, for dainty merriment. We need scarcely say how well the strongly-contrasted moods of this symphony were brought out. There was perfection of playing, of interpretation, of enjoyment. The Scherzo was the most striking in its performance. It seemed almost like a new movement, although both this and the finale are open to the charge of exaggerated loudness on this occasion. The finale was sometimes blatant.

Wagner's Prelude.

We are going to have a brace of unhappy lovers done in the Italian style, at the opera, on Monday, ("L'Amore di Tre Re") and it was well to anticipate them by a couple of similar unfortunates done in the German manner. But we doubt if Wagner's love opera is essentially Teutonic after all. Any ordinary German would melt at the fervid temperature of "Tristan and Isolde," and this pair are more intense than any Italian hero and heroine yet discovered. The shivers and shudders, the great crescendo, the wonderful climax of this prelude, were given with dramatic effect. Again criticism, in the sense of animadversion, is impossible, but the prelude could have been omitted altogether on account of the length of the programme.

Very few women ought to attempt Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. It is a virile, a masculine work. But Adele aus der Ohe used to do it, and a few other females have won success in it. But no greater success than the lioness of the piano, Teresa Carreno, won yesterday afternoon. This tropical pianist only seems to gain balance and breadth with the years. She was always brilliant, but now there seems a solidity and reserve force combined with this brilliancy which makes Mme. Carreno one of the most attractive pianists of the present age.

The coda of the first movement, in which orchestra and soloist combine in a grand cadenza was very exciting and it was not astonishing to find a great enthusiasm displayed at this obviously artistic work, but the shading of the slow movement, and the ensemble of the finale were certainly as remarkable. It was altogether a most effective interpretation of a classical masterpiece, one of the great piano events of this crowded piano season. The octaves, chords, and runs of the work displayed a great technicist, but back of these there was something more—a great artist and an intelligent student of Beethoven.

Strauss' Masterpiece.

Now followed the masterpiece among modern orchestral works, to give a fitting climax to a concert that was worthy and dignified from the first note to the last. We have had some powerful performances of this composition in Boston in recent years. Mr. Fiedler was especially great in this; and so was Mr. Stransky. Familiarity with it only breeds increased admiration, and the performance yesterday was brilliant and graphic. We cannot but think that Strauss has receded somewhat since this work. He has not been able to rival this overwhelming picture of an awful subject. The triumph over death is as great a sermon in tones as has ever been written. It is euthanasia taught in music. But the great work and its great interpretation did not strike home quite as surely as usual, simply because many auditors had become saturated with music and could absorb no more. One should come fresh and receptive to such a strenuous work, and a Beethoven concerto, plus a Brahms symphony, with some Wagner ecstatics thrown in, is not a good preparation for it.

Dr. Muck must also learn the physical fact that if one tries to pour three pints into a quart bottle something is sure to be wasted.

JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 7.

GREAT OVATION FOR SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Orchestra Gives One of the Best and Longest Programs of Season.

This week's Symphony program is one of the best and longest of the season. The performance yesterday did not end until 4.50—an exceptionally late hour—but the customary exodus before the last number was missed this time, so keen was the general desire to hear the orchestra in a long absent Strauss-tone drama, "Death and Transfiguration." Many women, impatiently or from habit, put their hats on, but they remained to catch the last measures of the thrilling Transfiguration theme.

The ovation given the orchestra after the performance of the fourth Brahms symphony, the first number on the program, might well have been renewed at the close of the concert, for half of the tremendous effect made by the Strauss piece came from the artistic efforts of Dr. Muck and his hundred men and one woman—for yesterday a second harp appeared for the first time this season. Dr. Muck gave a dramatic reading of "Death and Transfiguration"—a clear, well-rounded interpretation, distinguished by keen feeling and unerring taste. Equally notable for its exquisite feeling and brilliant style was the performance of the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

These orchestral triumphs alone would have made the fifteenth matinee one of the extraordinary events of the year; but to heap up an already full measure the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven was given a place on the program, with Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. The audience applauded the veteran pianist liberally.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert, the German lyric soprano, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts. Her first number will be three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" and Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Cascilie." Her second number will be two songs, with orchestra new to Boston—Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Venushymne."

The symphony, which will be the first number on the program, will be Tschaikowsky's in F minor, No. 4. This is the first Tschaikowsky symphony which has appeared on a Symphony program since Dr. Muck's return. The other numbers will be Dukas's amusing scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad."

[illegible] poetical mood [illegible] ter of such themes as the opening theme of the first movement which had not been appreciated before in such a degree.

And for us this is not the least, but perhaps the greatest of the Brahms symphonies. Granted the heroism of the first, the lovely vernal mood of the second, and the romanticism of the third. The fourth towers above them all in its sheer musical quality. A man outlives passions, and the tumult of an existence which draws him into the whirlpool in spite of himself. Sensuous beauty or intellectual asceticism are equally without lasting fascination for him, and if his purpose has been a high one, he steps into a realm where all that has been is fused into a beauty that is not merely sensuous or emotional, or intellectual, but a marvellous essence for which the nearest name is "art." The fourth symphony is the greatest of Brahms works in this form because of them all it is the most impersonal; the purest in its materials, which are cleansed of all earthy tissue; finest in its structure and workmanship. The slow movement is an expression that Brahms exclusively attained, while the final passacaglia becomes more and more, to the hearer, one of the greatest pages in all symphonic literature.

The earlier symphonies of Brahms may perish with the passing of the generations that feel and listen as this one, and possibly the third symphony is a little weak—with all its charm and its opening theme, that is like a bolt from Jove—for a work of such dimensions; but the last symphony is one that is beyond and above changes of fashion or feeling, social or artistic revolutions. It is one of the very few masterpieces that come nearest to the Greek conception of art. The performance is not to be described, any more than the music. Say what we will, the cold print is not a fit medium for the impression given by the masterpiece.

There was then the exceedingly eloquent reading of the "Tristan" Prelude. And Mme. Carreno, who in her interpretation of the concerto stood by Dr. Muck in his reading of the symphony, played the composition, which is to us all too familiar, as one alone with the composer. There are no greater pianists before the public today than Mme. Carreno when she plays such music. And finally, there was the great tone poem. It is a pity that Strauss appears to have forsaken the tremendous sincerity which is found in this music. With all the flaming rhetoric of the modern orchestra, he has said things in this music that sear into the very depths of the conciousness of human beings. That a man could live, after this watch at the portals of life and death seems strange. The music is of such intensity and overwhelming power that the hearer who has passed through the experience before must brace himself for the ordeal that faces him again. And the tumultuous drama of the earlier pages is only matched by the wondrous radiance of the apotheosis. Yesterday two harps added to the splendor and the color of the performance, and it may be said that Dr. Muck's conception of the work is greater than ever before. His was indeed an unforgettable reading; and the concert as a whole, although overlong, one to be remembered in years to come.

FEBRUARY 6,

JOURNAL—FRIDAY.

BOSTON GLOBE

FEBRUARY 7.

REMARKABLE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY MEN

Dr Muck Conducts With Unusual Fire.

Mme Carreno Appears as Soloist in "Emperor" Concerto.

The program of the 14th symphony rehearsal was as follows: Dr Muck conducted, Mme Carreno was soloist.

Brahms..................Symphony No. 4
Wagner.Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"
Beethoven......Concerto No. 5 in E flat
Strauss....."Death and Transfiguration"

The concert was an unusual one even by this incomparable orchestra, and its eminent conductor, Dr Muck, seemed baptized with fire from off some altar which is not wholly common to him. The performances given the symphony and the prelude were overwhelming in their virtuosity and emotional vitality. They alone would have been an ample program. Had they been followed only by the mighty tone poem the latter would have fallen on fresher ears, and its sweeping majesty the better appreciated.

The manner in which Dr Muck read the Brahms symphony and the men responded to him was one not to be forgotten. It was a performance extraordinary for its wonderful, microscopic clarity, for the lucid and just exposition of every thought, for the succession of nuances, by which one passage melted into another, for the searching sense of rhythm and of accent that made the first movement a dramatic scene and gave personality to the subjects contending as protagonists. The unrelenting, heroic conflict assumed its true epic character. It was a battle of souls. The lyric passages sang in due contrast, but the austere, indomitable temper of the work received a wonderful incarnation.

Wagner's immortal music was played as the epitome of the rapture and anguish of human passion. Every value latent in harmonic or orchestral color or in the plasticity and gathering intensity of a phrase or restrained thought seemed to have yielded up its secret. The ascent to the impending yet withheld climax was a masterpiece in emotional suspense. The symphony of tone, its poignancy, the heart quality it gathered and radiated and the lofty spirit of tragic beauty and of reverence that enveloped it—these brought again to mind the pity that such an inspired interpretation must perish into air.

Mme Carreno played as a great artist might play, who long ago had wrested the secrets of technic from the piano, who had learned that to play clearly, with good tone and with a sense of proportion, was the basis of emotional expression, who with the flight of years, with the diminution of physical strength and the fires of youth, had lived more in introspection and in the recreation of the mind and spirit than of the hands, and who now might compress music of long and sacred association into an essence of itself, music which she heard as she used to hear it, music which the audience heard only as an echo of it. The spirit of Beethoven remained and made portions of the first and last movements telling and expressive.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 7,

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Brahms, Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most remarkable concerts in the recent history of a remarkable organization was the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Then Teresa Carreno, pianist, was the soloist—her vehicle, the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, and the orchestral pieces were the 4th symphony of Brahms; the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss.

BRAHMS' GREATEST

In an unusual mood, apparently, Dr. Muck gave memorable performances of these orchestral works. If the second symphony of Brahms is only comparable to the spring, then the fourth is as surely autumnal in its mood, in its harmonies and its orchestral colors, in its suggestion of reverie and of melancholy that is not without joy. There is the thought of the cleanness of nature, and the tang of the air of mountain heights. The contemplative vein of the work is tempered with a splendid, rugged power that Dr. Muck emphasized. Hence the symphony had [illegible] grandeur [illegible], in addition

---

GERMAN PRIMA TO MAKE AMERICAN DEBUT HERE

Mme. Elizabeth

Van Endert,

German Singer,

Who Will

Sing at Symphony

Orchestra

Concert

Here

Next Week.

Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert Will Sing With the Symphony Orchestra Next Week.

By E. F.

MME. ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT, a noted German prima donna, will make her American debut here with the Symphony Orchestra next week. She is coming to America under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, and she will remain in America only a few weeks. Besides singing with the Symphony Orchestra, she will appear as soloist at the Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall on March 1.

Mme. van Endert began her career as a concert singer in 1907. Shortly afterward she became one of the principal lyric sopranos at the Dresden Opera House, and later she sang at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Last summer she left that famous institution, along with many of the other principals, to join the new Charlottenburg opera company in Berlin, which has already eclipsed the [illegible] Opera to some extent.

ADVERTISER.

FEBRUARY 7

FINE PROGRAMME, BUT TOO LONG

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT MUSIC NOBLE

Brahms, Wagner, Beethoven and Strauss, With Mme. Carreno as Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Fourth Symphony. E minor.
Wagner—Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Beethoven—Fifth Piano Concerto. E-flat.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration." Tone Poem.

A great programme from beginning to end, even if somewhat spoiled by its length.

Such noble music made us ponder upon the tonal troubles now descending upon us, and wonder whether composers will ever accept such works as models again. Yet there were different schools and different epochs represented and Strauss and Brahms were as far apart as the poles.

Brahms' fourth symphony is one of the masterpieces that did not go begging in its early days, for the composer received about ten thousand dollars for it. When the wonderful figure-treatment of this symphony is spoken of, this great figure ought not to be forgotten. Some of its effects are bold enough, but never ugly. The beginning of the slow movement, for example, is in a very unexpected mode, the third Gregorian tone, but it immediately changes to a strange mixture of major and minor, which, although strange, is very beautiful. Somehow the older composers did not sacrifice beauty while making experiments.

The Scherzo (almost a Rondo) is not as playful as most Scherzi, but is brusque and bizarre. Brahms and Schumann were not born Scherzo-composers, the one was too phlegmatic, the other too pensive, for dainty merriment. We need scarcely say how well the strongly-contrasted moods of this symphony were brought out. There was perfection of playing, of interpretation, of enjoyment. The Scherzo was the most striking in its performance. It seemed almost like a new movement, although both this and the finale are open to the charge of exaggerated loudness on this occasion. The finale was sometimes blatant.

Wagner's Prelude.

We are going to have a brace of unhappy lovers done in the Italian style, at the opera, on Monday, ("L'Amore di Tre Re") and it was well to anticipate them by a couple of similar unfortunates done in the German manner. But we doubt if Wagner's love opera is essentially Teutonic after all. Any ordinary German would melt at the fervid temperature of "Tristan and Isolde," and this pair are more intense than any Italian hero and heroine yet discovered. The shivers and shudders, the great crescendo, the wonderful climax of this prelude, were given with dramatic effect. Again criticism, in the sense of animadversion, is impossible, but the prelude could have been omitted altogether on account of the length of the programme.

Very few women ought to attempt Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. It is a virile, a masculine work. But Adele aus der Ohe used to do it, and a few other females have won success in it. But no greater success than the lioness of the piano, Teresa Carreno, won yesterday afternoon. This tropical pianist only seems to gain balance and breadth with the years. She was always brilliant, but now there seems a solidity and reserve force combined with this brilliancy which makes Mme. Carreno one of the most attractive pianists of the present age.

The coda of the first movement, in which orchestra and soloist combine in a grand cadenza was very exciting and it was not astonishing to find a great enthusiasm displayed at this obviously artistic work, but the shading of the slow movement, and the ensemble of the finale were certainly as remarkable. It was altogether a most effective interpretation of a classical masterpiece, one of the great piano events of this crowded piano season. The octaves, chords, and runs of the work displayed a great technicist, but back of these there was something more—a great artist and an intelligent student of Beethoven.

Strauss' Masterpiece.

Now followed the masterpiece among modern orchestral works, to give a fitting climax to a concert that was worthy and dignified from the first note to the last. We have had some powerful performances of this composition in Boston in recent years. Mr. Fiedler was especially great in this; and so was Mr. Stransky. Familiarity with it only breeds increased admiration, and the performance yesterday was brilliant and graphic. We cannot but think that Strauss has receded somewhat since this work. He has not been able to rival this overwhelming picture of an awful subject. The triumph over death is as great a sermon in tones as has ever been written. It is euthanasia taught in music. But the great work and its great interpretation did not strike home quite as surely as usual, simply because many auditors had become saturated with music and could absorb no more. One should come fresh and receptive to such a strenuous work, and a Beethoven concerto, plus a Brahms symphony, with some Wagner ecstatics thrown in, is not a good preparation for it.

Dr. Muck must also learn the physical fact that if one tries to pour three pints into a quart bottle something is sure to be wasted.

JOURNAL—

FEBRUARY 7.

GREAT OVATION FOR SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Orchestra Gives One of the Best and Longest Programs of Season.

This week's Symphony program is one of the best and longest of the season. The performance yesterday did not end until 4.50—an exceptionally late hour—but the customary exodus before the last number was missed this time, so keen was the general desire to hear the orchestra in a long absent Strauss-tone drama, "Death and Transfiguration." Many women, impatiently or from habit, put their hats on, but they remained to catch the last measures of the thrilling Transfiguration theme.

The ovation given the orchestra after the performance of the fourth Brahms symphony, the first number on the program, might well have been renewed at the close of the concert, for half of the tremendous effect made by the Strauss piece came from the artistic efforts of Dr. Muck and his hundred men and one woman—for yesterday a second harp appeared for the first time this season. Dr. Muck gave a dramatic reading of "Death and Transfiguration"—a clear, well-rounded interpretation, distinguished by keen feeling and unerring taste. Equally notable for its exquisite feeling and brilliant style was the performance of the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

These orchestral triumphs alone would have made the fifteenth matinee one of the extraordinary events of the year; but to heap up an already full measure the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven was given a place on the program, with Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. The audience applauded the veteran pianist liberally.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert, the German lyric soprano, will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts. Her first number will be three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" and Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Cascilie." Her second number will be two songs, with orchestra new to Boston—Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Venushymne."

The symphony, which will be the first number on the program, will be Tschaikowsky's in F minor, No. 4. This is the first Tschaikowsky symphony which has appeared on a Symphony program since Dr. Muck's return. The other numbers will be Dukas's amusing scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad."

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 7,

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Brahms, Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most remarkable concerts in the recent history of a remarkable organization was the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Then Teresa Carreno, pianist, was the soloist—her vehicle, the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, and the orchestral pieces were the 4th symphony of Brahms; the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss.

BRAHMS' GREATEST

In an unusual mood, apparently, Dr. Muck gave memorable performances of these orchestral works. If the second symphony of Brahms is only comparable to the spring, then the fourth is as surely autumnal in its mood, in its harmonies and its orchestral colors, in its suggestion of reverie and of melancholy that is not without joy. There is the thought of the cleanness of nature, and the tang of the air of mountain heights. The contemplative vein of the work is tempered with a splendid, rugged power that Dr. Muck emphasized. Hence the symphony had a grand [illegible], in addition to its poetical mood and the lyric character of such themes as the opening theme of the first movement which had not been appreciated before in such a degree.

And for us this is not the least, but perhaps the greatest of the Brahms symphonies. Granted the heroism of the first, the lovely vernol mood of the second, and the romanticism of the third. The fourth towers above them all in its sheer musical quality. A man outlives passions, and the tumult of an existence which draws him into the whirlpool in spite of himself. Sensuous beauty or intellectual ascetism are equally without lasting fascination for him, and if his purpose has been a high one, he steps into a realm where all that has been is fused into a beauty that is not merely sensuous or emotional, or intellectual, but a marvellous essence for which the nearest name is "art." The fourth symphony is the greatest of Brahms works in this form because of them all it is the most impersonal; the purest in its materials, which are cleansed of all earthy tissue; finest in its structure and workmanship. The slow movement is an expression that Brahms exclusively attained, while the final passacaglia becomes more and more, to the hearer, one of the greatest pages in all symphonic literature.

The earlier symphonies of Brahms may perish with the passing of the generations that feel and listen as this one, and possibly the third symphony is a little weak—with all its charm and its opening theme, that is like a bolt from Jove—for a work of such dimensions; but the last symphony is one that is beyond and above changes of fashion or feeling, social or artistic revolutions. It is one of the very few masterpieces that come nearest to the Greek conception of art. The performance is not to be described, any more than the music. Say what we will, the cold print is not a fit medium for the impression given by the masterpiece.

There was then the exceedingly eloquent reading of the "Tristan" Prelude. And Mme. Carreno, who in her interpretation of the concerto stood by Dr. Muck in his reading of the symphony, played the composition, which is to us all too familiar, as one alone with the composer. There are no greater pianists before the public today than Mme. Carreno when she plays such music. And finally, there was the great tone poem. It is a pity that Strauss appears to have forsaken the tremendous sincerity which is found in this music. With all the flaming rhetoric of the modern orchestra, he has said things in this music that sear into the very depths of the conciousness of human beings. That a man could live, after this watch at the portals of life and death seems strange. The music is of such intensity and overwhelming power that the hearer who has passed through the experience before must brace himself for the ordeal that faces him again. And the tumultuous drama of the earlier pages is only matched by the wondrous radiance of the apotheosis. Yesterday two harps added to the splendor and the color of the performance, and it may be said that Dr. Muck's conception of the work is greater than ever before. His was indeed an unforgettable reading, and the concert as a whole, although overlong, one to be remembered in years to come.

BOSTON GLOBE

FEBRUARY 7.

REMARKABLE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY MEN

Dr Muck Conducts With Unusual Fire.

Mme Carreno Appears as Soloist in "Emperor" Concerto.

The program of the 14th symphony rehearsal was as follows: Dr Muck conducted, Mme Carreno was soloist.

Brahms..................Symphony No. 4
Wagner. Prelude to "Tristran and Isolde"
Beethoven......Concerto No. 5 in E flat
Strauss....."Death and Transfiguration"

The concert was an unusual one even by this incomparable orchestra, and its eminent conductor, Dr Muck, seemed baptized with fire from off some altar which is not wholly common to him. The performances given the symphony and the prelude were overwhelming in their virtuosity and emotional vitality. They alone would have been an ample program. Had they been followed only by the mighty tone poem the latter would have fallen on fresher ears, and its sweeping majesty the better appreciated.

The manner in which Dr Muck read the Brahms symphony and the men responded to him was one not to be forgotten. It was a performance extraordinary for its wonderful, microscopic clarity, for the lucid and just exposition of every thought, for the succession of nuances, by which one passage melted into another, for the searching sense of rhythm and of accent that made the first movement a dramatic scene and gave personality to the subjects contending as protagonists. The unrelenting, heroic conflict assumed its true epic character. It was a battle of souls. The lyric passages sang in due contrast, but the austere, indomitable temper of the work received a wonderful incarnation.

Wagner's immortal music was played as the epitome of the rapture and anguish of human passion. Every value latent in harmonic or orchestral color or in the plasticity and gathering intensity of a phrase or restrained thought seemed to have yielded up its secret. The ascent to the impending yet withheld climax was a masterpiece in emotional suspense. The symphony of tone, its poignancy, the heart quality it gathered and radiated and the lofty spirit of tragic beauty and of reverence that enveloped it—these brought again to mind the pity that such an inspired interpretation must perish into air.

Mme Carreno played as a great artist might play, who long ago had wrested the secrets of technic from the piano, who had learned that to play clearly, with good tone and with a sense of proportion, was the basis of emotional expression, who with the flight of years, with the diminution of physical strength and the fires of youth, had lived more in introspection and in the recreation of the mind and spirit than of the hands, and who now might compress music of long and sacred association into an essence of itself, music which she heard as she used to hear it, music which the audience heard only as an echo of it. The spirit of Beethoven remained and made portions of the first and last movements telling and expressive.

FEBRUARY 6,

JOURNAL—FRIDAY.

GERMAN PRIMA TO MAKE AMERICAN DEBUT HERE

Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert, German Singer, Who Will Sing at Symphony Orchestra Concert Here Next Week.

Mme. Elizabeth Van Endert Will Sing With the Symphony Orchestra Next Week.

By E. F.

MME. ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT, a noted German prima donna, will make her American debut here with the Symphony Orchestra next week. She is coming to America under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, and she will remain in America only a few weeks. Besides singing with the Symphony Orchestra, she will appear as soloist at the Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall on March 1.

Mme. van Endert began her career as a concert singer in 1907. Shortly afterward she became one of the principal lyric sopranos at the Dresden Opera House, and later she sang at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Last summer she left that famous institution, along with most of the other principals, to join the new Charlottenburg opera company in Berlin, which has already eclipsed the Royal Opera to some extent.

[112]

Courier

MONITOR,
FEBRUARY 7, 1914

[illegible] Carreno, Pianist, Takes Part in Orchestral Concert — Karl Muck Gives Interpretation of Brahms' Fourth Symphony

STRAUSS PRESENTED

The program at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, on Friday afternoon at Symphony hall was as follows: Brahms, symphony in E minor, No 4, op. 98; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"; Beethoven, concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24. The soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno.

For those who recall that this is the first concert of February and that Mme. Carreno made her debut in Boston as a child wonder on Jan. 2, 1863, the day after the "Emancipation Proclamation" went into effect—59 years ago—this program with its remarkable assemblings of musical numbers seemed to be set forth in honor of the two great men and ideals that are celebrated in February by the American people. Two hours and a half were needed for it, and the attentive hearer departed feeling as if he had ranged through a whole world of poetry in thoughtful contemplation of the facts of human experience in the light of noble ideals. It was not a depressing or a sorrowful experience, though the fourth symphony of Brahms, even more than the Strauss tone poem, is sometimes held to be expression of melancholy and worse. Music gives back what is put into it, and what Dr. Muck and his musicians gave and what the audience received was registered in part by the constant unrelenting applause. Mme. Carreno was repeatedly recalled, one felt as a friendly tribute to the stately and gracious woman who celebrates with such lovely art her own fiftieth jubilee.

It was a long time ago that a reviewer of the Symphony concerts demanded for the hall a sign saying "This way out in case of Brahms." It is longer since Wagner and Brahms were supposed by their adherents to be at opposite poles of music—though they were themselves always friendly. It is long since Liszt hailed Brahms as the rising star of romanticism—Brahms the great conserver of classic form. But hearing how the "Tristan" prelude fits into the mood of the Brahms fourth symphony, one gets a new glimpse of the essential unity of all beauty.

Brahms is admitted today a master of orchestration, and he was for a time even pronounced, as some people think Strauss, chiefly interesting because of his unusual combining of instrumental tone. But for his fourth symphony he used a key which opinion names dull and colorless. It is as if he proposed to himself the most difficult task. That he succeeded is shown by the final victory of a work that was at first distrusted by the friends of Brahms and even by himself. The whole is like an autumnal landscape, which for the thoughtful does not have the color of decay but is the resolving harmony of the whole year.

The very changing of the leaves savants today call their maturity or ripeness, not their degeneration. So the quality of this music is deep, thoughtful, not dreary. The first movement has some rich color and the stern beauty of rocky upland places, with the long violet-blue hill lines stretching far away. Dr. Muck's interpretation has more fire than is usually accorded this symphony, which is persistently classed in melancholy moods, yet one felt as if even more brilliance and go on the part of the orchestra would have fully proved of this very movement exactly what is said here: that it is not a scene of desolation and despair, any more than October desolates. The andante was marvelously played and colored, with the softer violet tones prevailing, yet here and there the yearning beauty of the arching sky sung out in the melodies. Melancholy is never the keynote of Brahms' noble art. He seems further from it even than Beethoven, and we know that Beethoven said music should never draw tears but always strike fire.

One may fairly connect the musical thought here with the dramas of Sophocles, read by Brahms during the composition of the symphony. Here is all the [illegible] of the "Antigone," for example, [illegible] crude points of the story left [illegible] advantage of music over drama [illegible] realism disappears under [illegible] on into tone of the human with events. This is [illegible] fure in an opera plots that would be revolting in the theater. So this music seems like the essential beauty of Sophocles' great drama with the horrors left out. The work was played like an instant new revelation of unseen beauty. Once the flute soared over the rest like a bird over brown stubble. It was answered by a deep heart searching melody that was Brahms indeed. In fact, although the program may be interpreted as a reverie on sorry things the exquisite work of the flute in every number was like a voice of insistent hope. It is the painter's "remark," or marginal key-picture of the whole performance.

The "Tristan" prelude tones in perfectly with the Brahms andante. The prelude was played as a marvel of consistent expression. Not one phrase or figure went beyond the control of the quiet baton, as the intermingling voices mounted in beautiful crescendo. Nothing in the whole was permitted to anticipate or take the edge off the closing effect, where the flute tone rays clear as a star.

Mme. Carreno's Beethoven is her own, and her playing opposite the great orchestra was a most interesting study in antitheses. She plays Beethoven tenderly, romantically, with nuance and rubato, much as she plays Chopin, in fact. The orchestra plays him as Beethoven. In a gay moment of the dance Mme. Carreno let go in a gracious abandon that was answered by the orchestra like a portly and dignified gentleman startled suddenly into prancing youth by an enthusiastic girl. Her phrases of single tones over the staccato accompaniment of the strings were notable for what was read into the simple passages. Here again the flute spoke out in a bit of dialogue with the piano.

The concerto may be long, but as given here it did not seem so. It was full of interesting lights and shades and subtleties which one had not suspected before in Beethoven. It is something to discover Beethoven anew, even if the performance seem a little what the painting cult call "niggled." It lacked unity. It is interesting, by the way, in accounting of Mme. Carreno in this program, to recall that it was the Emperor of Brazil, neighbor of Mme. Carreno's Venezuela, who encouraged the composition of "Tristan und Isolde" once by ordering an opera of Richard Wagner when there were few so rich to do him reverence.

The "Tod und Verklaerung" was another piece of consistent orchestra playing. It began like a breath out of nowhere. One heard it and did not. And from that wonderful beginning the whole grew and poised in perfect balance of line and color. Here again the flute has its silver song of promise. The perfectly studied proportion here prevented any sense of gloomy length. This one of the two or three noblest works of Strauss. It has no despair in it. It is all "transfiguration." It is worthy of note that this composer also has lent himself to the influence of the Greek dramatists and has felt the ennobling grandeur of a thought that contemplates from a high vantage point facts of man and nature and human life.

SUNDAY HERALD, BRUARY 8, 1914.

SEVEN YEARS ON STAGE NEVER IN SMALL PART

Mme. Elizabeth Boehm Van Endert, Who Will Sing Here.

By KATHARINE WRIGHT.

"I have never taken a small part."

This remarkable admission was smilingly made the other day by Mme. Elizabeth Boehm Van Endert, the charming German soprano, who will make her first appearance in America at the Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

Mme. Van Endert is youthful, even girlish, in appearance. She is a tall, slender blonde, with small, delicately moulded features and a general air of elegance and distinction. Her face, not unlike Mme. Culp's, has more animation than the average German singing woman's. She is vivacious in conversation. Her clothes are in good taste and well put on.

"Yes," continued the singer with considerable pride, "although my career began only seven years ago, I have never appeared in a small part.

"I was born in Dusseldorf and, while my father and mother are German, I had a French grandmother. My other relations are Dutch."

Mme. Van Endert went to school in England when she was 13 years old. It was then that she acquired her excellent knowledge of the English language, while she is equally familiar with French and Italian.

After studying with Dr. Richard Mueller and Mme. Pashallis-Souvester, the singer was fortunate in obtaining an immediate engagement at the Dresden Opera House, where in 1907 she took the parts of Elsa and Marguerite. In 1910 she signed a contract with the Royal Opera House at Berlin. Her repertoire was further increased by appearances as Elizabeth, Eva, Mignon, Pamina and Octavian in "Der Rosenkavalier." She created this part in Berlin, and has since appeared in it over 50 times.

"It has been my habit," went on the singer, "to devote my customary six weeks holiday to a concert tour. I enjoy this work almost as much as singing in opera, and it gives a greater opportunity to display pure technic.

"I like German songs above all others, and I think that songs and operas should always be sung in the language in which they were written.

"My favorite composers are, perhaps, Brahms, Wolff, Shubert and Schumann.

"French songs also appeal to me, especially those by Charpentier and Debussy. As a rule, however, I think they are rather thankless for a singer. They depend solely upon mood, and should be sung in a small hall to an understanding audience."

Mme. Van Endert has sung with many distinguished conductors, Dr. Muck, Nikisch, Mengelberg, Schuch, Steinbach. She speaks highly of Mr. Bodansky at Manheim, who shows much youthful talent.

15TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, will be given on Friday afternoon, Feb. 13, and Saturday evening, Feb. 14, will mark the first appearance not only in Boston but in America of Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, one of the foremost of the younger generation of German lyric sopranos. She has come to America under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, to stay only a few weeks, in which time she will sing in several concerts with the Symphony Orchestra, give a concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 1, and sing with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in St. Louis. After these few engagements she will return to her duties as principal lyric soprano of the New Opera House in Charlottenburg, Berlin.

She is young and attractive, and her career began in 1907 as a concert singer. After a year of this work she was for two years one of the principal lyric sopranos of the Dresden Opera and for three years held a similar place in the Royal Opera, Berlin. This last engagement she gave up last summer to join the New Opera in Charlottenburg.

At the concerts this week she will sing twice. Her first numbers will be three songs with orchestra—Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" and Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Afterward two songs with orchestra, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and the second, d'Albert's "Venushymae."

The symphony will be Tschalkowsky's in F minor, No. 4. This is the first of Tschaikowsky's symphonies on Symphony program since Dr. Muck's return. The other pieces will be Dukas's scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the overture "The Barber of Bagdad."

[113]

RECORD,
FEBRUARY 7

CARRENO SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Fourth Symphony. E minor.
Wagner—Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Beethoven—Fifth Piano Concerto. E-flat. Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration." Tone Poem.

A great programme from beginning to end, even if somewhat spoiled by its length.

Such noble music made us ponder upon the tonal troubles now descending upon us, and wonder whether composers will ever accept such works as models again. Yet there were different schools and different epochs represented and Strauss and Brahms were as far apart as the poles, says Louis C. Elson in the Advertiser in his Symphony review.

Brahms' fourth symphony is one of the masterpieces that did not go begging in its early days, for the composer received about ten thousand dollars for it. When the wonderful figure-treatment of this symphony is spoken of, this great figure ought not to be forgotten. Some of its effects are bold enough, but never ugly. The beginning of the slow movement, for example, is in a very unexpected mode, the third Gregorian tone, but it immediately changes to a strange mixture of major and minor, which, although strange, is very beautiful. Somehow the older composers did not sacrifice beauty while making experiments.

The Scherzo (almost a Rondo) is not as playful as most Scherzi, but is brusque and bizarre. Brahms and Schumann were not born Scherzo-composers, the one was too phlegmatic, the other too pensive, for dainty merriment. We need scarcely say how well the strongly-contrasted moods of this symphony were brought out. There was perfection of playing, of interpretation, of enjoyment. The Scherzo was the most striking in its performance. It seemed almost like a new movement, although both this and the finale are open to the charge of exaggerated loudness on this occasion. The finale was sometimes blatant.

Very few women ought to attempt Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. It is a virile, a masculine work. But Adele aus der Ohe used to do it, and a few other females have won success in it. But no greater success than the lioness of the piano, Teresa Carreno, won yesterday afternoon. This tropical pianist only seems to gain balance and breadth with the years. She was always brilliant, but now there seems a solidity and reserve force combined with this brilliancy which makes Mme. Carreno one of the most attractive pianists of the present age.

Now followed the masterpiece among modern orchestral works, to give a fitting climax to a concert that was worthy and dignified from the first note to the last. We have had some powerful performances of this composition in Boston in recent years. Mr. Fiedler was especially great in this; and so was Mr. Stransky. Familiarity with it only breeds increased admiration, and the performance yesterday was brilliant and graphic. We cannot but think that Strauss has receded somewhat since this work. He has not been able to rival this overwhelming picture of an awful subject. The triumph over death is as great a sermon in tones as has ever been written. It is euthanasia taught in music. But the great work and its great interpretation did not strike home quite as surely as usual, simply because many auditors had become saturated with music and could absorb no more. One should come fresh and receptive to such a strenuous work, and a Beethoven concerto, plus a Brahms symphony, with some Wagner ecstatics thrown in, is not a good preparation for it.

Dr. Muck must also learn the physical fact that if one tries to pour three pints into a quart bottle something is sure to be wasted.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 7, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF THREE-FOLD MIRACLE

Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Outdo Themselves—Brahms's Fourth Symphony, the Prelude to "Tristan" and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" as Never Here Before—Mme. Carreno's Interlude

INTO the Symphony Concert yesterday, alike into conductor, orchestra and audience came something very like inspiration. Twice or thrice last year in the final concerts of the spring it similarly descended upon the gray spaces of Symphony Hall. This year, they that people it on Friday afternoons have waited long for another descent of the divine fire. At last it came and as though to make amends for the waiting, in deeper and more glowing measure than for many a day. Dr. Muck keeps the level of his conducting surprisingly high and even. He never slights; he never flags; his mind and imagination, his musical instinct, his tonal sense, his revealing and transmitting personal force are always and entirely at the service of the music that he plays, of the band that he conducts, of the audience to which he ministers. They are very full [illegible] years of ex[illegible] Dr. Muck[illegible] nical necessity, sensitive [illegible] every musical requirement [illegible] has gone forward as never before, [illegible] expressive eloquence that humanizes, dramatizes and poetizes the music that it plays. Its virtuosity and its sensibility are the servants of its mind, its imagination, its passion, enkindled by the composer's and the conductor's will. As for the audience, it may not sit week after week under such conducting and such playing and not have its mind quickened, its perceptions sharpened, its emotions stirred, its sense of beauty and power in music and performance enriched until it becomes in listening spirit almost at one with Dr. Muck and his men.

"The readiness is all" and weekly that readiness awaits those descents of the divine fire that make the Pentecostal days of concerts. Yesterday it came upon conductor and orchestra and through them upon an audience that listened rapt and translated into the music that it heard. Under Dr. Muck's hand that music spoke with an eloquence that a Brahms and a Strauss—if not a Wagner—may hardly have suspected that they had put into it. To an inspiration that may have composed, he added an inspiration that surely revealed, enhanced and glorified. The music lived not merely in its own, but in transfigured, image. About the image, illuminating it, burned the divine fire. From the conductor, it echoed his orchestra; from both it permeated the audience. For once we men and women in this Boston, of February, 1914, sat as gods taking our pleasure. It was hard to believe that even after two hours and a quarter the concerto was done. Long after the glow of it lingered; longer still will be the memory.

It is an old story that Dr. Muck has the divination that discovers—it knows not how—the pace at which music discloses itself in whatever character and with whatever beauty and power the composer has clothed it; that he has a like divination for rhythm; that he sees deeply and luminously into the form and the substance of music; that he is master of the unfolding of both without break or hindrance to their flow and without an instant dulling of the mood or passion, the thought or the vision that has called them forth; that he is no less master of all the arts of modulation, progression, contrast and climax; and that his sensibility to the qualities and adjustments of the revealing tone goes hand in hand with equal sensibility to the matter and the mood of the revelation. It is as old a story that the men of the orchestra under Dr. Muck's hand play not only as virtuosi but as the living voices of the music, apprehending it with a common and quickened intelligence and feeling it with a common and imparting passion. The day to analyze and catalogue the attributes of Dr. Muck and the orchestra is nearly past. Their hearers know them now by the works in which they are hidden. The splendor of the achievement dazzles even the glory of the means.

It was so yesterday with the last of Brahms's symphonies—the symphony in E minor. The ear heard the quick pace, the elastic energy of transition, the clear projection of melody and phrase, the pitching rhythm, the sober glow of instrumental and harmonic color with which conductor and orchestra filled it. So heard, it rose in line upon line upon the understanding as by a magic of tonal architecture. The song of the second movement seemed to weave itself out of nervous and glowing strands; the deep-voiced 'cellos welled upward into it; the flutes added their arabesques; the horns their golden shadows. The whole music ran forward in intensified and suffused beauty. The little scherzo smiled along its gay and bustling course out of the gravity of the whole. The brass flamed through the finale; the drum beats were eloquent; the strings gained new intensities; steadily the music gathered force; out of its rising and falling tumult it ended as in grandeur.

The ear heard, the mind understood; and through the hearing and the understanding came new imaginings and deeper emotions, which were really the miracle that Dr. Muck and the orchestra wrought with the symphony. It may be that Brahms wrote it, as some of the commentators say, with the dread of death or this or that other thought and mood haunting his mind. It may even be, though the notion is highly improbable that he wrote it as proof of his mature skill in the invention and the manipulation of music. Of old some conductors used to play the symphony as though it had been written by such a musico-mathematical process. Yesterday, as "absolute music" should, it spoke for itself in emotions that the music and the performance kindled and with no suggestion of the means that blew and sustained the flame. The recurring melody of the first allegro sufficed in its grave beauty; its course through the music was the emotion of tones in many kinds. The harmonic and the instrumental color made it like a silver-gray tapestry. Grave longing beautified by the depth of the emotion and calling upon the beauty of tones to set it free and enrich it at each new turn of meditation filled the andante. The scherzo spoke its own mood and warmed its hearers. The finale waxed in the power that out of tumult brings exaltation and holds it close to grandeur. Passionate energy may be grave and deep as well as high and fiery; reflection as well as emotion may flower into the beauties of music. It was so that Dr. Muck played Brahms's fourth symphony as never here it has been played before.

It is the custom to glorify Wagner's "Tristan" as an opera, because the music is concerned much with the expression of inner moods and passions and little with the denotement of external action. It is also the custom of many a conductor to play The Prelude as though it were a vivid cinematograph of erotic emotion, set on the house tops for the gaping eyes of those that like that sort of thing. It is also another custom to play it as so much exuberant tonal rhetoric and effect. Dr. Muck took the finer and the truer way. The Prelude is the music of fated desire mounting until the ecstasy stills and floods the foreboding and then descending until passion and pain seem to burn out their own fires. It is intrinsically the music of the night, the solitude, the surrender to fate and longing in the garden. It is all [illegible] of the finest intensities that must [illegible] out of it, that must rise [illegible] To [illegible] miracle of Dr. Muck [illegible] was an orchestra ninety [illegible] it sound like the two voices in the garden but the richer, the deeper, the softer since many instruments now spoke in them. The phrases of boding, the phrases of longing rose each upon each with a more poignant intensity. (The feat of gradation in the tone was hidden in the answering emotion that it wrought.) As whispers deepen and thrill into low and passionate speech so was the advance of the music of desire. Higher and higher, deeper and deeper beat its intensity, less in the nervous excitement of a Wagnerian progression than in the poignancy of the passion and the pain. It was the height and depth of desire in the music and not the amplitude and the force that wrought the climax as in an instant of gleaming culmination, as though the deep mass of tone glowed for the moment and then was shadowed again. The elate desire died; the agony softened; and the music fell away in phrases that darkened and grew still as the phrases of the advance had brightened and grown poignant. The one feat of imaginative gradation was the complement of the other. For once The Prelude to "Tristan," even in a concert hall had come out of the garden.

Between this miracle and the third miracle that was to come stood Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for interlude. It might have been a miracle too had the Carreno of her ripest years sat at the piano. In those days she has played it as Dr. Muck had played Brahms's symphony and Wagner's prelude and as he was to play Strauss's tone-poem. Like ghosts that she was calling from the music and piano rose yesterday the grandiose and glowing design into which she used to fashion the concerto; the splendors of tone that she could then spread over it; the fire of recreative passion which made the long first movement seem like ardent improvisation; the depth of serene feeling in which she used to clothe the slow song; the rhapsodic brilliant that of old flamed out of the finale. Then the concerto was less "Emperor" than Empress. The years' subdue power, dim fire, and still passion and without all three, a pianist may not play this music, least of all when an excited orchestra behind is aglow with the beauty of its own surging and straining for its smoking finale over propulsive force and brilliance under the leash in which the discerning and considerate conductor—for Dr. Muck can be such—was holding it. There are light and delicate passages in the concerto that Mme. Carreno still plays in exquisite tracery of beautiful tone. She has her moments of song that is still melting and golden. The old fire did flicker out of the finale. But the intensity and the power that the music demands are no longer in her—she that once could play this music of, G, and for men so that no hint of the weaker sex clouded it.

Then to the crowning miracle of a miraculous day. Dr. Muck may judge Strauss's tone--poems as he will; but not one of the devoted and specializing conductors play them as does he. In his first time here, he gave the "Sinfonia Domestica," a power—and also a beauty—with which scarcely another conductor can clothe it. His version of "Don Juan" is a flaming fire of picture and passion. His "Til Eulenspeigel" is the rogue and his adventures—the spirit and the pity of them—alive in tones even beyond Strauss's imagining. And so, yesterday, he made "Death and Transfiguration" transcend itself. There was the music opened as never here it has been opened; every structural line, in every interplay of thematic idea and tonal deliniation; in every suggestion of harmonic or instrumental stroke; in every adjustment of detail and means to large and passionate design. So played, Strauss's tone-poems would have been thrilling to hear as "absolute music," all sinewy mastery, constant resource and passionate and propulsive power.

Mme. van Endert Talks of Her Art

The New Singer of Next Week's Symphony Concerts

IT is an eternal controversy how much the personality (the real personality) of an artist has to do with his work. But in the deepest sense his personality must have everything to do with it, for his work is the product of his personality. And the chief reason why we have so much artistic work that is so little artistic is that the artists have little human personality. Artistic personality they may have in abundance. That is to no small extent the achievement of the press agent. It can largely be learned from an accredited teacher, as much of the routine matter of acting can be learned. But the personality that produces artistic results—results which will stand all artistic tests that can be put upon them—is the human, extra-artistic personality. The way an artist reacts to his cook will condition to a great extent the way he will react to Schumann. For the personality is only the inner person in its external relations. "Stage personality" is only a partial, and often a manufactured thing. An artist's real personality is that part of him by virtue of which he would be comparable with any blacksmith or shoemaker.

In the deeper meaning of personality—personality which presupposes ability to react most efficiently to every sort of environment—the Germans are probably the most civilized nation on earth. And this civilization came to flower in the German culture long before it came to flower in German politics. Hans Sachs preceded Bismarck by many centuries. German art was a thing of international importance when German foreign policy was a wagging of the tongue among the nations. And now, when German foreign policy makes all nations tremble, German civilization stands far above it, including all its world vision, and excluding most of its provincial prejudice. The German, from whatever social class he comes, is essentially a democrat. He sees personal worth as the flower and service of social worth. He may criticize the lower classes; he does not in his heart look down upon them. He, [illegible] note of the [illegible] fashion, was the [illegible] costu[illegible] it into his [illegible] more than any other man [illegible] show a side to every good thing [illegible] to meet him, and place himself in accurate adjustment with his environment, wherever he finds himself. And because the German artist is a part of the German people, he is able to such a remarkable extent to be all things to all men, and to express all the profundity and light and shade of human life.

In all this hearty praise of the German personality, Mme. Elizabeth van Endert must share in particular, as a part of German culture. She would be the first to feel that it is German culture which sheds glory upon her, rather than that it is she who sheds glory upon German culture. She went to London and loved it, yet not as our American Anglo-maniacs do—defending English architecture because of its "literary associations" nor fulminating against it, as a Frenchman might do, because of its bourgeois stolidity. Like a true German she discriminated; the architecture was "schauderhaft" (eternal and noble truth!); but its life—that was very interesting. And this discrimination, this sense of the good that is good wherever it is found, one feels is in her art.

She is thoroughly German. She has sung Strauss innumerable times, and last year sang Pamina in "Die Zauberflöte" more than fifty times. Her song repertory is almost entirely German. Every sort of emotion and feeling is represented in German song literature and she has not gone outside it to any great extent. But she is curious about Scandinavian song-literature and would like to study it to find new songs. She admires and feels that she understands Debussy, yet cannot feel a personal reaction to him. She frankly does not understand Schönberg but would like to hear him more and try to.—All genuinely German!

There is in her personality the "solidity" which is German. We are apt to associate solidity with stolidity, for no other reason than that the words sound alike. But solidity means such a grounding that all things are possible. This is the grounding of the German education, which results in an equal appreciation of the "Æneid" and "Du Bist wie eine Blume." It is the grounding of a Bach-Beethoven-Brahms musical education, which results in Strauss, Reger, and Humperdinck, and in all manner of light and shade.

This "solidity" can be tested out in the most concrete terms. For instance, Mme. van Endert is grounded, as every good singer is, in correct tone placing. It is the sort of tone which will give color, variety and feeling to "Blute nur, Liebes Herz,' and fire and passion to Salome's soliloquy. It can be applied with equal success to any sort of musical situation, just as the German personality can be applied to any sort of human situation. Mme. van Endert sings in both small halls and in large. It is the same problem at bottom, she says. No matter how large the hall, if the tone is rightly placed it will carry. The pianissimo in Brahms's "Wiegenlied" is just as proper to a large hall as to a small one. Stolidity, then, would say that the problem was the same in both cases. It is obviously not the same, but the variation lies not in the vocal method to be used, but in the personal equation—the "Stimmung." Mme. van Endert will not choose the sort of song for three hundred people that she would choose for three thousand. She is the same artist in both cases. She only gives a different human message according to the different condition.

Her musical career has been an unusual one—thanks to unusual endowments—for she had an engagement the first year of her public life, at the Dresden Royal Opera House, one of the three best in the world, and went from there directly to the Kaiser's own opera house in Berlin. But most singers—and many of the best—do not start that way. And here the wonderful efficiency of the German system of production comes in. For Germany is filled with opera houses—one in every town of moderate size, institutions which often get along with modest enough talents, but manage to use all that they have to the fullest extent, and to appreciate, heartily and sincerely, what is given them, without at the same time losing the active criticism which makes an audience creative. In these small opera houses, says Mme. van Endert, is the most efficient training for the young singer that the world affords. After the grounding—the tone placing and the physical development of the vocal organs—has been finished, what the singer needs is wide and varied activity, a chance to develop herself and her powers in all possible relations, and before all possible audiences. This is furnished at its best by the German opera system. A singer can make her début in a very small opera house, if her voice is yet small in size, and the prevailing situation makes it difficult to find a better opening. She need not fear that she will be submerged here all her life, if she have the ability to advance. What she has will be appreciated; what she has not she will be given a chance to develop. The constant interchange of singers among the opera houses, the guest nights, the vigorous rivalry, all give the singer the utmost chance to make herself known to audiences and managers, and to retain for herself all the advantages which she is able to lay hands on. This again is only one more evidence of civilization (it is a convenient word), which means that the masses are able to receive from the most able individuals, and that the most able individuals have in them something from the masses.

This is the civilization which one feels is Mme. van Endert's, as she drinks her tea and chats about Germany. It is a civilization which is as yet essentially lacking in snobbish America, and which exists and has always existed in aristocratic Germany. And one feels certain that there is this civilization, translated into artistic terms, in Mme. van Endert's art.

H. K. M.

RECORD.

FEBRUARY 7

CARRENO SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

PROGRAMME.

Brahms—Fourth Symphony. E minor.
Wagner—Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Beethoven—Fifth Piano Concerto. E-flat.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration." Tone Poem.

A great programme from beginning to end, even if somewhat spoiled by its length.

Such noble music made us ponder upon the tonal troubles now descending upon us, and wonder whether composers will ever accept such works as models again. Yet there were different schools and different epochs represented and Strauss and Brahms were as far apart as the poles, says Louis C. Elson in the Advertiser in his Symphony review.

Brahms' fourth symphony is one of the masterpieces that did not go begging in its early days, for the composer received about ten thousand dollars for it. When the wonderful figure-treatment of this symphony is spoken of, this great figure ought not to be forgotten. Some of its effects are bold enough, but never ugly. The beginning of the slow movement, for example, is in a very unexpected mode, the third Gregorian tone, but it immediately changes to a strange mixture of major and minor, which, although strange, is very beautiful. Somehow the older composers did not sacrifice beauty while making experiments.

The Scherzo (almost a Rondo) is not as playful as most Scherzi, but is brusque and bizarre. Brahms and Schumann were not born Scherzo-composers, the one was too phlegmatic, the other too pensive, for dainty merriment. We need scarcely say how well the strongly-contrasted moods of this symphony were brought out. There was perfection of playing, of interpretation, of enjoyment. The Scherzo was the most striking in its performance. It seemed almost like a new movement, although both this and the finale are open to the charge of exaggerated loudness on this occasion. The finale was sometimes blatant.

Very few women ought to attempt Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. It is a virile, a masculine work. But Adele aus der Ohe used to do it, and a few other females have won success in it. But no greater success than the lioness of the piano, Teresa Carreno, won yesterday afternoon. This tropical pianist only seems to gain balance and breadth with the years. She was always brilliant, but now there seems a solidity and reserve force combined with this brilliancy which makes Mme. Carreno one of the most attractive pianists of the present age.

Now followed the masterpiece among modern orchestral works, to give a fitting climax to a concert that was worthy and dignified from the first note to the last. We have had some powerful performances of this composition in Boston in recent years. Mr. Fiedler was especially great in this; and so was Mr. Stransky. Familiarity with it only breeds increased admiration, and the performance yesterday was brilliant and graphic. We cannot but think that Strauss has receded somewhat since this work. He has not been able to rival this overwhelming picture of an awful subject. The triumph over death is as great a sermon in tones as has ever been written. It is euthanasia taught in music. But the great work and its great interpretation did not strike home quite as surely as usual, simply because many auditors had become saturated with music and could absorb no more. One should come fresh and receptive to such a strenuous work, and a Beethoven concerto, plus a Brahms symphony, with some Wagner ecstatics thrown in, is not a good preparation for it.

Dr. Muck must also learn the physical fact that if one tries to pour three pints into a quart bottle something is sure to be wasted.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 7, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF THREE-FOLD MIRACLE

Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Outdo Themselves—Brahms's Fourth Symphony, the Prelude to "Tristan" and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" as Never Here Before—Mme. Carreno's Interlude

INTO the Symphony Concert yesterday, alike into conductor, orchestra and audience came something very like inspiration. Twice or thrice last year in the final concerts of the spring it similarly descended upon the gray spaces of Symphony Hall. This year, they that people it on Friday afternoons have waited long for another descent of the divine fire. At last it came and as though to make amends for the waiting, in deeper and more glowing measure than for many a day. Dr. Muck keeps the level of his conducting surprisingly high and even. He never slights; he never flags; his mind and imagination, his musical instinct, his tonal sense, his revealing and transmitting personal force are always and entirely at the service of the music that he plays, of the band that he conducts, of the audience to which he ministers. They are very full [illegible] years of existence. Master of every technical necessity, sensitive and supple to every musical requirement, it has gone forward as never before, to an expressive eloquence that humanizes, dramatizes and poetizes the music that it plays. Its virtuosity and its sensibility are the servants of its mind, its imagination, its passion, enkindled by the composer's and the conductor's will. As for the audience, it may not sit week after week under such conducting and such playing and not have its mind quickened, its perceptions sharpened, its emotions stirred, its sense of beauty and power in music and performance enriched until it becomes in listening spirit almost at one with Dr. Muck and his men.

"The readiness is all" and weekly that readiness awaits those descents of the divine fire that make the Pentecostal days of concerts. Yesterday it came upon conductor and orchestra and through them upon an audience that listened rapt and translated into the music that it heard. Under Dr. Muck's hand that music spoke with an eloquence that a Brahms and a Strauss—if not a Wagner—may hardly have suspected that they had put into it. To an inspiration that may have composed, he added an inspiration that surely revealed, enhanced and glorified. The music lived not merely in its own, but in transfigured, image. About the image, illuminating it, burned the divine fire. From the conductor, it echoed his orchestra; from both it permeated the audience. For once we men and women in this Boston of February, 1914, sat as gods taking our pleasure. It was hard to believe that even after two hours and a quarter the concerto was done. Long after the glow of it lingered; longer still will be the memory.

It is an old story that Dr. Muck has the divination that discovers—it knows not how—the pace at which music discloses itself in whatever character and with whatever beauty and power the composer has clothed it; that he has a like divination for rhythm; that he sees deeply and luminously into the form and the substance of music; that he is master of the unfolding of both without break or hindrance to their flow and without an instant dulling of the mood or passion, the thought or the vision that has called them forth; that he is no less master of all the arts of modulation, progression, contrast and climax; and that his sensibility to the qualities and adjustments of the revealing tone goes hand in hand with equal sensibility to the matter and the mood of the revelation. It is as old a story that the men of the orchestra under Dr. Muck's hand play not only as virtuosi but as the living voices of the music, apprehending it with a common and quickened intelligence and feeling it with a common and imparting passion. The day to analyze and catalogue the attributes of Dr. Muck and the orchestra is nearly past. Their hearers know them now by the works in which they are hidden. The splendor of the achievement dazzles even the glory of the means.

It was so yesterday with the last of Brahms's symphonies—the symphony in E minor. The ear heard the quick pace, the elastic energy of transition, the clear projection of melody and phrase, the pitching rhythm, the sober glow of instrumental and harmonic color with which conductor and orchestra filled it. So heard, it rose in line upon line upon the understanding as by a magic of tonal architecture. The song of the second movement seemed to weave itself out of nervous and glowing strands; the deep-voiced 'cellos welled upward into it; the flutes added their arabesques; the horns their golden shadows. The whole music ran forward in intensified and suffused beauty. The little scherzo smiled along its gay and bustling course out of the gravity of the whole. The brass flamed through the finale; the drum beats were eloquent; the strings gained new intensities; steadily the music gathered force; out of its rising and falling tumult it ended as in grandeur.

The ear heard, the mind understood; and through the hearing and the understanding came new imaginings and deeper emotions, which were really the miracle that Dr. Muck and the orchestra wrought with the symphony. It may be that Brahms wrote it, as some of the commentators say, with the dread of death or this or that other thought and mood haunting his mind. It may even be, though the notion is highly improbable that he wrote it as proof of his mature skill in the invention and the manipulation of music. Of old some conductors used to play the symphony as though it had been written by such a musico-mathematical process. Yesterday, as "absolute music" should, it spoke for itself in emotions that the music and the performance kindled and with no suggestion of the means that blew and sustained the flame. The recurring melody of the first allegro sufficed in its grave beauty; its course through the music was the emotion of tones in many kinds. The harmonic and the instrumental color made it like a silver-gray tapestry. Grave longing beautified by the depth of the emotion and calling upon the beauty of tones to set it free and enrich it at each new turn of meditation filled the andante. The scherzo spoke its own mood and warmed its hearers. The finale waxed in the power that out of tumult brings exaltation and holds it close to grandeur. Passionate energy may be grave and deep as well as high and fiery; reflection as well as emotion may flower into the beauties of music. It was so that Dr. Muck played Brahms's fourth symphony as never here it has been played before.

It is the custom to glorify Wagner's "Tristan" as an opera, because the music is concerned much with the expression of inner moods and passions and little with the denotement of external action. It is also the custom of many a conductor to play The Prelude as though it were a vivid cinematograph of erotic emotion, set on the house tops for the gaping eyes of those that like that sort of thing. It is also another custom to play it as so much exuberant tonal rhetoric and effect. Dr. Muck took the finer and the truer way. The Prelude is the music of fated desire mounting until the ecstasy stills and floods the foreboding and then descending until passion and pain seem to burn out their own fires. It is intrinsically the music of the night, the solitude, the surrender to fate and longing in the garden. It is all [illegible] of the finest intensities that must [illegible] out of it that must rise [illegible]

To play The Prelude [illegible] miracle of Dr. Muck's [illegible] Behind him was an orchestra ninety strong. He made it sound like the two voices in the garden, but the richer, the deeper, the softer since many instruments now spake in them. The phrases of boding, the phrases of longing rose each upon each with a more poignant intensity. (The feat of gradation in the tone was hidden in the answering emotion that it wrought.) As whispers deepen and thrill into low and passionate speech so was the advance of the music of desire. Higher and higher, deeper and deeper beat its intensity, less in the nervous excitement of a Wagnerian progression than in the poignancy of the passion and the pain. It was the height and depth of desire in the music and not the amplitude and the force that wrought the climax as in an instant of gleaming culmination, as though the deep mass of tone glowed for the moment and then was shadowed again. The elate desire died; the agony softened; and the music fell away in phrases that darkened and grew still as the phrases of the advance had brightened and grown poignant. The one feat of imaginative gradation was the complement of the other. For once The Prelude to "Tristan," even in a concert hall had come out of the garden.

Between this miracle and the third miracle that was to come stood Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for interlude. It might have been a miracle too had the Carreno of her ripest years sat at the piano. In those days she has played it as Dr. Muck had played Brahms's symphony and Wagner's prelude and as he was to play Strauss's tone-poem. Like ghosts that she was calling from the music and piano rose yesterday the grandiose and glowing design into which she used to fashion the concerto; the splendors of tone that she could then spread over it; the fire of recreative passion which made the long first movement seem like ardent improvisation; the depth of serene feeling in which she used to clothe the slow song; the rhapsodic brilliant that of old flamed out of the finale. Then the concerto was less "Emperor" than Empress. The years' subdue power, dim fire, and still passion and without all three, a pianist may not play this music, least of all when an excited orchestra behind is aglow with the beauty of its own surging and straining for its smoking finals over propulsive force and brilliance under the leash in which the discerning and considerate conductor—for Dr. Muck can be such—was holding it. There are light and delicate passages in the concerto that Mme. Carreno still plays in exquisite tracery of beautiful tone. She has her moments of song that is still melting and golden. The old fire did flicker out of the finale. But the intensity and the power that the music demands are no longer in her—she that once could play this music of, G, and for men so that no hint of the weaker sex clouded it.

Then to the crowning miracle of a miraculous day. Dr. Muck may judge Strauss's tone--poems as he will; but not one of the devoted and specializing conductors play them as does he. In his first time here, he gave the "Sinfonia Domestica," a power—and also a beauty—with which scarcely another conductor can clothe it. His version of "Don Juan" is a flaming fire of picture and passion. His "Til Eulenspeigel" is the rogue and his adventures—the spirit and the pity of them—alive in tones even beyond Strauss's imagining. And so, yesterday, he made "Death and Transfiguration" transcend itself. There was the music opened as never here it has been opened; every structural line, in every interplay of thermatic idea and tonal deliniation; in every suggestion of harmonic or instrumental stroke; in every adjustment of detail and means to large and passionate design. So played, Strauss's tone-poems would have been thrilling to hear as "absolute music," all sinewy mastery, constant resource and passionate and propulsive power.

Mme. van Endert Talks of Her Art

The New Singer of Next Week's Symphony Concerts

IT is an eternal controversy how much the personality (the real personality) of an artist has to do with his work. But in the deepest sense his personality must have everything to do with it, for his work is the product of his personality. And the chief reason why we have so much artistic work that is so little artistic is that the artists have little human personality. Artistic personality they may have in abundance. That is to no small extent the achievement of the press agent. It can largely be learned from an accredited teacher, as much of the routine matter of acting can be learned. But the personality that produces artistic results—results which will stand all artistic tests that can be put upon them—is the human, extra-artistic personality. The way an artist reacts to his cook will condition to a great extent the way he will react to Schumann. For the personality is only the inner person in its external relations. "Stage personality" is only a partial, and often a manufactured thing. An artist's real personality is that part of him by virtue of which he would be comparable with any blacksmith or shoemaker.

In the deeper meaning of personality—personality which presupposes ability to react most efficiently to every sort of environment—the Germans are probably the most civilized nation on earth. And this civilization came to flower in the German culture long before it came to flower in German politics. Hans Sachs preceded Bismarck by many centuries. German art was a thing of international importance when German foreign policy was a wagging of the tongue among the nations. And now, when German foreign policy makes all nations tremble, German civilization stands far above it, including all its world vision, and excluding most of its provincial prejudice. The German, from whatever social class he comes, is essentially a democrat. He sees personal worth as the flower and service of social worth. He may criticize the lower classes; he does not in his heart look down upon them. He, [illegible] note of the [illegible] fashion, was the [illegible] able to [illegible] his culture, and [illegible] it into his many-[illegible] personality more than any other man [illegible] show a side to every good thing that comes to meet him, and place himself in accurate adjustment with his environment, wherever he finds himself. And because the German artist is a part of the German people, he is able to such a remarkable extent to be all things to all men, and to express all the profundity and light and shade of human life.

In all this hearty praise of the German personality, Mme. Elizabeth van Endert must share in particular, as a part of German culture. She would be the first to feel that it is German culture which sheds glory upon her, rather than that it is she who sheds glory upon German culture. She went to London and loved it, yet not as our American Anglo-maniacs do—defending English architecture because of its "literary associations" nor fulminating against it, as a Frenchman might do, because of its bourgeois stolidity. Like a true German she discriminated; the architecture was "schauderhaft" (eternal and noble truth!); but its life—that was very interesting. And this discrimination, this sense of the good that is good wherever it is found, one feels is in her art.

She is thoroughly German. She has sung Strauss innumerable times, and last year sang Pamina in "Die Zauberflöte" more than fifty times. Her song repertory is almost entirely German. Every sort of emotion and feeling is represented in German song literature, and she has not gone outside it to any great extent. But she is curious about Scandinavian song-literature and would like to study it to find new songs. She admires and feels that she understands Debussy, yet cannot feel a personal reaction to him. She frankly does not understand Schönberg but would like to hear him more and try to.—All genuinely German!

There is in her personality the "solidity" which is German. We are apt to associate solidity with stolidity, for no other reason than that the words sound alike. But solidity means such a grounding that all things are possible. This is the grounding of the German education, which results in an equal appreciation of the "Æneid" and "Du Bist wie eine Blume." It is the grounding of a Bach-Beethoven-Brahms musical education, which results in Strauss, Reger, and Humperdinck, and in all manner of light and shade.

This "solidity" can be tested out in the most concrete terms. For instance, Mme. van Endert is grounded, as every good singer is, in correct tone placing. It is the sort of tone which will give color, variety and feeling to "Blute nur, Liebes Herz,' and fire and passion to Salome's soliloquy. It can be applied with equal success to any sort of musical situation, just as the German personality can be applied to any sort of human situation. Mme. van Endert sings in both small halls and in large. It is the same problem at bottom, she says. No matter how large the hall, if the tone is rightly placed it will carry. The pianissimo in Brahms's "Wiegenlied" is just as proper to a large hall as to a small one. Stolidity, then, would say that the problem was the same in both cases. It is obviously not the same, but the variation lies not in the vocal method to be used, but in the personal equation—the "Stimmung." Mme. van Endert will not choose the sort of song for three hundred people that she would choose for three thousand. She is the same artist in both cases. She only gives a different human message according to the different condition.

Her musical career has been an unusual one—thanks to unusual endowments—for she had an engagement the first year of her public life, at the Dresden Royal Opera House, one of the three best in the world, and went from there directly to the Kaiser's own opera house in Berlin. But most singers—and many of the best—do not start that way. And here the wonderful efficiency of the German system of production comes in. For Germany is filled with opera houses—one in every town of moderate size, institutions which often get along with modest enough talents, but manage to use all that they have to the fullest extent, and to appreciate, heartily and sincerely, what is given them, without at the same time losing the active criticism which makes an audience creative. In these small opera houses, says Mme. van Endert, is the most efficient training for the young singer that the world affords. After the grounding—the tone placing and the physical development of the vocal organs—has been finished, what the singer needs is wide and varied activity, a chance to develop herself and her powers in all possible relations, and before all possible audiences. This is furnished at its best by the German opera system. A singer can make her début in a very small opera house, if her voice is yet small in size, and the prevailing situation makes it difficult to find a better opening. She need not fear that she will be submerged here all her life, if she have the ability to advance. What she has will be appreciated; what she has not she will be given a chance to develop. The constant interchange of singers among the opera houses, the guest nights, the vigorous rivalry, all give the singer the utmost chance to make herself known to audiences and managers, and to retain for herself all the advantages which she is able to lay hands on. This again is only one more evidence of civilization (it is a convenient word), which means that the masses are able to receive from the most able individuals, and that the most able individuals have in them something from the masses.

This is the civilization which one feels is Mme. van Endert's, as she drinks her tea and chats about Germany. It is a civilization which is as yet essentially lacking in snobbish America, and which exists and has always existed in aristocratic Germany. And one feels certain that there is this civilization, translated into artistic terms, in Mme. van Endert's art.

H. K. M.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 1 1914

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony series, in which he was announced as a soloist, will learn with regret that after several weeks of nervous tension Paderewski has broken down completely and has cancelled all his Pacific coast engagements. His last concert was given in Portland, Or., and from there he hurried to Los Angeles, where he has hired a bungalow and where he will rest until he is entirely recuperated. The cause given out for the nervous breakdown is the hounding of the "Black Hand," of which he has frequently expressed terror. Paderewski has also, or his press agent has for him, declared that he is being crusaded against by Jewish societies in this country on account of his alleged support of an anti-Semitic paper in Russia. That he was in a highly nervous condition was evident during the early part of his American tour, which has now been interrupted. Whether he hopes to regain his balance in time to resume concert work this season is not announced.

Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and

Esta 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DISPATCH
Address COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 31 1914
Date

Est 1884.

MEMORIAL HALL.

Boston Symphony.

Seldom if ever has there been such an enthusiastic symphony audience at Memorial and perhaps never has there been such full and sufficient reasons for a popular outburst of appreciation as marked the appearance last night of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 100 strong, under the masterly baton of Dr. Karl Muck. The program was well timed, in spite of a late beginning which the audience caused; some Russian compositions comparatively new to Columbus hearers were introduced and a couple of old favorites were performed incomparably. It was such a program as one could hear with satisfaction many nights in succession, ever finding new beauty and nobility in Dr. Muck's masterly readings and in the superb responsiveness of his forces.

We do not remember that the Glazounow symphony in B flat major or the Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish themes were ever played before in Columbus. If they were, last night's performance at least set a new pace which made the old efforts negligible. Many hearers in the audience had been trained to an appreciation of the thematic developments and of the general constructive scheme of the sonata by the interpretative talk of Prof. Gantvoort of Cincinnati, the night before at the public library. Even those who received their first ideas of the work from the performance of the orchestra, must have been surprised and delighted at its varied beauties as revealed by the orchestra. The development of the first and second themes, which is done with a rich distribution of orchestral coloration lends much interest to the first movement and the woodwinds give much beauty to the formation of the second theme in the lively scherzo that follows. Perhaps the most beautiful portion of the work, however, is the andante in which a remarkably beautiful theme, justly likened to the "Celeste Aida" air, is announced, varied by an expressive catilena for the lighter strings. Thus far the symphony contains much worthy of pondering and admiration, but we are unable to arouse any enthusiasm for the finale which may be excused by some as characteristically Russian. Surely Glazounow could have found some means of expressing a martial idea in a stirring way without putting an orchestra through this unimpressive and turbulent period. It goes far to destroy the illusions created by the earlier part of the work.

The Rimsky-Korsakov number was, on the contrary, distinctive throughout. The morning serenade which opens it is full of wonderful orchestra in which the various choirs have ample opportunities and the fandango which closes is wild, impassioned and full of betwitching Hispanian melody.

Very welcome were the interpretations Dr. Muck gave to Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" which has often been heard at Memorial and to Liszt's wonderful symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which the Cincinnati orchestra and the Ellery band have made familiar to Columbus' concert-goers. The most impressive part of the work, the alternate storminess and peaceful lulls, of the allegro ma non troppo movement was given a wonderful reading by Dr. Muck. Here it was that his choir of strings, led by the talented Mr. Witek, was heard in one of its most impressive performances and the pastoral theme was outlined with rare beauty by the woodwinds. At the conclusion of this work the applause was long, Dr. Muck being recalled to the platform several times and finally acknowledging the tribute by the salutation of the entire orchestra, just as was the case after the symphony.

This magnificent band makes us more certain than ever of its high position among the orchestras of the world. There has never been a band in Memorial hall, outside of the Philharmonic under Stransky, that could be compared with it in fine balance of all its choirs. It is hard to conceive of a body of strings more refined, pliable and expressive; the woodwinds are of remarkable excellence and the brasses and percussion—thanks be to the restraining hand of the conductor and their own intelligence—never induce the wierd cacophony that some times takes the place of sanity in symphonic performances. The Women's Music club can never do a greater service to Columbus music than to bring this band back again at an early date. H. E. CHERRINGTON.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 4 1914

Estab

CONCERT BRILLIANT AND SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Carreno, Pianist, Gave Enjoyable Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of this season last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony in D-minor..............Franck
  I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
  II. Allegretto.
  III. Allegro non troppo.
Concert for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73....................Beethoven
  I. Allegro.
  II. Adagio un poco moto.
  III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo.
Dramatic overture, "Husitska," Op. 67.. .... Dvorak

The Franck symphony was heard here on a symphony programme no more than two years ago, and the only justification for its repetition so soon was its performance, which was beyond criticism. Mr. Urack, who again conducted, owing to the indisposition of Dr. Muck, has quite a different orchestra to work with from the one under Mr. Fiedler, which last played it here, even though the personnel may be almost the same. Last year under Dr. Muck the orchestra attained heights which it is to be doubted if it ever had attained before in its long history. This year the orchestra still feels Dr. Muck's inspiration, even in the concerts where he is absent. Mr. Urack conducted with his usual precision and with considerable emotional fire, and the result was almost perfect playing.

Franck seems to have lived in a grave religious atmosphere, and this is strongly felt in the suggestion of brooding loneliness in all his music. It lends a certain noble quality to his work, which is also continually colored by an unrestful movement of the different voices. Last night's symphony, once derided and not so long ago, as too far a departure from the classic mould, not only in its use of the cor anglais but also in its very form and structure, to-day beside some of the atrocities which have been perpetrated since then seems tame and commonplace. In the first movement some show of brilliance is made, climaxes are reached by careful working up, and except at certain moments when emptiness replaces depth, this movement is certainly the finest of the three. The Allegretto with its moody theme is of much beauty, and the finale uses themes of both the former movements.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the one great woman pianist living. This splendid Spanish woman is a virtuoso who yet has not ceased to be an artist. She is one of the few real artists on the piano. Those who remember the Carreno of several years ago, with the remarkable brilliance and the abounding life, were surprised last evening at her new style of playing. She is no less the virtuoso, but she is still more the artist. Some of her renowned brilliance has been sacrificed, but she has gained in many other ways. She has perfected her technique which was formerly not flawless, and although she no longer displays the violence of her feeling she still evokes all the latent passion in the music. Carreno is the most subjective of women pianists. She puts herself into all that she plays. Last night she wove her small part in and out of the sound of the orchestra in a supremely artistic way.

For contrast to end the programme came Dvorak's eloquent and spirited "Husitska Overture." Dvorak in this composition was inspired by the hymns of Huss, and with kindled emotion calling out all the resources of his mature period he surpassed himself. He is always able to write melody which pleases, but it is very seldom truly Bohemian as we find it here. His stirred emotion forced him to put more of himself than usual into this work, and he speaks with eloquence and power. The overture was played with strength and complete mastery of the long sweeping climax.

The next concert will be given March 24, with Mr. Paderewski announced as the soloist.

R. A. P.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 31 1914

Lyric—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth Van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

E 1884

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 31 1914

Esta 1884

esting motion pictures, complete

MME. VAN ENDERT HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, and of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Madame van Endert is described as a [illegible] talent, but [illegible] America

---

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
FEB 4 1914
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SEASON'S FOURTH CONCERT

Large Audience Greets Mme. Te Carreno, Pianist.

A brilliant programme and one of siderable length, despite the fact th was composed of but three numbers, offered by the Boston Symphony Or tra at its fourth concert of the se last evening in Infantry Hall. Agai nouncement was made that indispo of Dr. Muck prevented his appear and again Mr. Urack wielded the ductor's baton, and wielded it to excellent purpose, that the various bers were played with a brilliancy precision that were beyond criticism.

The order of arrangement was a lows:

Franck...................Symphony in D
  I. Lento: Allegro non troppo
  II. Allegretto
  III. Allegro non troppo
Beethoven........Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5
  (In E-flat major, Op. 73).
  I. Allegro
  II. Adagio un poco moto
  III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo
Dvorak..Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67

It is not so long since the Franck symphony was heard here; Max Fiedler, that masterly maker of programmes, embodying it in a concert given in this city in his last season as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra two years ago; and last evening the unquestionably difficult score was played in the same effective fashion.

That taste in music has changed in the two score or more years since Cesar Franck was criticised for writing for the English horn in a symphony, cannot be gainsaid; even now it may be doubted if he has attained the ultimate position he is to hold among composers, but his symphony, full of mysticism and individuality, once deeply censured, now occupies an honored place in orchestral programmes.

By its introduction of the employment of the principal themes in all the movements, this symphony in D minor is separated from the classical models, and there is a remarkable attempt to group the instruments that are related, with breadth of style in orchestration and a free development of the material.

Of the three movements the second wa undoubtedly the favorite last evenin with its lovely solo for the English ho Echoes of its sweet, melancholy the recurring again and again; the th movement in brilliant dramatic contr to the two more sombre ones precedi reaching a well-developed climax exc tionally well handled.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the soloist the evening, played the Beethoven "Co certo in E flat major," as few pianists capable of playing it. Barring Padere ski in the height of his career, it is sa to say that no modern pianist has ev had greater command of the instrume combined with such beauty of tone. Wi the technical proficiency gained by a ha century of constant growth on the co cert stage, Mme Carreno has develop and kept a wonderful sweetness of tone, and her masterful playing of the concerto that Beethoven put forth in the height of his mature period was a matchless performance.

The wonder of her playing was at once its delicacy and its strength; at an age when most artists have retired to private life, Mme. Carreno seems to have entered upon a new era of achievement and has rounded out the brilliancy which won her fame years ago, with a ripeness of technique that gave to her performance last evening a distinction seldom equalled on the concert stage.

The simplicity with which she carried off the honors accorded to her, as she was recalled again and again, lent an added charm to her appearance. It was not her first here by any means, and it is to be hoped not her last.

The brilliant work of the orchestra in the Beethoven concerto was still further manifested in the final number on the programme, the "Husitska" overture, in which Dvorak expressed the emotions which thrilled him through the hymn of the Hussites. His melodies awaken responsive feeling, and long progression of warlike tones was brought to a brilliant climax under the guidance of Mr. Urack.

Contrasted with the other symphony concerts of the winter, that of last evening presented an individuality and brilliancy that made it a worthy addition to its predecessors. The fifth concert in the course will be given on Tuesday evening, March 24, when it is announced that Paderewski will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa. FEB 1 1914
Date

E 1884

MUCK AND PITTSBURGH.

Much complaint has been heard by the editor of this department regarding the program presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra last Wednesday evening in Carnegie Music Hall. The complainers have uttered vehement criticisms against Dr. Muck and the management of the orchestra because such a great organization came here from afar and played such light, indeed, in some respects, such trivial music.

The editor of this department sides with the Boston Symphony in this matter. It was just the sort of program which an orchestral director from cultured Boston would think a city that had given up its own orchestra because of lack of patronage would want. What other conclusion could possibly be drawn from Pittsburgh's musical history? It was a perfectly logical program, considering that history.

Dr. Muck showed by this program exactly where he thinks Pittsburgh stands musically. And Pittsburgh has given him full justification for his opinion. As the editor of this department said a couple of weeks ago, we are going backward in our musical life at a galloping rate. Does Pittsburgh intend ever to turn again toward the front of the procession?

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 31 1914

Esta 1884

Anton Witek To Make Solo Appearance Here

Anton Witek, concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first solo appearance in Baltimore this winter at a concert to be given in Lehmann's Hall on February 17 by the Philadelphia Quartet.

The concert will mark the local debut of the quartet, which is composed of Miss Anna G. Baugher, contralto of this city; Miss Edna Baugher, soprano; Nicolas Douty, tenor, and Henry Hotz, barytone. These singers have met much success in Philadelphia and New York during the present season. Miss Anna Baugher made her metropolitan debut at one of its recent concerts at the Hotel Plaza. Mr. Douty sang for the first time in Baltimore several years ago at the Lyric with the Oratorio Society.

A feature of the program at Lehmann's Hall will be Liza Lehmann's "Persian Garden." Mr. Witek will present a group of solos with his wife, Mme. Vita Witek, as accompanist. Mrs. Davis S. Melamet will play for the Quartet.

From Gazette Pittsburg, Pa
Address FEB 1 1914
Date

Esta

It would shock our sense of fitness to hear that Orpheus ever had lent his golden lyre to wild Boeotian melodies, simply for the sake of gain or for the thoughtless applause of his Thracian neighbors. In like manner, we were disappointed in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday evening. The performance certainly revealed the ravishing beauty of tone and the complete plasticity of an organization which has no rival in America; but we had simply an exhibition of superlatively fine execution, whereas if this orchestra, under the superb leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, had played Beethoven, for instance, we should have heard more poignant strains even than those with which Orpheus charmed the gates of Hades.

The program brought forward a series of works which doubtless were exciting and entertaining, works which were Boeotian only in mood, being of utter sophistication in workmanship; but works which tomorrow or next day will mean nothing to us. The unsurpassable excellence of the orchestra, the great musicianship of its conductor, will have gone for nothing, or the next thing to it. We will have had two very delightful hours in the past; but those two hours were mere luxury, so to speak, and not—like Elena Gerhardt's recital, say, or the first of Fritz Kreisler's—an investment which enriches us to the end of our days by a fresher and deeper insight into the thoughts of the master-musicians.

Almost any of the numbers presented would have been acceptable if introduced for the sake of contrast and for the exhibition of sheer virtuosity in the midst of a program of greater weight. But, as the members of the orchestra themselves complained, for the Boston Symphony to spend an entire evening on works of decidedly secondary importance upsets one's notion of the proper relation of cause to effect. It is like Hercules bending his strength to Omphale's spinning wheel while destructive monsters roam undisturbed, and as depressing as to find the precious time of Michelangelo wasted upon the detail work of an inferior architectural draughtsman.

Future Music.

As for the coming week, it is cheer-

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 1 1914

Es 1884

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony series, in which he was announced as a soloist, will learn with regret that after several weeks of nervous tension Paderewski has broken down completely and has cancelled all his Pacific coast engagements. His last concert was given in Portland, Or., and from there he hurried to Los Angeles, where he has hired a bungalow and where he will rest until he is entirely recuperated. The cause given out for the nervous breakdown is the hounding of the "Black Hand," of which he has frequently expressed terror. Paderewski has also, or his press agent has for him, declared that he is being crusaded against by Jewish societies in this country on account of his alleged support of an anti-Semitic paper in Russia. That he was in a highly nervous condition was evident during the early part of his American tour, which has not been interrupted. Whether he hopes to regain his balance in time to resume concert work this season is not announced.

• • •

Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DISPATCH

From

Address COLUMBUS, O.

JAN 31 1914

Date

Es 884.

MEMORIAL HALL.

Boston Symphony.

Seldom if ever has there been such an enthusiastic symphony audience at Memorial and perhaps never has there been such full and sufficient reasons for a popular outburst of appreciation as marked the appearance last night of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 100 strong, under the masterly baton of Dr. Karl Muck. The program was well timed, in spite of a late beginning which the audience caused; some Russian compositions comparatively new to Columbus hearers were introduced and a couple of old favorites were performed incomparably. It was such a program as one could hear with satisfaction many nights in succession, ever finding new beauty and nobility in Dr. Muck's masterly readings and in the superb responsiveness of his forces.

We do not remember that the Glazounow symphony in B flat major or the Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish themes were ever played before in Columbus. If they were, last night's performance at least set a new pace which made the old efforts negligible. Many hearers in the audience had been trained to an appreciation of the thematic developments and of the general constructive scheme of the sonata by the interpretative talk of Prof. Gantvoort of Cincinnati, the night before at the public library. Even those who received their first ideas of the work from the performance of the orchestra, must have been surprised and delighted at its varied beauties as revealed by the orchestra. The development of the first and second themes, which is done with a rich distribution of orchestral coloration lends much interest to the first movement and the woodwinds give much beauty to the formation of the second theme in the lively scherzo that follows. Perhaps the most beautiful portion of the work, however, is the andante in which a remarkably beautiful theme, justly likened to the "Celeste Aida" air, is announced, varied by an expressive catilena for the lighter strings. Thus far the symphony contains much worthy of pondering and admiration, but we are unable to arouse any enthusiasm for the finale which may be excused by some as characteristically Russian. Surely Glazounow could have found some means of expressing a martial idea in a stirring way without putting an orchestra through this unimpressive and turbulent period. It goes far to destroy the illusions created by the earlier part of the work.

The Rimsky-Korsakov number was, on the contrary, distinctive throughout. The morning serenade which opens it is full of wonderful orchestra in which the various choirs have ample opportunities and the fandango which closes is wild, impassioned and full of betwitching Hispanian melody.

Very welcome were the interpretations Dr. Muck gave to Bizet's "L Arlesienne" which has often been heard at Memorial and to Liszt's wonderful symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which the Cincinnati orchestra and the Ellery band have made familiar to Columbus' concert-goers. The most impressive part of the work, the alternate storminess and peaceful lulls, of the allegro ma non troppo movement was given a wonderful reading by Dr. Muck. Here it was that his choir of strings, led by the talented Mr. Witek, was heard in one of its most impressive performances and the pastoral theme was outlined with rare beauty by the woodwinds. At the conclusion of this work the applause was long, Dr. Muck being recalled to the platform several times and finally acknowledging the tribute by the salutation of the entire orchestra, just as was the case after the symphony.

This magnificent band makes us more certain than ever of its high position among the orchestras of the world. There has never been a band in Memorial hall, outside of the Philharmonic under Stransky, that could be compared with it in fine balance of all its choirs. It is hard to conceive of a body of strings more refined, pliable and expressive; the woodwinds are of remarkable excellence and the brasses and percussion—thanks be to the restraining hand of the conductor and their own intelligence—never induce the wierd cacophony that some times takes the place of sanity in symphonic performances. The Women's Music club can never do a greater service to Columbus music than to bring this band back again at an early date.

H. E. CHERRINGTON.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 4 1914

Estabi

CONCERT BRILLIANT AND SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Carreno, Pianist, Gave Enjoyable Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of this season last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony in D-minor..............Franck
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Concert for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73......................Beethoven
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo.
Dramatic overture, "Husitska," Op. 67.. .... Dvorak

The Franck symphony was heard here on a symphony programme no more than two years ago, and the only justification for its repetition so soon was its performance, which was beyond criticism. Mr. Urack, who again conducted, owing to the indisposition of Dr. Muck, has quite a different orchestra to work with from the one under Mr. Fiedler, which last played it here, even though the personnel may be almost the same. Last year under Dr. Muck the orchestra attained heights which it is to be doubted if it ever had attained before in its long history. This year the orchestra still feels Dr. Muck's inspiration, even in the concerts where he is absent. Mr. Urack conducted with his usual precision and with considerable emotional fire, and the result was almost perfect playing.

Franck seems to have lived in a grave religious atmosphere, and this is strongly felt in the suggestion of brooding loneliness in all his music. It lends a certain noble quality to his work, which is also continually colored by an unrestful movement of the different voices. Last night's symphony, once derided and not so long ago, as too far a departure from the classic mould, not only in its use of the cor anglais but also in its very form and structure, to-day beside some of the atrocities which have been perpetrated since then seems tame and commonplace. In the first movement some show of brilliance is made, climaxes are reached by careful working up, and except at certain moments when emptiness replaces depth, this movement is certainly the finest of the three. The Allegretto with its moody theme is of much beauty, and the finale uses themes of both the former movements.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the one great woman pianist living. This splendid Spanish woman is a virtuoso who yet has not ceased to be an artist. She is one of the few real artists on the piano. Those who remember the Carreno of several years ago, with the remarkable brilliance and the abounding life, were surprised last evening at her new style of playing. She is no less the virtuoso, but she is still more the artist. Some of her renowned brilliance has been sacrificed, but she has gained in many other ways. She has perfected her technique which was formerly not flawless, and although she no longer displays the violence of her feeling she still evokes all the latent passion in the music. Carreno is the most subjective of women pianists. She puts herself into all that she plays. Last night she wove her small part in and out of the sound of the orchestra in a supremely artistic way.

For contrast to end the programme came Dvorak's eloquent and spirited "Husitska Overture." Dvorak in this composition was inspired by the hymns of Huss, and with kindled emotion calling out all the resources of his mature period he surpassed himself. He is always able to write melody which pleases, but it is very seldom truly Bohemian as we find it here. His stirred emotion forced him to put more of himself than usual into this work, and he speaks with eloquence and power. The overture was played with strength and complete mastery of the long sweeping climax.

The next concert will be given March 24, with Mr. Paderewski announced as the soloist.

R. A. P.

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date JAN 31 1914

E 1884

Lyric—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth Van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

From EVG. STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date JAN 31 1914

Esta 1884

esting motion pictures, complete

MME. VAN ENDERT HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, and of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Madame van Endert is described as a talent but America

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

FEB 4 1914

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SEASON'S FOURTH CONCERT

Large Audience Greets Mme. Te Carreno, Pianist.

A brilliant programme and one of siderable length, despite the fact th was composed of but three numbers, offered by the Boston Symphony Or tra at its fourth concert of the se last evening in Infantry Hall. Agai nouncement was made that indispo of Dr. Muck prevented his appear and again Mr. Urack wielded the ductor's baton, and wielded it to excellent purpose, that the various bers were played with a brilliancy precision that were beyond criticism

The order of arrangement was a lows:

Franck....................Symphony in D
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo
Beethoven........Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5
(In E-flat major, Op. 73).
I. Allegro
II. Adagio un poco moto
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo
Dvorak..Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67

It is not so long since the Franck symphony was heard here; Max Fiedler, that masterly maker of programmes, embodying it in a concert given in this city in his last season as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra two years ago; and last evening the unquestionably difficult score was played in the same effective fashion.

That taste in music has changed in the two score or more years since Cesar Franck was criticised for writing for the English horn in a symphony, cannot be gainsaid; even now it may be doubted if he has attained the ultimate position he is to hold among composers, but his symphony, full of mysticism and individuality, once deeply censured, now occupies an honored place in orchestral programmes.

By its introduction of the employment of the principal themes in all the movements, this symphony in D minor is separated from the classical models, and there is a remarkable attempt to group the instruments that are related, with breadth of style in orchestration and a free development of the material.

Of the three movements the second wa undoubtedly the favorite last evenin with its lovely solo for the English ho Echoes of its sweet, melancholy the recurring again and again; the th movement in brilliant dramatic contr to the two more sombre ones precedi reaching a well-developed climax exc tionally well handled.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the soloist the evening, played the Beethoven "Co certo in E flat major," as few pianists capable of playing it. Barring Padere ski in the height of his career, it is sa to say that no modern pianist has ev had greater command of the instrumen combined with such beauty of tone. Wit the technical proficiency gained by a hal century of constant growth on the co cert stage, Mme Carreno has develop and kept a wonderful sweetness of tone, and her masterful playing of the concerto that Beethoven put forth in the height of his mature period was a matchless performance.

The wonder of her playing was at once its delicacy and its strength; at an age when most artists have retired to private life, Mme. Carreno seems to have entered upon a new era of achievement and has rounded out the brilliancy which won her fame years ago, with a ripeness of technique that gave to her performance last evening a distinction seldom equalled on the concert stage.

The simplicity with which she carried off the honors accorded to her, as she was recalled again and again, lent an added charm to her appearance. It was not her first here by any means, and it is to be hoped not her last.

The brilliant work of the orchestra in the Beethoven concerto was still further manifested in the final number on the programme, the "Husitska" overture, in which Dvorak expressed the emotions which thrilled him through the hymn of the Hussites. His melodies awaken responsive feeling, and long progression of warlike tones was brought to a brilliant climax under the guidance of Mr. Urack.

Contrasted with the other symphony concerts of the winter, that of last evening presented an individuality and brilliancy that made it a worthy addition to its predecessors. The fifth concert in the course will be given on Tuesday evening, March 24, when it is announced that Paderewski will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From POST

Address: Pittsburg, Pa. FEB 1 1914

Date

E 1884

MUCK AND PITTSBURGH.

Much complaint has been heard by the editor of this department regarding the program presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra last Wednesday evening in Carnegie Music Hall. The complainers have uttered vehement criticisms against Dr. Muck and the management of the orchestra because such a great organization came here from afar and played such light, indeed, in some respects, such trivial music.

The editor of this department sides with the Boston Symphony in this matter. It was just the sort of program which an orchestral director from cultured Boston would think a city that had given up its own orchestra because of lack of patronage would want. What other conclusion could possibly be drawn from Pittsburgh's musical history? It was a perfectly logical program, considering that history.

Dr. Muck showed by this program exactly where he thinks Pittsburgh stands musically. And Pittsburgh has given him full justification for his opinion. As the editor of this department said a couple of weeks ago, we are going backward in our musical life at a galloping rate. Does Pittsburgh intend ever to turn again toward the front of the procession?

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date JAN 31 1914

Esta 1884

Anton Witek To Make Solo Appearance Here

Anton Witek, concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first solo appearance in Baltimore this winter at a concert to be given in Lehmann's Hall on February 17 by the Philadelphia Quartet.

The concert will mark the local debut of the quartet, which is composed of Miss Anna G. Baugher, contralto of this city; Miss Edna Baugher, soprano; Nicolas Douty, tenor, and Henry Hotz, barytone. These singers have met much success in Philadelphia and New York during the present season. Miss Anna Baugher made her metropolitan debut at one of its recent concerts at the Hotel Plaza. Mr. Douty sang for the first time in Baltimore several years ago at the Lyric with the Oratorio Society.

A feature of the program at Lehmann's Hall will be Liza Lehmann's "Persian Garden." Mr. Witek will present a group of solos with his wife, Mme. Vita Witek, as accompanist. Mrs. Davis S. Melamet will play for the Quartet.

From Gazette Pittsburg, Pa

Address FEB 1 1914

Date

Esta

It would shock our sense of fitness to hear that Orpheus ever had lent his golden lyre to wild Boeotian melodies, simply for the sake of gain or for the thoughtless applause of his Thracian neighbors. In like manner, we were disappointed in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday evening. The performance certainly revealed the ravishing beauty of tone and the complete plasticity of an organization which has no rival in America; but we had simply an exhibition of superlatively fine execution, whereas if this orchestra, under the superb leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, had played Beethoven, for instance, we should have heard more poignant strains even than those with which Orpheus charmed the gates of Hades.

The program brought forward a series of works which doubtless were exciting and entertaining, works which were Boeotian only in mood, being of utter sophistication in workmanship; but works which tomorrow or next day will mean nothing to us. The unsurpassable excellence of the orchestra, the great musicianship of its conductor, will have gone for nothing, or the next thing to it. We will have had two very delightful hours in the past; but those two hours were mere luxury, so to speak, and not—like Elena Gerhardt's recital, say, or the first of Fritz Kreisler's—an investment which enriches us to the end of our days by a fresher and deeper insight into the thoughts of the master-musicians.

Almost any of the numbers presented would have been acceptable if introduced for the sake of contrast and for the exhibition of sheer virtuosity in the midst of a program of greater weight. But, as the members of the orchestra themselves complained, for the Boston Symphony to spend an entire evening on works of decidedly secondary importance upsets one's notion of the proper relation of cause to effect. It is like Hercules bending his strength to Omhale's spinning wheel while destructive monsters roam undisturbed, and as depressing as to find the precious time of Michelangelo wasted upon the detail work of an inferior architectural draughtsman.

Future Music.

As for the coming week, it is cheer-

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 1 1914

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony series, in which he was announced as a soloist, will learn with regret that after several weeks of nervous tension Paderewski has broken down completely and has cancelled all his Pacific coast engagements. His last concert was given in Portland, Or., and from there he hurried to Los Angeles, where he has hired a bungalow and where he will rest until he is entirely recuperated. The cause given out for the nervous breakdown is the hounding of the "Black Hand," of which he has frequently expressed terror. Paderewski has also, or his press agent has for him, declared that he is being crusaded against by Jewish societies in this country on account of his alleged support of an anti-Semitic paper in Russia. That he was in a highly nervous condition was evident during the early part of his American tour, which has not been interrupted. Whether he hopes to regain his balance in time to resume concert work this season is not announced.

* * *

Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DISPATCH
Address COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 31 1914
Date

MEMORIAL HALL.

Boston Symphony.

Seldom if ever has there been such an enthusiastic symphony audience at Memorial and perhaps never has there been such full and sufficient reasons for a popular outburst of appreciation as marked the appearance last night of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 100 strong, under the masterly baton of Dr. Karl Muck. The program was well timed, in spite of a late beginning which the audience caused; some Russian compositions comparatively new to Columbus hearers were introduced and a couple of old favorites were performed incomparably. It was such a program as one could hear with satisfaction many nights in succession, ever finding new beauty and nobility in Dr. Muck's masterly readings and in the superb responsiveness of his forces.

We do not remember that the Glazounow symphony in B flat major or the Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish themes were ever played before in Columbus. If they were, last night's performance at least set a new pace which made the old efforts negligible. Many hearers in the audience had been trained to an appreciation of the thematic developments and of the general constructive scheme of the sonata by the interpretative talk of Prof. Gantvoort of Cincinnati, the night before at the public library. Even those who received their first ideas of the work from the performance of the orchestra, must have been surprised and delighted at its varied beauties as revealed by the orchestra. The development of the first and second themes, which is done with a rich distribution of orchestral coloration lends much interest to the first movement and the woodwinds give much beauty to the formation of the second theme in the lively scherzo that follows. Perhaps the most beautiful portion of the work, however, is the andante in which a remarkably beautiful theme, justly likened to the "Celeste Aida" air, is announced, varied by an expressive cantilena for the lighter strings. Thus far the symphony contains much worthy of pondering and admiration, but we are unable to arouse any enthusiasm for the finale which may be excused by some as characteristically Russian. Surely Glazounow could have found some means of expressing a martial idea in a stirring way without putting an orchestra through this unimpressive and turbulent period. It goes far to destroy the illusions created by the earlier part of the work.

The Rimsky-Korsakov number was, on the contrary, distinctive throughout. The morning serenade which opens it is full of wonderful orchestra in which the various choirs have ample opportunities and the fandango which closes is wild, impassioned and full of betwitching Hispanian melody.

Very welcome were the interpretations Dr. Muck gave to Bizet's "L Arlesienne" which has often been heard at Memorial and to Liszt's wonderful symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which the Cincinnati orchestra and the Ellery band have made familiar to Columbus' concert-goers. The most impressive part of the work, the alternate storminess and peaceful lulls, of the allegro ma non troppo movement was given a wonderful reading by Dr. Muck. Here it was that his choir of strings, led by the talented Mr, Witek, was heard in one of its most impressive performances and the pastoral theme was outlined with rare beauty by the woodwinds. At the conclusion of this work the applause was long, Dr. Muck being recalled to the platform several times and finally acknowledging the tribute by the salutation of the entire orchestra, just as was the case after the symphony.

This magnificent band makes us more certain than ever of its high position among the orchestras of the world. There has never been a band in Memorial hall, outside of the Philharmonic under Stransky, that could be compared with it in fine balance of all its choirs. It is hard to conceive of a body of strings more refined, pliable and expressive; the woodwinds are of remarkable excellence and the brasses and percussion—thanks be to the restraining hand of the conductor and their own intelligence—never induce the wierd cacophony that some times takes the place of sanity in symphonic performances. The Women's Music club can never do a greater service to Columbus music than to bring this band back again at an early date.

H. E. CHERRINGTON.

Es 884.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 4 1914

CONCERT BRILLIANT AND SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Carreno, Pianist, Gave Enjoyable Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of this season last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony in D-minor..............Franck
  I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
  II. Allegretto.
  III. Allegro non troppo.
Concert for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73......................Beethoven
  I. Allegro.
  II. Adagio un poco moto.
  III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo.
Dramatic overture, "Husitska," Op. 67.. .... Dvorak

The Franck symphony was heard here on a symphony programme no more than two years ago, and the only justification for its repetition so soon was its performance, which was beyond criticism. Mr. Urack, who again conducted, owing to the indisposition of Dr. Muck, has quite a different orchestra to work with from the one under Mr. Fiedler, which last played it here, even though the personnel may be almost the same. Last year under Dr. Muck the orchestra attained heights which it is to be doubted if it ever had attained before in its long history. This year the orchestra still feels Dr. Muck's inspiration, even in the concerts where he is absent. Mr. Urack conducted with his usual precision and with considerable emotional fire, and the result was almost perfect playing.

Franck seems to have lived in a grave religious atmosphere, and this is strongly felt in the suggestion of brooding loneliness in all his music. It lends a certain noble quality to his work, which is also continually colored by an unrestful movement of the different voices. Last night's symphony, once derided and not so long ago, as too far a departure from the classic mould, not only in its use of the cor anglais but also in its very form and structure, to-day beside some of the atrocities which have been perpetrated since then seems tame and commonplace. In the first movement some show of brilliance is made, climaxes are reached by careful working up, and except at certain moments when emptiness replaces depth, this movement is certainly the finest of the three. The Allegretto with its moody theme is of much beauty, and the finale uses themes of both the former movements.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the one great woman pianist living. This splendid Spanish woman is a virtuoso who yet has not ceased to be an artist. She is one of the few real artists on the piano. Those who remember the Carreno of several years ago, with the remarkable brilliance and the abounding life, were surprised last evening at her new style of playing. She is no less the virtuoso, but she is still more the artist. Some of her renowned brilliance has been sacrificed, but she has gained in many other ways. She has perfected her technique which was formerly not flawless, and although she no longer displays the violence of her feeling she still evokes all the latent passion in the music. Carreno is the most subjective of women pianists. She puts herself into all that she plays. Last night she wove her small part in and out of the sound of the orchestra in a supremely artistic way.

For contrast to end the programme came Dvorak's eloquent and spirited "Husitska Overture." Dvorak in this composition was inspired by the hymns of Huss, and with kindled emotion calling out all the resources of his mature period he surpassed himself. He is always able to write melody which pleases, but it is very seldom truly Bohemian as we find it here. His stirred emotion forced him to put more of himself than usual into this work, and he speaks with eloquence and power. The overture was played with strength and complete mastery of the long sweeping climax.

The next concert will be given March 24, with Mr. Paderewski announced as the soloist.

R. A. P.

Establ

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 31 1914

Lyric—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theater on February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth Van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

E 1884

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 31 1914

esting motion pictures, [illegible]

MME. VAN ENDERT HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, February 18, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist a singer new to this country, and of whom much is expected. She is Elizabeth van Eudert, principal lyric soprano of the new opera of Charlottenburg and for several years first lyric soprano of the Dresden Opera, and then of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Madame van Endert is described as a [illegible] talent, but [illegible] in America [illegible]

Esta 1884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
FEB 4 1914
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SEASON'S FOURTH CONCERT

Large Audience Greets Mme. Teresa Carreno, Pianist.

A brilliant programme and one of considerable length, despite the fact that it was composed of but three numbers, was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth concert of the season last evening in Infantry Hall. Again announcement was made that indisposition of Dr. Muck prevented his appearance, and again Mr. Urack wielded the conductor's baton, and wielded it to such excellent purpose, that the various numbers were played with a brilliancy and precision that were beyond criticism.

The order of arrangement was as follows:

Franck....................Symphony in D-minor
  I. Lento: Allegro non troppo
  II. Allegretto
  III. Allegro non troppo
Beethoven........Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5
  (In E-flat major, Op. 73).
  I. Allegro
  II. Adagio un poco moto
  III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo
Dvorak..Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67

It is not so long since the Franck symphony was heard here; Max Fiedler, that masterly maker of programmes, embodying it in a concert given in this city in his last season as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra two years ago; and last evening the unquestionably difficult score was played in the same effective fashion.

That taste in music has changed in the two score or more years since Cesar Franck was criticised for writing for the English horn in a symphony, cannot be gainsaid; even now it may be doubted if he has attained the ultimate position he is to hold among composers, but his symphony, full of mysticism and individuality, once deeply censured, now occupies an honored place in orchestral programmes.

By its introduction of the employment of the principal themes in all the movements, this symphony in D minor is separated from the classical models, and there is a remarkable attempt to group the instruments that are related, with breadth of style in orchestration and a free development of the material.

Of the three movements the second was undoubtedly the favorite last evening, with its lovely solo for the English horn. Echoes of its sweet, melancholy theme, recurring again and again; the third movement in brilliant dramatic contrast to the two more sombre ones preceding, reaching a well-developed climax exceptionally well handled.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the evening, played the Beethoven "Concerto in E flat major," as few pianists are capable of playing it. Barring Paderewski in the height of his career, it is safe to say that no modern pianist has ever had greater command of the instrument, combined with such beauty of tone. With the technical proficiency gained by a half-century of constant growth on the concert stage, Mme Carreno has developed and kept a wonderful sweetness of tone, and her masterful playing of the concerto that Beethoven put forth in the height of his mature period was a matchless performance.

The wonder of her playing was at once its delicacy and its strength; at an age when most artists have retired to private life, Mme. Carreno seems to have entered upon a new era of achievement and has rounded out the brilliancy which won her fame years ago, with a ripeness of technique that gave to her performance last evening a distinction seldom equalled on the concert stage.

The simplicity with which she carried off the honors accorded to her, as she was recalled again and again, lent an added charm to her appearance. It was not her first here by any means, and it is to be hoped not her last.

The brilliant work of the orchestra in the Beethoven concerto was still further manifested in the final number on the programme, the "Husitska" overture, in which Dvorak expressed the emotions which thrilled him through the hymn of the Hussites. His melodies awaken responsive feeling, and long progression of warlike tones was brought to a brilliant climax under the guidance of Mr. Urack.

Contrasted with the other symphony concerts of the winter, that of last evening presented an individuality and brilliancy that made it a worthy addition to its predecessors. The fifth concert in the course will be given on Tuesday evening, March 24, when it is announced that Paderewski will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

884

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa. FEB 1 1914
Date

MUCK AND PITTSBURGH.

Much complaint has been heard by the editor of this department regarding the program presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra last Wednesday evening in Carnegie Music Hall. The complainers have uttered vehement criticisms against Dr. Muck and the management of the orchestra because such a great organization came here from afar and played such light, indeed, in some respects, such trivial music.

The editor of this department sides with the Boston Symphony in this matter. It was just the sort of program which an orchestral director from cultured Boston would think a city that had given up its own orchestra because of lack of patronage would want. What other conclusion could possibly be drawn from Pittsburgh's musical history? It was a perfectly logical program, considering that history.

Dr. Muck showed by this program exactly where he thinks Pittsburgh stands musically. And Pittsburgh has given him full justification for his opinion. As the editor of this department said a couple of weeks ago, we are going backward in our musical life at a galloping rate. Does Pittsburgh intend ever to turn again toward the front of the procession?

E 1884

NG NEWS
timore, Md.
JAN 31 1914

Witek To Make
lo Appearance Here

n Witek, concert meister of the a Symphony Orchestra, will his first solo appearance in Bal-1884 re this winter at a concert to be given in Lehmann's Hall on February 17 by the Philadelphia Quartet.

The concert will mark the local debut of the quartet, which is composed of Miss Anna G. Baugher, contralto of this city; Miss Edna Baugher, soprano; Nicolas Douty, tenor, and Henry Hotz, barytone. These singers have met much success in Philadelphia and New York during the present season. Miss Anna Baugher made her metropolitan debut at one of its recent concerts at the Hotel Plaza. Mr. Douty sang for the first time in Baltimore several years ago at the Lyric with the Oratorio Society.

A feature of the program at Lehmann's Hall will be Liza Lehmann's "Persian Garden." Mr. Witek will present a group of solos with his wife, Mme. Vita Witek, as accompanist. Mrs. Davis S. Melamet will play for the Quartet.

---

azette Pittsburg, Pa
FEB 1 1914

ld shock our sense of fitness to hat Orpheus ever had lent his lyre to wild Boeotian melodies, for the sake of gain or for the tless applause of his Thracian
ors. In like manner, we were dis-ted in the concert of the Boston hony Orchestra last Wednesday
g. The performance certainly rethe ravishing beauty of tone and mplete plasticity of an organizahich has no rival in America; but we had simply an exhibition of superlatively fine execution, whereas if this orchestra, under the superb leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, had played Beethoven, for instance, we should have heard more poignant strains even than those with which Orpheus charmed the gates of Hades.

The program brought forward a series of works which doubtless were exciting and entertaining, works which were Boeotian only in mood, being of utter sophistication in workmanship; but works which tomorrow or next day will mean nothing to us. The unsurpassable excellence of the orchestra, the great musicianship of its conductor, will have gone for nothing, or the next thing to it. We will have had two very delightful hours in the past; but those two hours were mere luxury, so to speak, and not—like Elena Gerhardt's recital, say, or the first of Fritz Kreisler's—an investment which enriches us to the end of our days by a fresher and deeper insight into the thoughts of the master-musicians.

Almost any of the numbers presented would have been acceptable if introduced for the sake of contrast and for the exhibition of sheer virtuosity in the midst of a program of greater weight. But, as the members of the orchestra themselves complained, for the Boston Symphony to spend an entire evening on works of decidedly secondary importance upsets one's notion of the proper relation of cause to effect. It is like Hercules bending his strength to Omphale's spinning wheel while destructive monsters roam undisturbed, and as depressing as to find the precious time of Michelangelo wasted upon the detail work of an inferior architectural draughtsman.

Future Music.

As for the coming week, it is cheer-

From News
Address Providence, R. I.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT PROVES MOST DELIGHTFUL

The Boston Symphony orchestra last evening gave its fourth concert of the season in Infantry hall.

The program was: Franck, Symphony in D-minor, Lento; Allegro non troppo, Allegretto, Allegro non troppo; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5 (In E-flat major, Op. 73), Allegro, Adagio un poco moto, Rondo, Allegro ma non troppo; Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67.

Of the three movements of the Franck Symphony the second was undoubtedly the favorite last evening, with its lovely solo for the English horn, echoes of its sweet, melancholy theme, recurring again and again; the third movement in brilliant dramatic contrast to the two more sombde ones preceding, reaching a well developed climax exceptionally well handled.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the evening, played the Beethoven "Concerto in E-flat major, as few pianists are capable of playing it. Barring Paderewski in the height of his career, it is safe to say that no modern pianist has ever had greater command of the instrument, com- ... such beauty of tone.

1884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date FEB 1 - 1914

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Mme. Teresa Carreno, the brilliant veteran pianist, will be the soloist, and judging from the reception accorded to her in Boston and other cities, where she has recently played, her appearance will be one of the events in the course.

The beautiful symphony of the Belgian composer, Cesar Franck, the "Emperor Concerto," for pianoforte by Beethoven, to be played by Mme. Carreno, and the "Husitska Overture" of Dvorak comprise the works which Dr. Muck has placed on the programme.

As further proof of the changes that have taken place, not only in music, but in the world's musical ear, it may be remarked that when Franck's Symphony was first performed in Boston, just 15 years ago, it was condemned as incomprehensible music; so greatly have the ears of the public been attuned to modern harmonic schemes since that time, however, to-day the symphony is not only comprehensible, but as compared with many modern works accepted without a thought, it is almost naive.

Cesar Franck, the composer, was one of the most interesting personalities in music in the last part of the 19th century. A Belgian by birth, he spent most of his life in Paris as a church organist and teacher. Fame came to him only at the end of his career, and yet through his music and his teaching he was undoubtedly the most potent influence in French music since Berlioz.

The symphony in question differs from the classical form, in that it has but three movements. It differs from the French music of to-day in that it is full-blooded. Its melodies are muscular. Although the Conservatoire in Paris in 1889, when it was first produced, condemned it because it made use of an English horn, it has achieved a popularity almost comparable with that of the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky and is constantly played throughout the world.

Mme. Carreno, who is now in her 61st year, is still the supreme mistress of her art. Already she has played the Beethoven concerto with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and her reported success has been as great as it ever was in the past.

The "Husitska" overture Dvorak has built on an old Hussite hymn, and it is

Mme. Teresa Carreno
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

Estal ... 84

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1914
Date

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb "Symphony in D Minor," the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture to "The Bartered Bride."

Interest, however, will naturally center in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. She is making her first appearances in America at the regular Symphony Concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempel, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She is young and incidentally has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

884

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
FEB 8 - 1914
Date

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das vierte Paar der Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzerte findet in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 19. reſp. am Nachmittag des 21. d. Mts. ſtatt. Soliſtin im Abendkonzert iſt die Sopranſängerin Frau Eliſabeth von Endert. Die Dame wird Lieder von Hugo Wolf, Strauß, Humperdinck und d'Albert ſingen. Die orcheſtrale Hauptdarbietung im Abendkonzert iſt Brahms' Vierte und im Nachmittagskonzert in dem kein Soliſt mitwirkt, Beethoven's Fünfte Symphonie.

Es ... 1884

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
BROOKLYN EDIT
Date FEB 8 1914

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor; the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride." Interest will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Mme. van Endert is making her first appearances in America at the regular symphony concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few performances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempl, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

Estabi ... 4

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth and at the matinee concert in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The soloist at the evening concert will be a newcomer, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, now member of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The other orchestral numbers Thursday evening will be Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius's overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon and besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the programme includes Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

E ... 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
FEB 8 1914
Date

Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth, and at the matinee concert, in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received, the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The soloist at the evening concert will be a newcomer—Elisabeth van Endert, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin.

Es ... 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
BROOKLYN EDIT
FEB 8 1914
Date

Noted German Singer to Make Debut Here

Mme. Van Endert Will Sing with Boston Symphony at Academy.

Dr. Muck arranged a programme of great interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor, the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride."

Interest, however, will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is making her first appearance in America at the regular Symphony Concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few appearances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempel, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

E ... k, 1884

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 14, 1914

SINGER ON STAGE WITH SYMPHONY

Mme. Van Endert, Soloist—Tschaikowsky's 4th Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Elisabeth van Endert was the soloist yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. She sang Wolf's "Verborgenheit"; the "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie" of Strauss; Humperdinck's charming song, "Es schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert's "Mediaval Hymn to Venus," heard for the first time here.

The orchestral compositions were Tschaikowsky's 4th Symphony; Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad."

A BEAUTIFUL VOICE

Mme. van Endert has a voice of beautiful quality. She was at her best in the songs of gentler mood which she undertook to interpret, as for instance, Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the cradle song of Strauss, the cradle song of Humperdinck, a delightful song and worthy of the composer of "Hansel and Gretel." Listening to Dr. Muck's conducting of the accompaniment of the passionate "Cacilie," one wondered that singers ever undertake this song without the splendid orchestral accompaniment. The song of d'Albert is an attempt at great things, but there is more bombast than inspiration in it. Mme. van En-the performance ... symphony ... doubt the fourth symphony is ... or the sixth, but ... of absorbing interest, none the less. One must take the ideas for what they are worth. They are often trivial and not at all symphonic in their character. Still, the unshakable sincerity and conviction of the composer, when ... they were yesterday, are inescapable, and after Dr. Muck's remarkably characteristic reading, one said, "What an interesting work. New wine in old bottles!" And, of course, the scherzo, played with really wonderful finish and spirit, was instantaneously successful. The symphony was discovered by the conductor for his audiences. Yet Dr. Muck does not admire Tschaikowsky.

---

He does not admire him, but he plays him as Tschaikowsky would surely have been gratified to hear himself played. Dr. Muck and his orchestra are now at the place where they play almost anything, and it is enjoyed by the hearer. The scherzo of Dukas was also performed with surpassing brilliancy, though not all the efforts of this extraordinary orchestra and this remarkable conductor can make the work for us, other than "old hat." Cornelius' overture was good to hear again. ... has the opera not been heard more often in this country.

ADVERTISER
FEBRUARY 14

MISS VAN ENDERT SINGS IN AMERICA

GERMAN PRIMA DONNA WELL RECEIVED AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Glowing Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36.
Songs with orchestra:
  Hugo Wolf—"Verborgenheit" ("Retirement").
  Strauss—"Wiegenlied" (Cradle Song).
  Strauss—"Cacilie."
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"): Scherzo (after a Ballad by Goethe).
Songs with orchestra:
  Humperdinck—"Es schaukeln die Winde" ("The Winds Rock").
  d'Albert—Mediaeval Hymn to Venus.
Cornelius—Overture to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."
Soloist: Elisabeth Van Endert.

The orchestra at the Symphony concert gave a glowing performance of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F minor, op. 36. The work was superbly played. The first movement, the finest of the four, was given a magnificent rendering, but the audience preferred the virtuoso playing of the third movement with its exquisite pizzicato passages for the strings.

After this movement Dr. Muck called his men to their feet to acknowledge the insistent applause, and again at the close of the work the entire orchestra shared in the applause.

Although the work was played only last year it has been given so infrequently in Boston that it is something of a novelty to the Symphony patrons and the work, easily grasped, made a quick appeal.

The first movement, the movement with the wonderful motive and the haunting waltz, is by far the finest in the work. The composer once spoke of it as rather hard for the audience to grasp at a first hearing, but that was before the days of the moderns. Now it seems clarity itself.

It is not the display portion of the Symphony and for that reason does not make the bid for applause that the third and fourth movements make. It is immeasurably superior to the second movement in which the theme is used for improvisation till one wearies of it.

Miss Van Endert sang for the first time in this country. By singing two songs, the "Wiegenlied" and the "Caecilie" that Miss Gerhardt has sung at these concerts she challenged comparison with that artist and she naturally challenged comparison with Miss Culp, who has recently sung Wolf and Strauss songs here, and with Miss Destinn, who like Miss Van Endert, first came to Boston from the German operatic stage via the Symphony concerts.

She has no such phenomenal voice as Miss Destinn, Miss Gerhardt, or Miss Culp. Possibly many will find that she cannot establish a mood, in singing a song, like Miss Culp, but the fact remains that she has a lovely voice although not an especially big one, and that she sings with authority. She attempted no such glowing rendition of the "Caecilie" as some singers, Dr. Wuellner for instance, and was perhaps at her best in the Humperdinck song which was not the finest music on the afternoon's programme.

She is an interesting singer, although not a tremendously great one and she has a charming personality and youth and grace which will help her in creating an American following.

The popular "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" by Cornelius completed the programme.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News

Address Providence, R. I.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT PROVES MOST DELIGHTFUL

The Boston Symphony orchestra last evening gave its fourth concert of the season in Infantry hall.

The program was: Franck, Symphony in D-minor, Lento; Allegro non troppo, Allegretto, Allegro non troppo; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5 (In E-flat major, Op. 73), Allegro, Adagio un poco moto, Rondo, Allegro ma non troppo; Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67.

Of the three movements of the Franck Symphony the second was undoubtedly the favorite last evening, with its lovely solo for the English horn, echoes of its sweet, melancholy theme, recurring again and again; the third movement in brilliant dramatic contrast to the two more sombde ones preceding, reaching a well developed climax exceptionally well handled.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the evening, played the Beethoven "Concerto in E-flat major, as few pianists are capable of playing it. Barring Paderewski in the height of his career, it is safe to say that no modern pianist has ever had greater command of the instrument, com- [illegible] such beauty of tone.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 1 - 1914

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Mme. Teresa Carreno, the brilliant veteran pianist, will be the soloist, and judging from the reception accorded to her in Boston and other cities, where she has recently played, her appearance will be one of the events in the course.

The beautiful symphony of the Belgian composer, Cesar Franck, the "Emperor Concerto," for pianoforte by Beethoven, to be played by Mme. Carreno, and the "Husitska Overture" of Dvorak comprise the works which Dr. Muck has placed on the programme.

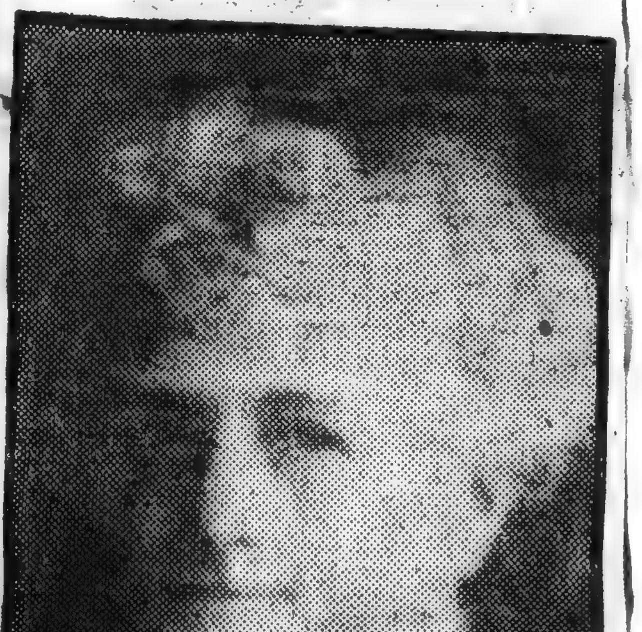
As further proof of the changes that have taken place, not only in music, but in the world's musical ear, it may be remarked that when Franck's Symphony was first performed in Boston, just 15 years ago, it was condemned as incomprehensible music; so greatly have the ears of the public been attuned to modern harmonic schemes since that time, however, to-day the symphony is not only comprehensible, but as compared with many modern works accepted without a thought, it is almost naive.

Cesar Franck, the composer, was one of the most interesting personalities in music in the last part of the 19th century. A Belgian by birth, he spent most of his life in Paris as a church organist and teacher. Fame came to him only at the end of his career, and yet through his music and his teaching he was undoubtedly the most potent influence in French music since Berlioz.

The symphony in question differs from the classical form, in that it has but three movements. It differs from the French music of to-day in that it is full-blooded. Its melodies are muscular. Although the Conservatoire in Paris in 1889, when it was first produced, condemned it because it made use of an English horn, it has achieved a popularity almost comparable with that of the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky and is constantly played throughout the world.

Mme. Carreno, who is now in her 61st year, is still the supreme mistress of her art. Already she has played the Beethoven concerto with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and her reported success has been as great as it ever was in the past.

The "Husitska" overture Dvorak has built on an old Hussite hymn, and it is



Mme. Teresa Carreno
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra
This Week.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date FEB 8 1914

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb "Symphony in D Minor," the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture to "The Bartered Bride."

Interest, however, will naturally center in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. She is making her first appearances in America at the regular Symphony Concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempel, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She is young and incidentally has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

From STAATSZEITUNG

Address: New York City.

Date FEB 8 - 1914

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das vierte Paar der Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzerte findet in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 19. reſp. am Nachmittag des 21. d. Mts. ſtatt. Soliſtin im Abendkonzert iſt die Sopranſängerin Frau Eliſabeth von Endert. Die Dame wird Lieder von Hugo Wolf, Strauß, Humperdinck und d'Albert ſingen. Die orcheſtrale Hauptdarbietung im Abendkonzert iſt Brahms' Vierte und im Nachmittagskonzert in dem kein Soliſt mitwirkt, Beethoven's Fünfte Symphonie.

From WORLD

Address: New York City.

Date

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor; the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride." Interest will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Mme. van Endert is making her first appearances in America at the regular symphony concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few performances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempl, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

From SUN

Address: New York

Date

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth and at the matinee concert in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The soloist at the evening concert will be a newcomer, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, now member of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The other orchestral numbers Thursday evening will be Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius's overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon and besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the programme includes Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date FEB 2 1914

Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth, and at the matinee concert, in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received, the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The soloist at the evening concert will be a newcomer—Elisabeth van Endert, of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin.

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date FEB 8 1914

Noted German Singer to Make Debut Here

Mme. Van Endert Will Sing with Boston Symphony at Academy.

Dr. Muck arranged a programme of great interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, February 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor, the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride."

Interest, however, will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is making her first appearance in America at the regular Symphony Concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few appearances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She has the reputation of being the foremost lyric soprano of Germany, belonging to that new school of singers which we know by such admirable examples as Frieda Hempel, Emmy Destinn, Julia Culp and Elena Gerhardt. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 14, 1914

SINGER ON STAGE WITH SYMPHONY

Mme. Van Endert, Soloist—Tschaikowsky's 4th Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Elisabeth van Endert was the soloist yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. She sang Wolf's "Verborgenheit"; the "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie" of Strauss; Humperdinck's charming song, "Es schaulken die Winde"; d'Albert's "Mediaval Hymn to Venus," heard for the first time here.

The orchestral compositions were Tschaikowsky's 4th Symphony; Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad."

A BEAUTIFUL VOICE

Mme. van Endert has a voice of beautiful quality. She was at her best in the songs of gentler mood which she undertook to interpret, as for instance, Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the cradle song of Strauss, the cradle song of Humperdinck, a delightful song and worthy of the composer of "Hansel and Gretel." Listening to Dr. Muck's conducting of the accompaniment of the passionate "Cacilie," one wondered that singers ever undertake this song without the splendid orchestral accompaniment. The song of d'Albert is an attempt at great things, but there is more bombast than inspiration in it. Mme. van En-

But [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was the performance of Tschaikowsky's symphony. No doubt the fourth symphony is weaker than [illegible] [illegible] fifth or the sixth, but [illegible] is a work of absorbing interest, none the less. One must take the ideas for what they are worth. They are often trivial and not at all symphonic in their character. Still, the unshakable sincerity and conviction of the composer, when felt as they were yesterday, are inescapable, and after Dr. Muck's remarkably characteristic reading, one said, "What an interesting work. New wine in old bottles!" And, of course, the scherzo, played with really wonderful finish and spirit, was instantaneously successful. The symphony was discovered by the conductor for his audiences. Yet Dr. Muck does not admire Tschaikowsky.

He does not admire him, but he plays him as Tschaikowsky would surely have been gratified to hear himself played. Dr. Muck and his orchestra are now at the place where they play almost anything, and it is enjoyed by the hearer. The scherzo of Dukas was also performed with surpassing brilliancy, although not all the efforts of this extraordinary orchestra and this remarkable conductor can make the work for us, other than "old hat." Cornelius' overture was good to hear again. Why has the opera not been heard more often in this country.

ADVERTISER

FEBRUARY 14

MISS VAN ENDERT SINGS IN AMERICA

GERMAN PRIMA DONNA WELL RECEIVED AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Glowing Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36.
Songs with orchestra:
  Hugo Wolf—"Verborgenheit" ("Retirement").
  Strauss—"Wiegenlied" (Cradle Song).
  Strauss—"Cacilie."
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"): Scherzo (after a Ballad by Goethe).
Songs with orchestra:
  Humperdinck—"Es schaukeln die Winde" ("The Winds Rock").
  d'Albert—Mediaeval Hymn to Venus.
Cornelius—Overture to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."
Soloist: Elisabeth Van Endert.

The orchestra at the Symphony concert gave a glowing performance of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F-minor, op. 36. The work was superbly played. The first movement, the finest of the four, was given a magnificent rendering, but the audience preferred the virtuoso playing of the third movement with its exquisite pizzicato passages for the strings.

After this movement Dr. Muck called his men to their feet to acknowledge the insistent applause, and again at the close of the work the entire orchestra shared in the applause.

Although the work was played only last year it has been given so infrequently in Boston that it is something of a novelty to the Symphony patrons and the work, easily grasped, made a quick appeal.

The first movement, the movement with the wonderful motive and the haunting waltz, is by far the finest in the work. The composer once spoke of it as rather hard for the audience to grasp at a first hearing, but that was before the days of the moderns. Now it seems clarity itself.

It is not the display portion of the Symphony and for that reason does not make the bid for applause that the third and fourth movements make. It is immeasurably superior to the second movement in which the theme is used for improvisation till one wearies of it.

Miss Van Endert sang for the first time in this country. By singing two songs, the "Wiegenlied" and the "Caecilie" that Miss Gerhardt has sung at these concerts she challenged comparison with that artist and she naturally challenges comparison with Miss Culp, who has recently sung Wolf and Strauss songs here, and with Miss Destinn, who like Miss Van Endert, first came to Boston from the German operatic stage via the Symphony concerts.

She has no such phenomenal voice as Miss Destinn, Miss Gerhardt, or Miss Culp. Possibly many will find that she cannot establish a mood, in singing a song, like Miss Culp, but the fact remains that she has a lovely voice although not an especially big one, and that she sings with authority. She attempted no such glowing rendition of the "Caecilie" as some singers, Dr. Wuellner for instance, and was perhaps at her best in the Humperdinck song which was not the finest music on the afternoon's programme.

She is an interesting singer, although not a tremendously great one and she has a charming personality and youth and grace which will help her in creating an American following.

The popular "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" by Cornelius completed the programme.

116

BOSTON GLOBE

FEBRUARY 14

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme van Endert Makes Her American Debut.

Charlottenburg Soprano Discloses Pure Lyric Voice and Fine Art.

The program of the 15th Symphony [illegible] follows. Dr Muck conducted. The soloist was Mme Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Charlottenburg Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Tschaikowsky	Fourth Symphony
Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf	"Verborgenheit"
Strauss	"Wiegenlied"
Strauss	"Caecilie"
Dukas	"The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck	Es Schaukeln die Winde
d'Albert	Mediaeval Hymn to Venus
Cornelius	Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"

Tschaikowsky's morbid melancholy in [illegible] fourth symphony becomes oppressive; it lacks the imagination, for example, of Byron; at times it is bombastic and sentimental. It is as though he called the world together to behold him miserable and thoroughly enjoyed it. According to his program of the first movement he wrestles with fate expecting to be beaten, nor is the spirit of the [illegible] representative of the best in the rich store of folk music of his own country, the final recipe which he offers for happiness, for a balm to woe. Nor should the rapidity and confusion of many pages be attributable wholly to Tschaikowsky's marriage of the Summer preceding the composition, an alliance unaccountable and speedily ended, but well nigh disastrous to his state of mind.

The composer wrote to his friend and patroness, Mrs Von Meck, of his hope for the scherzo. It is indisputably clever in design. The passage for plucked strings was played with incredible brilliance yesterday. There was the suggestion in Dr Muck's sweeping, yet exquisite nuances of a placid pool ruffled by sudden gusts of wind. The song for [illegible] in the slow movement reflects the [illegible] of Italian melody which flowed in Tschaikowsky's writings, a passage [illegible] hard to reconcile with empty and noisy measures in the final movement.

Mme van Endert, who has been a member of the Royal Operas in Dresden and Berlin, has a lyric voice, not of great power or emotional warmth, but pure, well produced, used with intelligence and made the expressive instrument of a fine musical taste. A certain patrician quality pervades her singing, yet not a patrician coldness. Mme van Endert's art would seem most to be enjoyed in a recital of songs with piano and in a more intimate hall. The Strauss cradle song was exquisite in tenderness, the Caecilie somewhat too heroic, although Dr Muck kept down the fine accompaniment. Humperdinck's lullaby had true intimacy and d'Albert's air was no more perfunctory than might have been expected. Venus [illegible] proved a greater inspiration to [illegible].

Mme van Endert gives further assurance that German vocal art has escaped Bayreuth's traditional declamation. She knows the value of the sustained and plastic melodic line, but does not [illegible] the interpretative value of the [illegible].

The performance of Dukas' scherzo was a brilliant one. Carl August Peter Cornelius, the friend and disciple of [illegible] served that good man to strange [illegible] when he induced him to press the production of "The Barber at Bagdad" at Weimar, if the opera continues as the overture begins.

BOSTON HERALD.

FEBRUARY 14.

BERLIN OPERA STAR HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Mme. van Endert Soloist at the Fifteenth Symphony Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted and Mme. Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, sang for the first time in America. The program was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, No. 4	Tschaikowsky
Songs with orchestra:
"Verborgenheit"	H. Wolf
"Wiegenlied"	Strauss
"Caecilie"	Strauss
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"	Dukas
Songs with orchestra:
"Es schaukeln die Winde"	Humperdinck
"Venushymne"	d'Albert
Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"	Cornelius

Tschaikowsky in a letter to his friend Mme. von Meck told her how he wished his fourth Symphony to be interpreted, and he went to the trouble of giving some of the themes in musical notation. [illegible] idea of the Symphony is [illegible] hangs over our head like the [illegible] Damocles, Fate that is jealous [illegible]ppiness and thwarts our aspir- [illegible] for life, what is it but a [illegible] and bitter disillusion-

---

From TRIBUNE

[illegible] movement expresses the melancholy that comes from memory of past days when the heart was young and the blood ran warm. The third portrays the capricious fancies of a man heated by wine, with excited nerves, thinking of nothing in particular. He recalls a street song heard long ago. There is the thought of a military band afar off. And in the finale the Byronic hero joins in the rough gaiety of the peasants who reck not of fate, are simple, joyous, unconcerned. Yet in this gaiety the hero hears the reminder of Fate. The conclusion of the whole matter is that the only pleasure in life is the joy in the happiness of others.

Neglected at first, condemned as too wild, too Russian, this symphony is now justly considered as one of Tschaikowsky's most characteristic works. It has been more fortunate than the "Pathetic" in that it has not been heard so often, and its wailing is not so familiar that it is an old story and not taken seriously. Nor is its Byronism as theatrical as that of the "Manfred" symphony and the "Pathetic." Perhaps more than the others, even the Fifth, it is a musical commentary on Tschaikowsky's moods as revealed in his letters.

There are the mannerisms, the tossing of a thematic fragment from one instrument to another, the too evident preparation for the return of a thematic section, the curious and at times childish embroidery of a theme when it appears for the second or third time, as the Italians of the old school found delight in varying the aria in repetition; there are also a few vulgar splashes, but these mannerisms are not so annoying as in other works of the composer, and they often add to the fantastical nature of the music.

The performance was eminently musical and dramatic, as was the performance of the Scherzo by Dukas. If the title "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" were not given to this Scherzo, and if there were no allusion to Goethe's poem, would anyone ever guess the source of inspiration? And is it clear in the mind of any hearer, just how the music, entertaining as it is, illustrates this particular poem?

The overture of Cornelius struck us yesterday as hardly worth while. There is constant talk in certain quarters about this "neglected" genius, but true genius is recognized sooner or later and "The Barber of Bagdad" is over 55 years old.

Mme. van Endert made a pleasant impression by the beauty of her middle tones and by the simplicity and modesty of her bearing. Her management of breath did not always allow her to phrase with advantage to poet and composer—this was especially noticeable in Wolf's song. Strauss's "Caecilie" demands a more dramatic voice and a more passionate delivery, but her singing of the two Cradle Songs moved the audience to hearty applause.

D'Albert's hymn to Venus may be "mediaeval," it is certainly not glowingly erotic. This Venus, though undraped, would not shock Mr. Anthony Comstock, nor would the Cyprian smile on Eugen d'Albert for this hymn in her honor, although he is a man of several wives.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 27, 28 will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 (repeated at the request of many), and Wagner's Siegfried Idyl.

Journal
Feb. 14, 1914

MME. VAN ENDERT MAKES A SUCCESS

German Soprano Shares Honors With the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck introduced a new German soprano, Mme. Elizabeth Boehm van Endert, at the Symphony concert yesterday. He was conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin when she made her debut at the German capital in 1910, and she was still a member of the Kaiser's own company when Dr. Muck returned to Boston. Now she holds the position of principal lyric soprano at the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, which is a rival of the Royal Opera.

Mme. van Endert made a very favorable impression. She measured up to the Symphony standard, not so much by beauty of voice as by the force of her musical feeling and the grace and dignity of her style. She is the happy possessor of that artistic finish which characterizes the best German singing. The German school does not favor the voice, but it certainly does produce an exceptionally large share of full-fledged artists. Thus Mme. van Endert's singing of the dramatic medieval hymn to Venus, from Eugen d'Albert's music setting of the Lothar comedy, "The Queen of Cyprus," was no less effective in its way than the caressing tone with which she gave the Humperdinck "Cradle Song," which was so roundly applauded. She also sang the Strauss "Cradle Song," and the same composer's "Caecilie," besides Wolf's "Retirement," all in German.

This new German soprano's handsome, stately appearance and unaffected manner also commended her to the audience. She has that trinity of professional graces—youth, beauty and talent.

But the orchestra also won a large share of the honors of the matinee by its brilliant performance of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and the Dukas tone picture, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a setting

---

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 13.

Considering Our Orchestra

Is it not an arguable proposition that, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained in dramatic power and, possibly, in verve, under its present conductor, these qualities have been developed somewhat—ever so slightly, to be sure—at the expense of the transcendant fineness of tone quality which it possessed in Mr Gericke's last years? That, one might have hoped, would remain the outstanding glory, the differentia, of the Boston band, not attainable in New York or elsewhere. Probably the numerous changes in personnel within the last ten years—some of them due to the retirement of aging members, who had been brought to this country in the '80s—have made difficult the preservation of the supreme euphony to which the band, under Mr Gericke, attained. Few, if any, other conductors have Mr. Gericke's fineness of ear, and Mr. Gericke aimed at perfection of tone quality; yet it would not be just to say that Mr. Gericke put tone above interpretation, though he evidently believed that delicacy of tonal nuance was the essence of musical expression, and, on the whole, to be preferred to dramatic strength, which is always in danger of becoming mere "effectiveness," or romantic ardor. New York and Chicago now have orchestras of first quality, to be sure, but Boston undoubtedly still leads, and is likely to do so while Dr. Muck remains. [Springfield Republican.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 8 - 1914

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19 and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth and at the matinee concert in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The solo artist at the evening concert will be a newcomer. Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, now a member of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The other orchestral numbers on Thursday evening will be Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius's overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." There will be no soloist on Saturday afternoon and besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the programme includes Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 8 1914

Esta 884

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" Suite five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children it has none the less more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 7 1914

Es 1884

THE fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given on February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains among other things a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" Suite, five pieces for children.

This concert will also introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin, and has filled engagements with the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck, and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the Overture to Cornelius's

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 9 19

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Frank's superb symphony in D minor, the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride." Interest, however, will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elizabeth van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is making her first appearances in America at the regular symphony concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few appearances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She is young and, incidentally, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date FEB 8 1914

* * *

The fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" suite, five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children, it has nonetheless more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is also a singer of high quality. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius' opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

* * *

[117]

From TRIBUNE

THE BOSTON GLOBE

FEBRUARY 14

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme van Endert Makes Her American Debut.

Charlottenburg Soprano Discloses Pure Lyric Voice and Fine Art.

The program of the 15th Symphony rehearsal [illegible] follows: Dr Muck conducted. The soloist was Mme Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Charlottenburg Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Tschaikowsky	Fourth Symphony
Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf	"Verborgenheit"
Strauss	"Wiegenlied"
Strauss	"Caecilie"
Dukas	"The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck	Es Schaukeln die Winde
d'Albert	Mediaeval Hymn to Venus
Cornelius	Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"

Tschaikowsky's morbid melancholy in [illegible] fourth symphony becomes oppressive; it lacks the imagination, for example, of Byron; at times it is bombastic and sentimental. It is as though he called the world together to behold him miserable and thoroughly enjoyed it. According to his program of the first movement he wrestles with fate expecting to be beaten, nor is the spirit of the last representative of the best in the rich store of folk music of his own country, the final recipe which he offers for happiness, for a balm to woe. Nor should the rapidity and confusion of many pages be attributable wholly to Tschaikowsky's marriage of the Summer preceding the composition, an alliance unaccountable and speedily ended, but well nigh disastrous to his state of mind.

The composer wrote to his friend and patroness, Mrs Von Meck, of his hope for the scherzo. It is indisputably clever in design. The passage for plucked strings was played with incredible brilliance yesterday. There was the suggestion in Dr Muck's sweeping, yet exquisite nuances of a placid pool ruffled by sudden gusts of wind. The song for oboe in the slow movement reflects the [illegible] of Italian melody which flowed in Tschaikowsky's writings, a passage which is hard to reconcile with empty and noisy measures in the final movement.

Mme van Endert, who has been a member of the Royal Operas in Dresden and Berlin, has a lyric voice, not of great power or emotional warmth, but pure, well produced, used with intelligence and made the expressive instrument of a fine musical taste. A certain patrician quality pervades her singing, yet not a patrician coldness. Mme van Endert's art would seem most to be enjoyed in a recital of songs with piano and in a more intimate hall. The Strauss cradle song was exquisite in tenderness, the Caecilie somewhat too heroic, although Dr Muck kept down the fine accompaniment. Humperdinck's lullaby had true intimacy and d'Albert's air was no more perfunctory than might have been expected. Venus has proved a greater inspiration to others.

Mme van Endert gives further assurance that German vocal art has escaped Bayreuth's traditional declamation. She knows the value of the sustained and plastic melodic line, but does not sacrifice the interpretative value of the text.

The performance of Dukas' scherzo was a brilliant one. Carl August Peter Cornelius, the friend and disciple of Liszt, moved that good man to strange generosity when he induced him to press the production of "The Barber at Bagdad" at Weimar, if the opera continues as the overture begins.

BOSTON HERALD.

FEBRUARY 14.

BERLIN OPERA STAR HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Mme. van Endert Soloist at the Fifteenth Symphony Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted and Mme. Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, sang for the first time in America. The program was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, No. 4	Tschaikowsy
Songs with orchestra:
"Verborgenheit"	H. Wolf
"Wiegenlied"	Strauss
"Caecilie"	Strauss
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"	Dukas
Songs with orchestra:
"Es schaukeln die Winde"	Humperdinck
"Venushymne"	d'Albert
Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"	Cornelius

Tschaikowsky in a letter to his friend Mme. von Meck told her how he wished his fourth Symphony to be interpreted, and he went to the trouble of giving some of the themes in musical notation. [illegible] leading idea of the Symphony is [illegible] that hangs over our head like the [illegible] of Damocles, Fate that is jealous of our happiness and thwarts our aspir[illegible]. As for life, what is it but a [illegible] alternation between disillusion-

---

The second movement expresses the melancholy that comes from memory of past days when the heart was young and the blood ran warm. The third portrays the capricious fancies of a man heated by wine, with excited nerves, thinking of nothing in particular. He recalls a street song heard long ago. There is the thought of a military band afar off. And in the finale the Byronic hero joins in the rough gaiety of the peasants who reck not of fate, are simple, joyous, unconcerned. Yet in this gaiety the hero hears the reminder of Fate. The conclusion of the whole matter is that the only pleasure in life is the joy in the happiness of others.

Neglected at first, condemned as too wild, too Russian, this symphony is now justly considered as one of Tschaikowsky's most characteristic works. It has been more fortunate than the "Pathetic" in that it has not been heard so often, and its wailing is not so familiar that it is an old story and not taken seriously. Nor is its Byronism as theatrical as that of the "Manfred" symphony and the "Pathetic." Perhaps more than the others, even the Fifth, it is a musical commentary on Tschaikowsky's moods as revealed in his letters.

There are the mannerisms, the tossing of a thematic fragment from one instrument to another, the too evident preparation for the return of a thematic section, the curious and at times childish embroidery of a theme when it appears for the second or third time, as the Italians of the old school found delight in varying the aria in repetitions; there are also a few vulgar splashes, but these mannerisms are not so annoying as in other works of the composer, and they often add to the fantastical nature of the music.

The performance was eminently musical and dramatic, as was the performance of the Scherzo by Dukas. If the title "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" were not given to this Scherzo, and if there were no allusion to Goethe's poem, would anyone ever guess the source of inspiration? And is it clear in the mind of any hearer, just how the music, entertaining as it is, illustrates this particular poem?

The overture of Cornelius struck us yesterday as hardly worth while. There is constant talk in certain quarters about this "neglected" genius, but true genius is recognized sooner or later and "The Barber of Bagdad" is over 55 years old.

Mme. van Endert made a pleasant impression by the beauty of her middle tones and by the simplicity and modesty of her bearing. Her management of breath did not always allow her to phrase with advantage to poet and composer—this was especially noticeable in Wolf's song. Strauss's "Caecilie" demands a more dramatic voice and a more passionate delivery, but her singing of the two Cradle Songs moved the audience to hearty applause.

D'Albert's hymn to Venus may be "mediaeval," it is certainly not glowingly erotic. This Venus, though undraped, would not shock Mr. Anthony Comstock, nor would the Cyprian smile on Eugen d'Albert for this hymn in her honor, although he is a man of several wives.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 27, 28 will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 (repeated at the request of many), and Wagner's Siegfried Idyl.

Journal
Feb. 14, 191

MME. VAN ENDERT MAKES A SUCCESS

German Soprano Shares Honors With the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck introduced a new German soprano, Mme. Elizabeth Boehm van Endert, at the Symphony concert yesterday. He was conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin when she made her debut at the German capital in 1910, and she was still a member of the Kaiser's own company when Dr. Muck returned to Boston. Now she holds the position of principal lyric soprano at the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, which is a rival of the Royal Opera.

Mme. van Endert made a very favorable impression. She measured up to the Symphony standard, not so much by beauty of voice as by the force of her musical feeling and the grace and dignity of her style. She is the happy possessor of that artistic finish which characterizes the best German singing. The German school does not favor the voice, but it certainly does produce an exceptionally large share of full-fledged artists. Thus Mme. van Endert's singing of the dramatic medieval hymn to Venus, from Eugen d'Albert's music setting of the Lothar comedy, "The Queen of Cyprus," was no less effective in its way than the caressing tone with which she gave the Humperdinck "Cradle Song," which was so roundly applauded. She also sang the Strauss "Cradle Song," and the same composer's "Caecilie," besides Wolf's "Retirement," all in German.

This new German soprano's handsome, stately appearance and unaffected manner also commended her to the audience. She has that trinity of professional graces—youth, beauty and talent.

But the orchestra also won a large share of the honors of the matinee by its brilliant performance of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and the Dukas tone picture, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a setting [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 13.

Considering Our Orchestra

Is it not an arguable proposition that, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained in dramatic power and, possibly, in verve, under its present conductor, these qualities have been developed somewhat—ever so slightly, to be sure—at the expense of the transcendant fineness of tone quality which it possessed in Mr Gericke's last years? That, one might have hoped, would remain the outstanding glory, the differentia, of the Boston band, not attainable in New York or elsewhere. Probably the numerous changes in personnel within the last ten years—some of them due to the retirement of aging members, who had been brought to this country in the '80s—have made difficult the preservation of the supreme euphony to which the band, under Mr Gericke, attained. Few, if any, other conductors have Mr. Gericke's fineness of ear, and Mr. Gericke aimed at perfection of tone quality; yet it would not be just to say that Mr. Gericke put tone above interpretation, though he evidently believed that delicacy of tonal nuance was the essence of musical expression, and, on the whole, to be preferred to dramatic strength, which is always in danger of becoming mere "effectiveness," or romantic ardor. New York and Chicago now have orchestras of first quality, to be sure, but Boston undoubtedly still leads, and is likely to do so while Dr. Muck remains. [Springfield Republican.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 8 - 1914

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19 and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth and at the matinee concert in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The solo artist at the evening concert will be a newcomer. Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, now a member of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The other orchestral numbers on Thursday evening will be Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius's overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." There will be no soloist on Saturday afternoon and besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the programme includes Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

Es 1884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 8 1914

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" Suite five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children it has none the less more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

Esta 884

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 7 1914

THE fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given on February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains among other things a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" Suite, five pieces for children.

This concert will also introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin, and has filled engagements with the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck, and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4, and the other orchestral work will be Overture to Cornelius's [illegible]

Es 1884

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 9 191

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Frank's superb symphony in D minor, the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride." Interest, however, will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elizabeth van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is making her first appearances in America at the regular symphony concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few appearances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She is young and, incidentally, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date EB 8 1914

* * *

The fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" suite, five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children, it has nonetheless more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is also a singer of high quality. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius' opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

* * *

1884

THE BOSTON GLOBE

FEBRUARY 14

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme van Endert Makes Her American Debut.

Charlottenburg Soprano Discloses Pure Lyric Voice and Fine Art.

The program of the 15th Symphony [illegible] follows: Dr Muck conducted. The soloist was Mme Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Charlottenburg Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Tschaikowsky ....Fourth Symphony
Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf ...."Verborgenheit"
Strauss ...."Wiegenlied"
Strauss ...."Caecilie"
Dukas ...."The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck.........Es Schaukeln die Winde
d'Albert ....Mediaeval Hymn to Venus
Cornelius . Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"

Tschaikowsky's morbid melancholy in [illegible] fourth symphony becomes oppressive; it lacks the imagination, for example, of Byron; at times it is bombastic and sentimental. It is as though he called the world together to behold him miserable and thoroughly enjoyed it. According to his program of the first movement he wrestles with fate expecting to be beaten, nor is the spirit of the last representative of the best in the rich store of folk music of his own country, the final recipe which he offers for happiness, for a balm to woe. Nor should the rapidity and confusion of many pages be attributable wholly to Tschaikowsky's marriage of the Summer preceding the composition, an alliance unaccountable and speedily ended, but well nigh disastrous to his state of mind.

The composer wrote to his friend and patroness, Mrs Von Meck, of his hope for the scherzo. It is indisputably clever in design. The passage for plucked strings was played with incredible brilliance yesterday. There was the suggestion in Dr Muck's sweeping, yet exquisite nuances of a placid pool ruffled by sudden gusts of wind. The song for oboe in the slow movement reflects the [illegible] of Italian melody which flowed in [illegible]haikowsky's writings, a passage which is hard to reconcile with empty and noisy measures in the final movement.

Mme van Endert, who has been a member of the Royal Operas in Dresden and Berlin, has a lyric voice, not of great power or emotional warmth, but pure, well produced, used with intelligence and made the expressive instrument of a fine musical taste. A certain patrician quality pervades her singing, yet not a patrician coldness. Mme van Endert's art would seem most to be enjoyed in a recital of songs with piano and in a more intimate hall. The Strauss cradle song was exquisite in tenderness, the Caecilie somewhat too heroic, although Dr Muck kept down the fine accompaniment. Humperdinck's lullaby had true intimacy and d'Albert's air was no more perfunctory than might have been expected. Venus has proved a greater inspiration to others.

Mme van Endert gives further assurance that German vocal art has escaped Bayreuth's traditional declamation. She knows the value of the sustained and plastic melodic line, but does not sacrifice the interpretative value of the text.

The performance of Dukas' scherzo was a brilliant one. Carl August Peter Cornelius, the friend and disciple of Liszt, moved that good man to strange generosity when he induced him to press the production of "The Barber at Bagdad" at Weimar, if the opera continues as the overture begins.

From TRIBUNE

The second movement expresses the melancholy that comes from memory of past days when the heart was young and the blood ran warm. The third portrays the capricious fancies of a man heated by wine, with excited nerves, thinking of nothing in particular. He recalls a street song heard long ago. There is the thought of a military band afar off. And in the finale the Byronic hero joins in the rough gaiety of the peasants who reck not of fate, are simple, joyous, unconcerned. Yet in this gaiety the hero hears the reminder of Fate. The conclusion of the whole matter is that the only pleasure in life is the joy in the happiness of others.

Neglected at first, condemned as too wild, too Russian, this symphony is now justly considered as one of Tschaikowsky's most characteristic works. It has been more fortunate than the "Pathetic" in that it has not been heard so often, and its wailing is not so familiar that it is an old story and not taken seriously. Nor is its Byronism as theatrical as that of the "Manfred" symphony and the "Pathetic." Perhaps more than the others, even the Fifth, it is a musical commentary on Tschaikowsky's moods as revealed in his letters.

There are the mannerisms, the tossing of a thematic fragment from one instrument to another, the too evident preparation for the return of a thematic section, the curious and at times childish embroidery of a theme when it appears for the second or third time, as the Italians of the old school found delight in varying the aria in repetition; there are also a few vulgar splashes, but these mannerisms are not so annoying as in other works of the composer, and they often add to the fantastical nature of the music.

The performance was eminently musical and dramatic, as was the performance of the Scherzo by Dukas. If the title "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" were not given to this Scherzo, and if there were no allusion to Goethe's poem, would anyone ever guess the source of inspiration? And is it clear in the mind of any hearer, just how the music, entertaining as it is, illustrates this particular poem?

The overture of Cornelius struck us yesterday as hardly worth while. There is constant talk in certain quarters about this "neglected" genius, but true genius is recognized sooner or later and "The Barber of Bagdad" is over 55 years old.

Mme. van Endert made a pleasant impression by the beauty of her middle tones and by the simplicity and modesty of her bearing. Her management of breath did not always allow her to phrase with advantage to poet and composer—this was especially noticeable in Wolf's song. Strauss's "Caecilie" demands a more dramatic voice and a more passionate delivery, but her singing of the two Cradle Songs moved the audience to hearty applause.

D'Albert's hymn to Venus may be "mediaeval," it is certainly not glowingly erotic. This Venus, though undraped, would not shock Mr. Anthony Comstock, nor would the Cyprian smile on Eugen d'Albert for this hymn in her honor, although he is a man of several wives.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 27, 28 will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 (repeated at the request of many), an Wagner's Siegfried Idyl.

BOSTON HERALD.

FEBRUARY 14.

BERLIN OPERA STAR HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Mme. van Endert Soloist at the Fifteenth Symphony Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted and Mme. Elisabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, sang for the first time in America. The program was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, No. 4..Tschaikowsy
Songs with orchestra:
"Verborgenheit"...............H. Wolf
"Wiegenlied"................... Strauss
"Caecilie" ....Strauss
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice".. Dukas
Songs with orchestra:
"Es schaukeln die Winde"..Humperdinck
"Venushymne"................ d'Albert
Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad".. Cornelius

Tschaikowsky in a letter to his friend Mme. von Meck told her how he wished his fourth Symphony to be interpreted, and he went to the trouble of giving some of the themes in musical notation. [illegible]eading idea of the Symphony is [illegible] that hangs over our head like the [illegible] of Damocles, Fate that is jealous of our happiness and thwarts our aspir[illegible]. As for life, what is it but a [illegible]ternation between disillusion-

---

Journal
Feb. 14. 1911

MME. VAN ENDERT MAKES A SUCCESS

German Soprano Shares Honors With the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck introduced a new German soprano, Mme. Elizabeth Boehm van Endert, at the Symphony concert yesterday. He was conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin when she made her debut at the German capital in 1910, and she was still a member of the Kaiser's own company when Dr. Muck returned to Boston. Now she holds the position of principal lyric soprano at the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, which is a rival of the Royal Opera.

Mme. van Endert made a very favorable impression. She measured up to the Symphony standard, not so much by beauty of voice as by the force of her musical feeling and the grace and dignity of her style. She is the happy possessor of that artistic finish which characterizes the best German singing. The German school does not favor the voice, but it certainly does produce an exceptionally large share of full-fledged artists. Thus Mme. van Endert's singing of the dramatic medieval hymn to Venus, from Eugen d'Albert's musical setting of the Lothar comedy, "The Queen of Cyprus," was no less effective in its way than the caressing tones with which she gave the Humperdinck "Cradle Song," which was so roundly applauded. She also sang the Strauss "Cradle Song," and the same composer's "Caecilie," besides Wolf's "Retirement," all in German.

This new German soprano's handsome, stately appearance and unaffected manner also commended her to the audience. She has that trinity of professional graces—youth, beauty and talent.

But the orchestra also won a large share of the honors of the matinee by its brilliant performance of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony and the Dukas tone picture, "The Sorcerer's [illegible]prentice," a setting [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 13.

Considering Our Orchestra

Is it not an arguable proposition that, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained in dramatic power and, possibly, in verve, under its present conductor, these qualities have been developed somewhat—ever so slightly, to be sure—at the expense of the transcendant fineness of tone quality which it possessed in Mr Gericke's last years? That, one might have hoped, would remain the outstanding glory, the differentia, of the Boston band, not attainable in New York or elsewhere. Probably the numerous changes in personnel within the last ten years—some of them due to the retirement of aging members, who had been brought to this country in the '80s—have made difficult the preservation of the supreme euphony to which the band, under Mr Gericke, attained. Few, if any, other conductors have Mr. Gericke's fineness of ear, and Mr. Gericke aimed at perfection of tone quality; yet it would not be just to say that Mr. Gericke put tone above interpretation, though he evidently believed that delicacy of tonal nuance was the essence of musical expression, and, on the whole, to be preferred to dramatic strength, which is always in danger of becoming mere "effectiveness," or romantic ardor. New York and Chicago now have orchestras of first quality, to be sure, but Boston undoubtedly still leads, and is likely to do so while Dr. Muck remains. [Springfield Republican.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 8 - 1914
Es 1884

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 19 and Saturday afternoon, February 21. At the evening concert the symphony will be Brahms's Fourth and at the matinee concert in response to many requests which Dr. Muck has received the symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth. The solo artist at the evening concert will be a newcomer. Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, now a member of the Charlottenburg Opera, Berlin. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The other orchestral numbers on Thursday evening will be Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius's overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." There will be no soloist on Saturday afternoon and besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the programme includes Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible]B 8 1914
Esta 884

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" Suite five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children it has none the less more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

---

om BULLETIN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.
te FEB 7 1914
1884

THE fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given on February 16, [illegible]omises to be more than usually in[illegible]resting. It contains among other things [illegible] delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, [illegible] of the younger French composers, [illegible]ose work in recent years has at[illegible]cted much attention. This is what [illegible] calls the "Mother Goose" Suite, five pieces for children.

This concert will also introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin, and has filled engagements with the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck, and Eugen d'Albert. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4, and the other orchestral work will be [illegible] Overture to Cornelius's

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 9 19[illegible]

Dr. Muck has made a programme of extraordinary interest for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 20. The orchestral numbers comprise Cesar Frank's superb symphony in D minor, the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration," and Smetana's brilliant overture, "The Sold Bride." Interest, however, will naturally centre in the soloist of the evening, Madame Elizabeth van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Madame van Endert is making her first appearances in America at the regular symphony concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and she will be soloist with the orchestra throughout the February trip. She comes to America for a few appearances under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who engaged her in the belief that she would be a most valuable addition to the musical life of this country. She is young and, incidentally, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date [illegible] 8 1914
E 1884

* * *

The fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, February 16, promises to be more than usually interesting. It contains, among other things, a delightful novelty by Maurice Ravel, one of the younger French composers, whose work in recent years has attracted much attention. This is what he calls the "Mother Goose" suite, five pieces for children. While it will be admitted that the music is a bit sophisticated for children, it has nonetheless more than an ordinary amount of delicate charm.

As already announced, the Boston Symphony at this concert will introduce to Philadelphia a new singer in Elisabeth van Endert, who has just arrived in this country to fill a series of engagements with the orchestra. Madame van Endert is now the principal lyric soprano in the opera in Charlottenburg, Berlin. Previous to this engagement she was the principal lyric soprano in the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Royal Opera, Dresden. She is young and has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is also a singer of high quality. She will sing songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and Eugen d'Albert. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's in F Minor No. 4 and the other orchestral work will be the overture to Cornelius' opera, "The Barber of Bagdad."

* * *

The [illegible] and Most Comp[illegible]
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The First Established and Most Complete

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 14, 1914

MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

A CONCERT BY DAY AND OPERA BY NIGHT

Mme. Van Endert Proves a Pleasurable, but Not a Remarkable, Singer — Familiar Pieces Upon Dr. Muck's Programme, and One That Is Over-Familiar—Tschaikowsky and Formulas—"The Secret of Suzanne" at the Opera, with Mr. Scotti to Savor It

FOR the most part, the music sung, played and heard in public in this town yesterday gave easy pleasure—each piece according to its kind and to the abilities of those concerned in the performance of it. Being so pleasured and usually with that which was already familiar to them, the audiences in concert hall and opera house applauded plentifully and went their way content. In Symphony Hall, in the afternoon Dr. Muck and the orchestra played pieces that have stood long in its repertory and that are warranted to please whenever they reappear on its programmes—Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony with the scherzo pizzicato; Dukas's tonal tale of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" his broom and his flood; and the overture to Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," which, the less often it is actually heard, waxes in the note that tradition has puzzingly woven about it. Between whiles Mme. van Endert, a new singer from the opera houses of Berlin, sang six songs with orchestra and made pleasant, if in no wise remarkable impression in them. So much for the afternoon. In the evening at the Opera House, "Pagliacci" was repeated with the familiar cast—Mr. Ferrari-Fontana and the rest—that have carried Leoncavallo's fervid and fluent medodrama through the season; and Wolf-Ferrari's comedietta, "The Secret of Suzanne," an operatic steed of very different color, mettle and stride, was sung and acted for the first time this season. Once more Mr. Scotti and Miss Nielsen took the parts of the jealous husband and his perversely playful spouse.

Mme. van Endert

The newcomer of the day was Mme. van Endert, a young singer who has made her way in the opera houses of Berlin, who is paying her first visit to America and who was persuaded to make it that she might sing at a series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. She is hardly past her first youth; she keeps her blonde comeliness; and she enhanced it yesterday by a rich, yet simple, frock of black velvet. In the good German fashion she appeared hatless and gloveless, and she bore herself with an elastic ease and composure and with an unaffected naturalness that gave hardly a hint of a singer in the presence of an audience. Mme. van Endert was pleasant and ingratiating to see and her audience broke into a ripple of welcoming applause. Then she set to her singing—of three orchestrated songs familiar by much repetition at the Symphony Concerts—Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Lullaby" and his "Cecilia." Beyond question Dr. Muck is right in his insistence that songs sung in a Symphony Concert must be sung with orchestra. Otherwise they sort ill with the rest of the pieces, with the great spaces of the hall, with the general quality and atmosphere of the occasion. Yet by the same token he could encourage the singers to a wider choice that might lead them beyond a few over-familiar pieces of Strauss, Wolf and Wagner. Mme. van Endert indeed set them an example when she wandered away into a second lullaby—this time by Humperdinck—and into a setting of a "Hymn to Venus" that d'Albert clothed with music for a romantic play. True, in words and music Humperdinck's song oozed a creamy and oversweet sentimentality that made it musically as cloying as some of the desserts that adorn German dinner tables, and d'Albert's hymn was no more than routine composing dutifully done. But in the narrow field of orchestrated songs, flowers are hard to find. Perhaps the purists are right—Strauss to the contrary notwithstanding—when they say that a song orchestrated ceases to be a song at all.

As the freshness of youth is in Mme. van Endert's aspect, so is it also in her tones. Her voice is a light, clear, supple, suave soprano, all youthful timbres and bright lustres. It is delicate in body and in quality, and it clearly resents the smallest effort to force it. Accordingly when Mme. van Endert sings a song of outspoken and mounting passion like Strauss's "Cäcilie" or when she would make long and arduous vocal ascents and fervent climaxes, as in d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus," she overtaxes it. Then her tones are not always steady; they lose their evenness, and they become a little shrill, to the detriment of the softness, freshness and brightness that are their best traits. On the other hand, in songs that exact no more than her voice will bear Mme. van Endert's singing gives the pleasure of light, bright tones, deftly ordered and imaginatively shaded, of clear and sensitive intelligence, with melody, phrase, rhythm and accent, and of the charm of musing or sentiment expressing itself in tones. The pleasure, however, came rather in miniature in the great spaces of Symphony Hall, and in the general remoteness of the audience from the singer. She was too skilful and intelligent not to make her tones carry when they were lightest and softest, but there are shadings of feeling that evaporate long before they have traversed that long tunnel for music. In a song recital in a little hall, with "Hymns to Venus" and "Cecilias" well in the background, Mme. van Endert might seem a much more unusual singer than she did yesterday. Finesse is her trade, and the quality of her voice exacts it and shines in it.

The Orchestral Pieces

Along with two or three of these orches[illegible]gs, possibly Dukas's scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" might wisely rest for a season or two on the shelves of the orchestra's library. The music displays its virtuosity and it did little miracles of transition, of shading, of rhythm, euphony and delineative suggestion in the performance yesterday. The spice of mischievous and ironic wit in the tale in tones may make it particularly savory to Dr. Muck, and the telling is so amusing to the ear and so transparent to the following imagination that hearers rejoice in it. Yesterday, as it seemed, the amusement was now and then a little routine. Most of us know all the "points" in Dukas's music and not a few of those in the orchestra's playing of it. Recollection would be pleasantly dim again, if the scherzo were "retired" for a season or two; while, if Dukas should be represented, as indeed he deserves, on the programmes, his dance-poem, "The Peri," excels even Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome."

From another point of view it is wise also that Cornelius's overture to his opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," be not too often taken down from its corner. Who first invented the fable that Cornelius was a notable but neglected composer and that his opera teemed musically with light sentiment, gay humor, high spirits and alert imagination, none may surely say. Circumstantial evidence points to Liszt as the guilty man, with sundry German reviewers and essayists as accessories after the fact. Mere cynics in Munich have averred that these pundits were so busy with their propaganda that they seldom had leisure to hear their masterpiece or the yet more masterly overture to it. Perhaps, if they did, they would be as disillusioned as were many ears yesterday after the first pungent and pattering music of the barber himself was done. After all forty brilliant measures do not make a masterpiece.

As the doubters of Munich have their sport with the rest of the word over the music of Cornelius, so also have the Parisians with the music of Tschaikowsky. French ears have never been kind to it, and nowadays they seldom hear it. They have even waited—these confident Parisians—for others to become like-minded with them. Tschaikowsky's music will not wear, they have said, and yesterday there did seem to be a seam here and a fray there visible and audible in this fourth symphony. Somehow the skill and the imagination of Dr. Muck and the orchestra with the music seemed more interesting than its intrinsic quality. How adroitly they made the melancholy waltz play in and out of the first movement; how swiftly and bitingly ran the pizzicato passages—staccati and the rest—for the strings in the scherzo; how the brasses pealed out the rather melodramatic proclamationc of dooming fate.

All the eloquence of the music spoke out of the performance; yet, for once at lest, it seemed the eloquence of formula. No; there is no happens for man foredoomed by Fate to everlasting melancholy. Riot as he may through a finale of Russia folk-tunes, yet does Fate beat him down. March up and down life as he may, yet will Fate dog his steps. He remembers old pleasures—in modo di canizona—and Fate straightway embitters the song. He takes refuge in sensuous joys—moderato con anima in movemento di valse—and Fate springs out of them upon him. All this is the imaginative formula of most of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, and the wonder is that it has so long stirred the cheerful and springy American temperament. Perhaps our ears and emotions stir to it because it is different; perhaps also they answer because Tschaikowsky is so deeply and sincerely moved with it himself. Much more surely they answer because his music is so clear of melody, so vivid rhythm, so rich in color and so transparent of design. On its formal side it also runs by a formula that has waste places and now and then cheap and common spots in it. No doubt, as the thorough-going say, they are the points of repose in the music. Perhaps; but in spite of those same it is possible that our musical generation in America has been overfed with Tschaikowsky.

EVENING RECORD.

FEBRUARY 14

MISS VAN ENDERT SINGS IN AMERICA

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36.
Songs with orchestra:
  Hugo Wolf—"Verborgenheit" ("Retirement").
  Strauss—"Wiegenlied" (Cradle Song).
  Strauss—"Cacilie."
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"): Scherzo (after a Ballad by Goethe).
Cornelius—Overture to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."
Soloist: Elisabeth Van Endert.

The orchestra at the Symphony concert gave a glowing performance of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F-minor, op. 36. The work was superbly played. The first movement, the finest of the four, was given a magnificent rendering, but the audience preferred the virtuoso playing of the third movement with its exquisite pizzicato passages for the strings.

After this movement Dr. Muck called his men to their feet to acknowledge the insistent applause, and again at the close of the work the entire orchestra shared in the applause.

Miss Van Endert sang for the first time in this country. By singing two songs, the "Wiegenlied" and the "Caecilie" that Miss Gerhardt has sung at these concerts she challenged comparison with that artist and she naturally challenges comparison with Miss Culp, who has recently sung Wolf and Strauss songs here, and with Miss Destinn, who like Miss Van Endert, first came to Boston from the German operatic stage via the Symphony concerts.

She has no such phenomenal voice as Miss Destinn, Miss Gerhardt, or Miss Culp.

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT,
Brilliant soprano who made her American debut at the Symphony rehearsal.

Possibly many will find that she cannot establish a mood, in singing a song, like Miss Culp, but the fact remains that she has a lovely voice although not an especially big one, and that she sings with authority. She attempted no such glowing rendition of the "Caecilie" as some singers, Dr. Wuellner for instance, and was perhaps at her best in the Humperdinck song which was not the finest music on the afternoon's programme.

She is an interesting singer, although not a tremendously great one and she has a charming personality and youth and grace which will help her in creating an American following.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUA

WILL SING AT LYRIC FEBRUARY 18

Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano Royal Opera House, Berlin, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra here.

The F... and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The First Established and Most Complete

TRANSCRIPT.

FEBRUARY 14, 1914

MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

A CONCERT BY DAY AND OPERA BY NIGHT

Mme. Van Endert Proves a Pleasurable, but Not a Remarkable, Singer — Familiar Pieces Upon Dr. Muck's Programme, and One That Is Over-Familiar—Tschaikowsky and Formulas—"The Secret of Suzanne" at the Opera, with Mr. Scotti to Savor It

FOR the most part, the music sung, played and heard in public in this town yesterday gave easy pleasure—each piece according to its kind and to the abilities of those concerned in the performance of it. Being so pleasured and usually with that which was already familiar to them, the audiences in concert hall and opera house applauded plentifully and went their way content. In Symphony Hall, in the afternoon Dr. Muck and the orchestra played pieces that have stood long in its repertory and that are warranted to please whenever they reappear on its programmes—Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony with the scherzo pizzicato; Dukas's tonal tale of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" his broom and his flood; and the overture to Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," which, the less often it is actually heard, waxes in the note that tradition has puzzingly woven about it. Between whiles Mme. van Endert, a new singer from the opera houses of Berlin, sang six songs with orchestra and made pleasant, if in no wise remarkable impression in them. So much for the afternoon. In the evening at the Opera House, "Pagliacci" was repeated with the familiar cast—Mr. Ferrari-Fontana and the rest—that have carried Leoncavallo's fervid and fluent medodrama through the season; and Wolf-Ferrari's comedietta, "The Secret of Suzanne," an operatic steed of very different color, mettle and stride, was sung and acted for the first time this season. Once more Mr. Scotti and Miss Nielsen took the parts of the jealous husband and his perversely playful spouse.

Mme. van Endert

The newcomer of the day was Mme. van Endert, a young singer who has made her way in the opera houses of Berlin, who is paying her first visit to America and who was persuaded to make it that she might sing at a series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. She is hardly past her first youth; she keeps her blonde comeliness; and she enhanced it yesterday by a rich, yet simple, frock of black velvet. In the good German fashion she appeared hatless and gloveless, and she bore herself with an elastic ease and composure and with an unaffected naturalness that gave hardly a hint of a singer in the presence of an audience. Mme. van Endert was pleasant and ingratiating to see and her audience broke into a ripple of welcoming applause. Then she set to her singing—of three orchestrated songs familiar by much repetition at the Symphony Concerts—Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Lullaby" and his "Cecilia." Beyond question Dr. Muck is right in his insistence that songs sung in a Symphony Concert must be sung with orchestra. Otherwise they sort ill with the rest of the pieces, with the great spaces of the hall, with the general quality and atmosphere of the occasion. Yet by the same token he could encourage the singers to a wider choice that might lead them beyond a few over-familiar pieces of Strauss, Wolf and Wagner. Mme. van Endert indeed set them an example when she wandered away into a second lullaby—this time by Humperdinck—and into a setting of a "Hymn to Venus" that d'Albert clothed with music for a romantic play. True, in words and music Humperdinck's song oozed a creamy and over-sweet sentimentality that made it musically as cloying as some of the desserts that adorn German dinner tables, and d'Albert's hymn was no more than routine composing dutifully done. But in the narrow field of orchestrated songs, flowers are hard to find. Perhaps the purists are right—Strauss to the contrary notwithstanding—when they say that a song orchestrated ceases to be a song at all.

As the freshness of youth is in Mme. van Endert's aspect, so is it also in her tones. Her voice is a light, clear, supple, suave soprano, all youthful timbres and bright lustres. It is delicate in body and in quality, and it clearly resents the smallest effort to force it. Accordingly when Mme. van Endert sings a song of outspoken and mounting passion like Strauss's "Cäcilie" or when she would make long and arduous vocal ascents and fervent climaxes, as in d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus," she overtaxes it. Then her tones are not always steady; they lose their evenness, and they become a little shrill, to the detriment of the softness, freshness and brightness that are their best traits. On the other hand, in songs that exact no more than her voice will bear Mme. van Endert's singing gives the pleasure of light, bright tones, deftly ordered and imaginatively shaded, of clear and sensitive intelligence, with melody, phrase, rhythm and accent, and of the charm of musing or sentiment expressing itself in tones. The pleasure, however, came rather in miniature in the great spaces of Symphony Hall, and in the general remoteness of the audience from the singer. She was too skilful and intelligent not to make her tones carry when they were lightest and softest, but there are shadings of feeling that evaporate long before they have traversed that long tunnel for music. In a song recital in a little hall, with "Hymns to Venus" and "Cecilias" well in the background, Mme. van Endert might seem a much more unusual singer than she did yesterday. Finesse is her trade, and the quality of her voice exacts it and shines in it.

The Orchestral Pieces

Along with two or three of these orches-[illegible]gs, possibly Dukas's scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" might wisely rest for a season or two on the shelves of the orchestra's library. The music displays its virtuosity and it did little miracles of transition, of shading, of rhythm, euphony and delineative suggestion in the performance yesterday. The spice of mischievous and ironic wit in the tale in tones may make it particularly savory to Dr. Muck, and the telling is so amusing to the ear and so transparent to the following imagination that hearers rejoice in it. Yesterday, as it seemed, the amusement was now and then a little routine. Most of us know all the "points" in Dukas's music and not a few of those in the orchestra's playing of it. Recollection would be pleasantly dim again, if the scherzo were "retired" for a season or two; while, if Dukas should be represented, as indeed he deserves, on the programmes, his dance-poem, "The Peri," excels even Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome."

From another point of view it is wise also that Cornelius's overture to his opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," be not too often taken down from its corner. Who first invented the fable that Cornelius was a notable but neglected composer and that his opera teemed musically with light sentiment, gay humor, high spirits and alert imagination, none may surely say. Circumstantial evidence points to Liszt as the guilty man, with sundry German reviewers and essayists as accessories after the fact. Mere cynics in Munich have averred that these pundits were so busy with their propaganda that they seldom had leisure to hear their masterpiece or the yet more masterly overture to it. Perhaps, if they did, they would be as disillusioned as were many ears yesterday after the first pungent and pattering music of the barber himself was done. After all forty brilliant measures do not make a masterpiece.

As the doubters of Munich have their sport with the rest of the word over the music of Cornelius, so also have the Parisians with the music of Tschaikowsky. French ears have never been kind to it, and nowadays they seldom hear it. They have even waited—these confident Parisians—for others to become like-minded with them. Tschaikowsky's music will not wear, they have said, and yesterday there did seem to be a seam here and a fray there visible and audible in this fourth symphony. Somehow the skill and the imagination of Dr. Muck and the orchestra with the music seemed more interesting than its intrinsic quality. How adroitly they made the melancholy waltz play in and out of the first movement; how swiftly and bitingly ran the pizzicato passages—staccati and the rest—for the strings in the scherzo; how the brasses pealed out the rather melodramatic proclamationc of dooming fate.

All the eloquence of the music spoke out of the performance; yet, for once at lest, it seemed the eloquence of formula. No; there is no happens for man foredoomed by Fate to everlasting melancholy. Riot as he may through a finale of Russia folk-tunes, yet does Fate beat him down. March up and down life as he may, yet will Fate dog his steps. He remembers old pleasures—in modo di canizona—and Fate straightway embitters the song. He takes refuge in sensuous joys—moderato con anima in movemento di valse—and Fate springs out of them upon him. All this is the imaginative formula of most of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, and the wonder is that it has so long stirred the cheerful and springy American temperament. Perhaps our ears and emotions stir to it because it is different; perhaps also they answer because Tschaikowsky is so deeply and sincerely moved with it himself. Much more surely they answer because his music is so clear of melody, so vivid rhythm, so rich in color and so transparent of design. On its formal side it also runs by a formula that has waste places and now and then cheap and common spots in it. No doubt, as the thorough-going say, they are the points of repose in the music. Perhaps; but in spite of those same it is possible that our musical generation in America has been overfed with Tschaikowsky.

EVENING RECORD,

FEBRUARY 14

MISS VAN ENDERT SINGS IN AMERICA

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36.
Songs with orchestra:
  Hugo Wolf—"Verborgenheit" ("Retirement").
  Strauss—"Wiegenlied" (Cradle Song).
  Strauss—"Cacilie."
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"): Scherzo (after a Ballad by Goethe).
Cornelius—Overture to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."
Soloist: Elisabeth Van Endert.

The orchestra at the Symphony concert gave a glowing performance of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, F-minor, op. 36. The work was superbly played. The first movement, the finest of the four, was given a magnificent rendering, but the audience preferred the virtuoso playing of the third movement with its exquisite pizzicato passages for the strings.

After this movement Dr. Muck called his men to their feet to acknowledge the insistent applause, and again at the close of the work the entire orchestra shared in the applause.

Miss Van Endert sang for the first time in this country. By singing two songs, the "Wiegenlied" and the "Caecilie" that Miss Gerhardt has sung at these concerts she challenged comparison with that artist and she naturally challenges comparison with Miss Culp, who has recently sung Wolf and Strauss songs here, and with Miss Destinn, who like Miss Van Endert, first came to Boston from the German operatic stage via the Symphony concerts.

She has no such phenomenal voice as Miss Destinn, Miss Gerhardt, or Miss Culp.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUAR

WILL SING AT LYRIC FEBRUARY 18

Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano Royal Opera House, Berlin, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra here.

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT,

Brilliant soprano who made her American debut at the Symphony rehearsal.

Possibly many will find that she cannot establish a mood, in singing a song, like Miss Culp, but the fact remains that she has a lovely voice although not an especially big one, and that she sings with authority. She attempted no such glowing rendition of the "Caecilie" as some singers, Dr. Wuellner for instance, and was perhaps at her best in the Humperdinck song which was not the finest music on the afternoon's programme.

She is an interesting singer, although not a tremendously great one and she has a charming personality and youth and grace which will help her in creating an American following.

From TRIBUNE

Feb 18

The Baltimore Star

Will Sing At Lyric February 18

Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano Royal Opera House, Berlin, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra here.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 21.

SYMPHONY PUBLIC SHOWS LIKING FOR MAHLER'S WORK

Requests for Second Performance of Vast Orchestral Piece Explained as Indicating Public Believes That Composer Had Sought in His Music Universality of Mood

In order to declare in convincing artistic terms the tendency of the modern world to combination, and in order to find a type of expression that shall mirror the determination of people today to manage certain affairs on a world basis, regardless of political boundaries, composers are writing music of a breadth of form and of a largeness of tone plan that makes both classic eighteenth century works and romantic nineteenth century works seem thin and cold.

A striking example of such music has been presented this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This work is the Mahler fifth symphony in C sharp minor, which is remarkable for its ample structure. Another twentieth century work resembling it in feeling, though not in size, is the Strauss "Festival" prelude, which is unusual for balancing four great departments of tone—strings, brass, wood-wind and organ—for laying stress on the quartet of tone qualities rather than on the quartet of melodies and for developing its ideas on what may be described as a scheme of color counterpoint.

As is orchestra so is public. The one does not hurry to produce novelties, the other does not clamor for them prematurely. But when the orchestra does undertake a modern composition it studies it with minute diligence and presents it, if possible, exactly as the composer wrote it. The public in turn listens seriously and gives its applause if it can do so with an understanding conscience. Neither the conductor in his preparations nor the managers of the organization in their preliminary announcements make any effort to stir up a sensation with a new piece of music. They will rather keep a work waiting for performance until everybody is calm about it, as they have waited, and are likely still to wait, in the case of the orchestral compositions of Schoenberg. Likewise the subscribers who attend the annual concerts are cool in the presence of unfamiliar compositions.

Of the two chief works in the pro ams of the winter thus far that are ilt on large modern lines of expressive ss, the Mahler fifth symphony and the trauss "Festival" prelude, the Mahler ork had the greater persuasion with ostonians. Its message went home to he afternoon rehearsal audience that heard it Nov. 21, and it made an extraordinary impression on the evening concert house that heard it Nov. 22. If any other man but Karl Muck were directing the Symphony Orchestra concerts in all probability the enthusiastic reception given to the symphony would have caused it to be repeated a fortnight later, when the next program opening came. But it took more than clapping of hands to assure the conductor that the subscribers were pleased. It took nearly three months of "requesting" on their part to bring the piece to a second performance. And the symphony in C sharp minor is announced for another presentation Feb. 27 and 28.

Only Mahler's success in making his music a social regenerating force of universal significance and of his putting expression on a world basis, without a thought of local viewpoint in it, can account for the determination of the Symphony concert public to hear his massive composition again. If that public had wanted to indulge itself in the sentiment of nationality it could have requested nothing better to the purpose than the Sibelius fourth symphony. If it were persuaded that its sometime musical hero, Richard Strauss, had sought a mood answering faithfully to the emotional surge of the times, it would doubtless have asked for a second hearing of his prelude, which, with its four-color idea of balance, contrast and development, is far more original than the Mahler piece.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 14,

German Soprano Makes Acquaintance of American Musical Public Interpreting Songs With Orchestra Assisting

VIOLINS APPLAUDED

With Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, gave its fifteenth public rehearsal in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, symphony in F minor, No. 4, op. 36. Songs with orchestra: Hugo Wolf, "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss, "Wiegenlied," "Cacilie." Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," scherzo. Songs with orchestra; Humperdinck, "Es schaukeln die Winde." D'Albert, "Mediaeval Hymn to Venus." Cornelius, overture to the opera, "The Barber of Bagdad." Mme. van Endert made her first appearance in America at this concert.

Though described in the official program note as an opera singer, Mme. Van Endert brought no dramatic piece for presentation to the Symphony audience. Instead of singing arias, which are practically the only sort of vocal pieces with orchestra which either give the artist a fair opportunity or have strong claim on the interest of listeners, she gave pieces belonging to one of the musical art forms which are of questionable success at best, to wit, songs with orchestral accompaniment. The song with orchestra is of doubtful appeal, even when music, vocal line and orchestration are written in the first place as the composer's design. It carries almost no conviction of its own when the orchestral scoring is arranged from a piano accompaniment. And the result is no more warrantable, generally speaking, when the composer himself is the arranger than when somebody else is.

As the program disclosed Mme. Van Endert's talents, her voice is of the rich, [illegible] which the singing of Miss [illegible] last season and of Miss Frieda Hempel in the past two seasons has made familiar to American hearers. Her execution is not nimble enough to classify her among light sopranos and her interpretation is not searching enough to classify her among dramatic sopranos. She has that middling quality of schooling and that indefinite power of communication which send her into the refuge of the lyric soprano class. As an instrument of tone her voice rings in the large Symphony auditorium, it hangs in uncertain manner at t above or below the precise pitch of written note. It may, and it sh sound better and give more effectiv terpretation in a program of songs piano or in arias with orchestra.

The brilliant orchestral number of rehearsal was the Tschaikowsky phony. Though probably not presen the conductor or the men one of the cult tasks of the season, it gave one of the best opportunities they had to let go and tell their feelings. entire reading of the work was extraordinary even for the remarkable organization that played it, and the third movement, with its long, swift passages for the plucked strings, was something to put high in the record of the year. The audience applauded with uncommon enthusiasm after this movement, letting itself go a little after the manner of the players, and Dr. Muck called the violinists to their feet to acknowledge the clapping.

The Dukas piece lacked its usual humorous point, being in company with the scherzo of the Tschaikowsky fourth symphony. The descriptive fun of the French composer did not hold its own against the abstract kind of the Russian. The overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" opened out the tone of the orchestra, but gave no interesting test of its execution or of its expressiveness.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914
Esta 884

* * *

At the particular request of Henry L. Higginson Dr. Muck will preface, so to say, the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral music as a token of Hr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only fifteen minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theater des Arts, Paris.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Esschaukein die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

* * *

Newspaper Cutting

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 15 1914
Es 1884

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York debut at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in E Minor, No. 4..........Brahms
Songs, with orchestra: ....Hugo Wolf
Verborgenheit ....Richard Strauss
Wiegenlied........................Richard Strauss
Caecilie...................................Ravel
"Mother Goose" Suite..
Songs, with orchestra: ....Humperdinck
Es schaukeln die Winde..............D'Albert Venushymne ....

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in C Minor, No. 5..........Beethoven
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" ..
..........Richard Strauss
Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria".............Liszt

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT
SOLOIST BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CARNEGIE HALL
THURS. EVE. FEB. 19.

From TRIBUNE

Feb 18

The Baltimore Star

Will Sing At Lyric February 18

Elizabeth van Endert, principal lyric soprano Royal Opera House, Berlin, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra here.

MONITOR, FEBRUARY 21,

SYMPHONY PUBLIC SHOWS LIKING FOR MAHLER'S WORK

Requests for Second Performance of Vast Orchestral Piece Explained as Indicating Public Believes That Composer Had Sought in His Music Universality of Mood

In order to declare in convincing artistic terms the tendency of the modern world to combination, and in order to find a type of expression that shall mirror the determination of people today to manage certain affairs on a world basis, regardless of political boundaries, composers are writing music of a breadth of form and of a largeness of tone plan that makes both classic eighteenth century works and romantic nineteenth century works seem thin and cold.

A striking example of such music has been presented this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This work is the Mahler fifth symphony in C sharp minor, which is remarkable for its ample structure. Another twentieth century work resembling it in feeling, though not in size, is the Strauss "Festival" prelude, which is unusual for balancing four great departments of tone—strings, brass, wood-wind and organ—for laying stress on the quartet of tone qualities rather than on the quartet of melodies and for developing its ideas on what may be described as a scheme of color counterpoint.

As is orchestra so is public. The one does not hurry to produce novelties, the other does not clamor for them prematurely. But when the orchestra does undertake a modern composition it studies it with minute diligence and presents it, if possible, exactly as the composer wrote it. The public in turn listens seriously and gives its applause if it can do so with an understanding conscience. Neither the conductor in his preparations nor the managers of the organization in their preliminary announcements make any effort to stir up a sensation with a new piece of music. They will rather keep a work waiting for performance until everybody is calm about it, as they have waited, and are likely still to wait, in the case of the orchestral compositions of Schoenberg. Likewise the subscribers who attend the annual concerts are cool in the presence of unfamiliar compositions.

Of the two chief works in the pro- ams of the winter thus far that are ilt on large modern lines of expressive- ess, the Mahler fifth symphony and the trauss "Festival" prelude, the Mahler ork had the greater persuasion with ostonians. Its message went home to e afternoon rehearsal audience that heard it Nov. 21, and it made an extraordinary impression on the evening concert house that heard it Nov. 22. If any other man but Karl Muck were directing the Symphony Orchestra concerts in all probability the enthusiastic reception given to the symphony would have caused it to be repeated a fortnight later, when the next program opening came. But it took more than clapping of hands to assure the conductor that the subscribers were pleased. It took nearly three months of "requesting" on their part to bring the piece to a second performance. And the symphony in C sharp minor is announced for another presentation Feb. 27 and 28.

Only Mahler's success in making his music a social regenerating force of universal significance and of his putting expression on a world basis, without a thought of local viewpoint in it, can account for the determination of the Symphony concert public to hear his massive composition again. If that public had wanted to indulge itself in the sentiment of nationality it could have requested nothing better to the purpose than the Sibelius fourth symphony. If it were persuaded that its sometime musical hero, Richard Strauss, had sought a mood answering faithfully to the emotional surge of the times, it would doubtless have asked for a second hearing of his prelude, which, with its four-color idea of balance, contrast and development, is far more original than the Mahler piece.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 14,

German Soprano Makes Acquaintance of American Musical Public Interpreting Songs With Orchestra Assisting

VIOLINS APPLAUDED

With Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, gave its fifteenth public rehearsal in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, symphony in F minor, No. 4, op. 36. Songs with orchestra: Hugo Wolf, "Verborgenheit. Richard Strauss, "Wiegenlied," "Cacilie." Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," scherzo. Songs with orchestra; Humperdinck, "Es schaukeln die Winde." D'Albert, "Mediaeval Hymn to Venus. Cornelius, overture to the opera, "The Barber of Bagdad." Mme. van Endert made her first appearance in America at this concert.

Though described in the official program note as an opera singer, Mme. Van Endert brought no dramatic piece for presentation to the Symphony audience. Instead of singing arias, which are practically the only sort of vocal pieces with orchestra which either give the artist a fair opportunity or have strong claim on the interest of listeners, she gave pieces belonging to one of the musical art forms which are of questionable success at best, to wit, songs with orchestral accompaniment. The song with orchestra is of doubtful appeal, even when music, vocal line and orchestration are written in the first place as the composer's design. It carries almost no conviction of its own when the orchestral scoring is arranged from a piano accompaniment. And the result is no more warrantable, generally speaking, when the composer himself is the arranger than when somebody else is.

As the program disclosed Mme. Van Endert's talents, her voice is of the rich, brilliant type which the singing of Miss Elena Gerhardt last season and of Miss Frieda Hempel in the past two seasons has made familiar to American hearers. Her execution is not nimble enough to classify her among light sopranos and her interpretation is not searching enough to classify her among dramatic sopranos. She has that middling quality of schooling and that indefinite power of communication which send her into the refuge of the lyric soprano class. As an instrument of tone her voice rings clear in the large Symphony auditorium, but it hangs in uncertain manner at times above or below the precise pitch of the written note. It may, and it should, sound better and give more effective interpretation in a program of songs with piano or in arias with orchestra.

The brilliant orchestral number of the rehearsal was the Tschaikowsky symphony. Though probably not presenting the conductor or the men one of the difficult tasks of the season, it gave them one of the best opportunities they have had to let go and tell their feelings. The entire reading of the work was extraordinary even for the remarkable organization that played it, and the third movement, with its long, swift passages for the plucked strings, was something to put high in the record of the year. The audience applauded with uncommon enthusiasm after this movement, letting itself go a little after the manner of the players, and Dr. Muck called the violinists to their feet to acknowledge the clapping.

The Dukas piece lacked its usual humorous point, being in company with the scherzo of the Tschaikowsky fourth symphony. The descriptive fun of the French composer did not hold its own against the abstract kind of the Russian. The overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" opened out the tone of the orchestra, but gave no interesting test of its execution or of its expressiveness.

* * *

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 15 1914

* * *

t the particular request of Henry L. ginson Dr. Muck will preface, so to y, the regular program of the fourth ston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow night with zart's Masonic Funeral music as a en of Hr. Higginson's high respect regard for the late Dr. S. Weir chell.

he orchestral part of the program mprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only fifteen minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theater des Arts, Paris.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Esschaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

* * *

1884

Newspaper Cutting

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date FEB 15 1914

Es 1884

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York debut at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in E Minor, No. 4............Brahms

Songs, with orchestra:

Verborgenheit ....Hugo Wolf

Wiegenlied..................Richard Strauss

Caecilie....................Richard Strauss

"Mother Goose" Suite......................Ravel

Songs, with orchestra:

Es schaukeln die Winde.........Humperdinck

Venushymne ....D'Albert

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.........Beethoven

Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"..
Richard Strauss

Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria"...........Liszt

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT
SOLOIST BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CARNEGIE HALL THURS. EVE. FEB. 19.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914

Established 1884

Strani will direct.

* * *

At the request of Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Karl Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a token of Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's symphony in F Minor No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only 15 minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballot out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and The Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant in the finest French manner.

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT.

The soloist will be Elizabeth Van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany. She is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilio." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia—Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

* * *

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 17 1914

1884

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert of the Season

The concert in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck was heard by a large audience at the Academy of Music last night was one of rather exceptional interest and variety. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the one containing the pizzicato movement which audiences admire so much, but it has other and better claims than that to admiration and esteem. Its poignant melodies are suffused with poetry and passion while its harmonic structure illustrates in an especially impressive and convincing manner its composer's extraordinary genius for highly colored and deeply emotional orchestration.

How beautifully and brilliantly and eloquently it was played under Dr. Muck's masterful and sympathetic direction it can hardly be necessary to tell. All those who knew the music and have heard the orchestra—as what music-lover has not?—can readily imagine the fine effectiveness of the performance. Other orchestral numbers on the list were Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, given in honor of the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, at Mr. Higginson's personal request, a dainty, tuneful, elesuite by the French composer Ravel called "Mother Goose," which had not previously been played in this city and which was very much enjoyed and Peter Cornelius' famous overture to the "Barber of Bagdad," a masterpiece in its genre which is too seldom given.

The assisting artist of the occasion was Mme. Elizabeth von Endert, from Berlin, who ranks as one of the principallyric sopranos of Germany and who achieved a distinct and immediate success. She is gifted with a beautiful voice and an extremely pleasing personality, and in all her selections she proved herself an artist. Her numbers included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss, and two unfamiliar compositions, the "Es Schaukein de Winde" by Humperdinck, and a "Hymne de Venue" by Eugen D'Albert, and in all of these she displayed an appreciative taste, an alert intelligence and a highly cultivated art. She has style and [illegible], and the audience seemed [illegible]

The First Established and Most C
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in th

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
FEB 17

Established 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADE

Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky Symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose"—Madame von Endert Sings Five Lyrics.

PROGRAM.

Mozart .... Masonic Funeral Music
Tschaikowsky—Fourth Symphony.
Songs with Orchestra—
(b) Hugo Wolf .... "Verborgenheit"
(b) Strauss .... "Wiegenlied"
(c) Strauss .... "Caecilie"
Ravel .... "Mother Goose"
Five pieces for children.
Songs with Orchestra—
(a) Humperdinck .. "Es schaukeln die Winde"
(b) d'Albert .... "Hymn to Venus"
Cornelius, Overture...... "Barber of Bagdad"

As the last program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was classical, pursuant to custom Doctor Muck last evening gave his large and devout Academy audience a program with the modern flavor strongly predominant.

A solemn foreword of memorial significance, however, was Mozart's Masonic funeral music, given in the name of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell as our own orchestra played the Beethoven Funeral March at a recent performance. The music is scarcely in the characteristic vein of the composer, and the interpretation, though polished, urbane and lucidly correct, did not thrill the pulse of the listener with the sense of communicative emotion. It was a graceful tribute, but it seemed formal and impersonal. The Chopin Funeral March, or even that from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, might have been a more felicitous selection, though a more obvious choice, of course.

INSPIRED DELIVERY OF SYMPHONY.

The dramatic intensity absent from this elegiac prelude was found in abundant measure in the inspired and inspiring delivery of the symphony. The exquisite arabesque of woodwind and violins, the splendid choral unanimity of the string choirs, the firm rejoinder of horns to valorous trumpets made the mettlesome setting-forth of the first movement an episode to remember; the fluent and free "canzona" of the oboe, with the beautiful sequel as 'cellos, violas and violins entered upon their melodic inheritance distinguished the second movement; the climax of technical cunning was reached in the Scherzo, where the players (all but one of the 'cellos' laid aside their bows and plucked the strings in the "pizzicato ostinato" with phenomenal fleetness and deftness and a tone entirely unblurred by the clicking of the fingernail in the percussion, as is the unhappy trait of the run of amateurs.

A plenitude of tone and dynamic energy vitalized the last movement.

The audience was charmed with the soloist, Elisabeth van Endert, a lyric soprano well known to the concert stage in Germany, but now heard on her first tour in our country with the Boston players. She sang very difficult songs in a way that made them seem easy—a sure sign of effectual genius in musical art. The appeal of a real and radiant womanhood is through all and in all that she sings. There is personality (very much more than mere platform manner and "stage presence") behind the voice. The direct appeal of the spontaneous, unaffected and seemingly effortless interpretation of the five delectable songs she chose made a complete conquest of Madame van Endert's audience.

Very rarely indeed has any singer established herself so firmly and so speedily in popular favor. Her voice is not one of the greatest. But her use of it is eminently praiseworthy. Many a singer with a far more brilliant vocal endowment does not reach half so significant a result. The orcchestral support was consummate.

FIVE MORCEAUX CAPTIVATING.

The five morceaux by Ravel were captivating—the somnolant "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty" was a picture of Edmond Dulac set to languorous poppy-waving imagery in music; in "Hop o' My Thumb," the bird-notes of Concertmeister Witek's E string told the tragic story of the devoured bread-crumb trail. In the third portion, "Laideronette," there was a merry Oriental joggling of harp and flute, discursive aboe and klopping xylophone. The "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast" followed, with a fearsome growling and roaring among bassoons and double basses, as of the zoo at feeding time; and the coda was the enchanted amosphere of "The Fairy Garden."

It is a legitimate question whether there was quite substance enough to the whole argument to warrant its inclusion in a symphony program meant for adult fare; but it can do no real harm to children of a larger growth to be reminded now and then of the nursery days. A picturesque finale in keeping with the curiously heterogeneous character of the program was the "Barber of Bagdad" overture of Cornelis.

The fifth and last of the concerts is appointed for March 16, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Plain Dealer
Address Cleveland Ohio
Date JAN 30 1914

Established 1884

PLAYS BEETHOVEN, FEATURE DE LUXE

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Karl Muck, Gives Pleasing Concert.

Director Interprets Spirit of Composer in His 'Pastoral.'

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert at the Grays armory last evening. Dr. Karl Muck conducted. The house was crowded.

Perhaps it is superfluous to add that it was another musical event that will linger in the memory of all who heard it, just as each visit of this splendid organization seems an immortelle that all music lovers carefully put away in the memory box to be preserved with the really big things of life that have counted.

There were many things last night that made the program notable, but the greatest of these was th combination of Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck and Bethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the sixth.

It was one of those rare combinations like David Belasco, David Warfield and "The Music Master," or one of those unforgettable operatic casts that included Nordica, the DeReszkes and Schumann-Heink.

Let the other orchestras give us the novelties, such as we had at the last symphony concert. When the Bostonians come to the city, the management wisely endeavors to give at least a symphony by this body of players, and if memory serves, the have paid their respects to Brahms. But everyone wants to hear the Boston orchestra play Beethoven, perhaps there would be a majority desiring to hear the "Pastoral."

That was the feature de luxe of the concert of 1914.

It would be a rude awakening to the uninitiated, who believe descriptive music is modern, to hear this symphony as it was played last night. Beethoven was in his most sumblimely poetic mood when he composed it.

While there is all the grandeur of nature in it, there is seemingly a sublime challenge to the pedantic gentlemen who believed that a symphony must be a marble pillar of perfect whiteness, carved according to rule and precedent.

It opens with an apostrophe to brook. He was living in a cou neighborhood when he was workin it. Strauss and other writers to t would probably send the brook splas down over the rocks of the drums bells. Beethoven caught the spiri the brook, the spirit of out-of-d And Dr. Muck caught it last night interpreted Beethoven's message nificiently.

Then, in another movement, th a jolly gathering of peasants at a side inn. They are dancing, but dance is overtaken by a thunders The storm passes. The shepherd his flute, the nightingale sings, the cuckoo and the quail. There is eral rejoicing that the tempest passed. It all ends in the boundles of life—eternal and sublime.

Dr. Muck, throughout this readi is his custom, stood quietly at the and barely indicated the time t men. The had done their work hearsal and there was no reaso spectacular display that so many of frantic gentlemen of the baton consider necessary. He told his men something with his brain that could not be pointed out to the mwith a stick of mahogany.

Beautiful reading of Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture completed the program, but delightful as they were, these lesser numbers were a concession to convention. The audience at an orchestral concert demands a certain length of time.

"Les Preludes" was given in a haunting and thundering manner that would have delighted the old lion of Weimar. "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death?" asks Lamartine in English paraphrase. Liszt asked it in his composition. Dr. Muck and his men repeated the question last night in mighty accents.

It was a concert without a soloist. A soloist would have been a desecration.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 14 1914

Coming Musical Events

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Monday night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral March as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, Op. 4; Revel's "Mother Goose" suite and the Overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." As already announced, the soloist will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Cascilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, "Humperdinck[illegible] die Winde" [illegible] nus."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Thrilling Performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Brahms's fourth symphony [illegible] the chief place in the programme [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra's [illegible] evening concert, which took place [illegible] evening in Carnegie Hall. It loomed the larger, indeed, from the fact [illegible] Dr. Muck made the rest of the programme out of pieces of insig[illegible] content. There were Ravel's [illegible] called "Ma Mère l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's comic opera, "[illegible] Barber of Bagdad," familiar to [illegible] older generation, who had [illegible] opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in the days of the German company, but not much played as an item in orchestral programmes. There was also a solo singer, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, who was heard in songs with piano accompaniment arranged for orchestra; Wolf's "Verbargenheit," Strauss's "Wiegenlied," and Cäcilie," and in Humperdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and d'Albert's "Mediaeval Hymn to Venus."

Brahms's fourth symphony is spoken of as "academic." It is not academic when it is played as it was last evening; in other words, when it is really played in this composer's spirit. [illegible] Muck and the orchestra were [illegible] much in the vein. With what magnificent vehemence, passion, and spontaneity of utterance the performance was filled; with what tenderness in the andante; with what boisterous gayety and overwhelming spirit in the "Allegro Giocoso" that is a scherzo in its essence; with what a superbly fiery sweep in the final passacaglia! The orchestra rarely has played with a more beautiful euphony in every gradation of dynamics. The performance deeply impressed the audience, and Dr. Muck made the players rise to share with him the applause that was so enthusiastically bestowed.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces do not run quite parallel with the English Mother Goose. They are rather suggestions of French fairy stories. These five pieces are orchestral transcriptions of a set originally written as piano duets for children, or at least for childish interests. They had been played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra a little more than a year ago. They are slight in substance, ingenious and appropriate in their orchestral garb, and were found amusing by the audience last evening; for they are the product of a delicate and fertile fancy.

Mme. van Endert has a voice of pleasant quality, more substantial in its upper ranges than in its lower, where its color is rather pale and thin. Her singing of the transcribed [illegible] was agreeable and had musical qualities, but [illegible] was not strongly emotional. She was more successful in Strauss's "Wiegenlied" than in the others, because of its lesser demands upon the emotional powers of the interpreter. More thrilling versions of the passionate "Cäcilie" have been heard.

CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

Established 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Crowded with Enthusiastic Audience.

The Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night, and all true music lovers were made happy. No seats could be had, for all were subscribed for long ago, and the enthusiasm was in proportion.

The treat of the evening was Dr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, a reading that came near being absolute perfection, so nobly conceived and so perfectly executed was it. The other two orchestral numbers were Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel suite was most charmingly played.

The solo performer was Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, who sang Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," and songs by Humperdinck and d'Albert. Mme. van Endert's voice was pleasing in the middle register, but much less effective in her upper tones. She displayed not a little interpretive intelligence.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 21 1914

Established 1884

Berichtigung.

In der geſtrigen Beſprechung über das Konzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters war in den Ausführungen über die mitwirkende Soliſtin folgender Satz zu leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikate Muſik ſie auch geſtaltete, zwang die Künſtlerin zu einem gewiſſen al fresco der Darbietung." Der geneigte Leſer wolle ſtatt deſſen leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikat Dr. Muck ſie auch geſtaltete, ..." Aus „Dr. Muck" „Muſik" zu machen, iſt übrigens ein etwas nahe liegendes Verſehen.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 1914

Sturani will direct.

* * *

At the request of Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Karl Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a token of Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's symphony in F Minor No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only 15 minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballot out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and The Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant in the finest French manner.

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT.

The soloist will be Elizabeth Van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany. She is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilio." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia—Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

* * *

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 1[illegible] 1914

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert of the Season

The concert in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck was heard by a large audience at the Academy of Music last night was one of rather exceptional interest and variety. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the one containing the pizzicato movement which audiences admire so much, but it has other and better claims than that to admiration and esteem. Its poignant melodies are suffused with poetry and passion while its harmonic structure illustrates in an especially impressive and convincing manner its composer's extraordinary genius for highly colored and deeply emotional orchestration.

How beautifully and brilliantly and eloquently it was played under Dr. Muck's masterful and sympathetic direction it can hardly be necessary to tell. All those who know the music and have heard the orchestra—as what music-lover has not?—can readily imagine the fine effectiveness of the performance. Other orchestral numbers on the list were Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, given in honor of the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, at Mr. Higginson's personal request, a dainty, tuneful, elesuite by the French composer Ravel called "Mother Goose," which had not previously been played in this city and which was very much enjoyed and Peter Cornelius' famous overture to the "Barber of Bagdad," a masterpiece in its genre which is too seldom given.

The assisting artist of the occasion was Mme. Elizabeth von Endert, from Berlin, who ranks as one of the principallyric sopranos of Germany and who achieved a distinct and immediate success. She is gifted with a beautiful voice and an extremely pleasing personality, and in all her selections she proved herself an artist. Her numbers included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss, and two unfamiliar compositions, the "Es Schaukein de Winde" by Humperdinck, and a "Hymne de Venue" by Eugen D'Albert, and in all of these she displayed an appreciative taste, an alert intelligence and a highly cultivated art. She has style and [illegible], and the audience seemed [illegible]

The First Established and Most C
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
FEB 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADE

Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky Symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose"—Madame von Endert Sings Five Lyrics.

PROGRAM.

Mozart .... Masonic Funeral Music
Tschaikowsky—Fourth Symphony.
Songs with Orchestra—
  (b) Hugo Wolf .... "Verborgenheit"
  (b) Strauss .... "Wiegenlied"
  (c) Strauss .... "Caecilie"
Ravel .... "Mother Goose"
  Five pieces for children.
Songs with Orchestra—
  (a) Humperdinck .."Es schaukeln die Winde"
  (b) d'Albert .... "Hymn to Venus"
Cornelius, Overture...... "Barber of Bagdad"

As the last program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was classical, pursuant to custom Doctor Muck last evening gave his large and devout Academy audience a program with the modern flavor strongly predominant.

A solemn foreword of memorial significance, however, was Mozart's Masonic funeral music, given in the name of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell as our own orchestra played the Beethoven Funeral March at a recent performance. The music is scarcely in the characteristic vein of the composer, and the interpretation, though polished, urbane and lucidly correct, did not thrill the pulse of the listener with the sense of communicative emotion. It was a graceful tribute, but it seemed formal and impersonal. The Chopin Funeral March, or even that from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, might have been a more felicitous selection, though a more obvious choice, of course.

INSPIRED DELIVERY OF SYMPHONY.

The dramatic intensity absent from this elegiac prelude was found in abundant measure in the inspired and inspiring delivery of the symphony. The exquisite arabesque of woodwind and violins, the splendid choral unanimity of the string choirs, the firm rejoinder of horns to valorous trumpets made the mettlesome setting-forth of the first movement an episode to remember; the fluent and free "canzona" of the oboe, with the beautiful sequel as 'cellos, violas and violins entered upon their melodic inheritance distinguished the second movement; the climax of technical cunning was reached in the Scherzo, where the players (all but one of the 'cellos' laid aside their bows and plucked the strings in the "pizzicato ostinato" with phenomenal fleetness and deftness and a tone entirely unblurred by the clicking of the fingernail in the percussion, as is the unhappy trait of the run of amateurs.

A plenitude of tone and dynamic energy vitalized the last movement.

The audience was charmed with the soloist, Elisabeth van Endert, a lyric soprano well known to the concert stage in Germany, but now heard on her first tour in our country with the Boston players. She sang very difficult songs in a way that made them seem easy—a sure sign of effectual genius in musical art. The appeal of a real and radiant womanhood is through all and in all that she sings. There is personality (very much more than mere platform manner and "stage presence") behind the voice. The direct appeal of the spontaneous, unaffected and seemingly effortless interpretation of the five delectable songs she chose made a complete conquest of Madame van Endert's audience.

Very rarely indeed has any singer established herself so firm'- and so speedily in popular favor. Her voice is not one of the greatest. But her use of it is eminently praiseworthy. Many a singer with a far more brilliant vocal endowment does not reach half so significant a result. The orcchestral support was consummate.

FIVE MORCEAUX CAPTIVATING.

The five morceaux by Ravel were captivating—the somnolant "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty" was a picture of Edmond Dulac set to languorous poppy-waving imagery in music; in "Hop o' My Thumb," the bird-notes of Concertmeister Witek's E string told the tragic story of the devoured bread-crumb trail. In the third portion, "Laideronette," there was a merry Oriental joggling of harp and flute, discursive aboe and klopping xylophone. The "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast" followed, with a fearsome growling and roaring among bassoons and double basses, as of the zoo at feeding time; and the coda was the enchanted amosphere of "The Fairy Garden."

It is a legitimate question whether there was quite substance enough to the whole argument to warrant its inclusion in a symphony program meant for adult fare; but it can do no real harm to children of a larger growth to be reminded now and then of the nursery days. A picturesque finale in keeping with the curiously heterogeneous character of the program was the "Barber of Bagdad" overture of Cornelis.

The fifth and last of the concerts is appointed for March 16, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

The [illegible] and Most [illegible]
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Plain Dealer
Address Cleveland Ohio
Date JAN 30 1914

Established 1884

PLAYS BEETHOVEN, FEATURE DE LUXE

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Karl Muck, Gives Pleasing Concert.

Director Interprets Spirit of Composer in His 'Pastoral.'

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert at the Grays armory last evening. Dr. Karl Muck conducted. The house was crowded.

Perhaps it is superfluous to add that it was another musical event that will linger in the memory of all who heard it, just as each visit of this splendid organization seems an immortelle that all music lovers carefully put away in the memory box to be preserved with the really big things of life that have counted.

There were many things last night that made the program notable, but the greatest of these was th combination of Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck and Bethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the sixth.

It was one of those rare combinations like David Belasco, David Warfield and "The Music Master," or one of those unforgettable operatic casts that included Nordica, the DeReszkes and Schumann-Heink.

Let the other orchestras give us the novelties, such as we had at the last symphony concert. When the Bostonians come to the city, the management wisely endeavors to give at least a symphony by this body of players, and if memory serves, the have paid their respects to Brahms. But everyone wants to hear the Boston orchestra play Beethoven, perhaps there would be a majority desiring to hear the "Pastoral." That was the feature de luxe of the concert of 1914.

It would be a rude awakening to the uninitiated, who believe descriptive music is modern, to hear this symphony as it was played last night. Beethoven was in his most sumblimely poetic mood when he composed it.

While there is all the grandeur of nature in it, there is seemingly a sublime challenge to the pedantic gentlemen who believed that a symphony must be a marble pillar of perfect whiteness, carved according to rule and precedent

It opens with an apostrophe to brook. He was living in a cou neighborhood when he was workin it. Strauss and other writers to t would probably send the brook splas down over the rocks of the drums bells. Beethoven caught the spiri the brook, the spirit of out-of-d And Dr. Muck caught it last night interpreted Beethoven's message nificiently.

Then, in another movement, th a jolly gathering of peasants at a side inn. They are dancing, but dance is overtaken by a thunders The storm passes. The shepherd his flute, the nightingale sings, the cuckoo and the quail. There is eral rejoicing that the tempest passed. It all ends in the boundles of life—eternal and sublime.

Dr. Muck, throughout this readi is his custom, stood quietly at the and barely indicated the time t men. The had done their work a hearsal and there was no reaso spectacular display that so many o frantic gentlemen of the baton consider necessary. He told his men something with his brain that could not be pointed out to the mwith a stick of mahogany.

Beautiful reading of Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture completed the program, but delightful as they were, these lesser numbers were a concession to convention. The audience at an orchestral concert demands a certain length of time.

"Les Preludes" was given in a haunting and thundering manner that would have delighted the old lion of Weimar. "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death?" asks Lamartine in English paraphrase. Liszt asked it in his composition. Dr. Muck and his men repeated the question last night in mighty accents.

It was a concert without a soloist. A soloist would have been a desecration.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 14 1914

Coming Musical Events

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Monday night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral March as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, Op. 4; Revel's "Mother Goose" suite and the Overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." As already announced, the soloist will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, "Humperdinck's "[illegible] die Winde" and [illegible] nus."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Thrilling Performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Brahms's fourth symphony filled the chief place in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth evening concert, which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. It loomed all the larger, indeed, from the fact that Dr. Muck made the rest of the programme out of pieces of insignificant content. There were Ravel's suite, called "Ma Mére l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's comic opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," familiar to the older generation, who had heard the opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in the days of the German company, but not much played as an item in orchestral programmes. There was also a solo singer, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, who was heard in songs with piano accompaniment arranged for orchestra, Wolf's "Verbargenheit," Strauss's "Wiegenlied," and Cäcilie," and in Hamperdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and d'Albert's "Mediaeval Hymn to Venus."

Brahms's fourth symphony is spoken of as "academic." It is not academic when it is played as it was last evening; in other words, when it is really played in this composer's spirit. Dr. Muck and the orchestra were very much in the vein. With what magnificent vehemence, passion, and splendor of utterance the performance was filled; with what tenderness in the andante; with what boisterous gayety and overwhelming spirit in the "Allegro Giocoso" that is a scherzo in its essence; with what a superbly fiery sweep in the final passacaglia! The orchestra rarely has played with a more beautiful euphony in every gradation of dynamics. The performance deeply impressed the audience, and Dr. Muck made the players rise to share with him the applause that was so enthusiastically bestowed.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces do not run quite parallel with the English Mother Goose. They are rather suggestions of French fairy stories. These five pieces are orchestral transcriptions of a set originally written as piano duets for children, or at least for childish interests. They had been played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra a little more than a year ago. They are slight in substance, ingenious and appropriate in their orchestral garb, and were found amusing by the audience last evening; for they are the product of a delicate and fertile fancy.

Mme. van Endert has a voice of pleasant quality, more substantial in its upper ranges than in its lower, where its color is rather pale and thin. Her singing of the transcribed songs was agreeable and had musical qualities, but it was not strongly emotional. She was more successful in Strauss's "Wiegenlied" than in the others, because of its lesser demands upon the emotional powers of the interpreter. More thrilling versions of the passionate "Cäcilie" have been heard.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Crowded with Enthusiastic Audience.

The Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night, and all true music lovers were made happy. No seats could be had, for all were subscribed for long ago, and the enthusiasm was in proportion.

The treat of the evening was Dr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, a reading that came near being absolute perfection, so nobly conceived and so perfectly executed was it. The other two orchestral numbers were Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel suite was most charmingly played.

The solo performer was Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, who sang Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," and songs by Humperdinck and d'Albert. Mme. van Endert's voice was pleasing in the middle register, but much less effective in her upper tones. She displayed not a little interpretive intelligence.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 2[illegible]

Berichtigung.

In der geſtrigen Beſprechung über das Konzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters war in den Ausführungen über die mitwirkende Soliſtin folgender Satz zu leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikate Muſik ſie auch geſtaltete, zwang die Künſtlerin zu einem gewiſſen al fresco der Darbietung." Der geneigte Leſer wolle ſtatt deſſen leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikat Dr. Muck ſie auch geſtaltete, ... „Aus „Dr. Muck" „Muſik" zu machen, iſt übrigens ein etwas nahe liegendes Verſehen."

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914

Strani will direct.

* * *

At the request of Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Karl Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a token of Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

Es 1884

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's symphony in F Minor No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only 15 minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballot out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and The Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant in the finest French manner.

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT.

The soloist will be Elizabeth Van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany. She is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilio." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia—Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

* * *

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 17 1914

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Concert of the Season

The concert in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck was heard by a large audience at the Academy of Music last night was one of rather exceptional interest and variety. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the one containing the pizzicato movement which audiences admire so much, but it has other and better claims than that to admiration and esteem. Its poignant melodies are suffused with poetry and passion while its harmonic structure illustrates in an especially impressive and convincing manner its composer's extraordinary genius for highly colored and deeply emotional orchestration.

How beautifully and brilliantly and eloquently it was played under Dr. Muck's masterful and sympathetic direction it can hardly be necessary to tell. All those who know the music and have heard the orchestra—as what music-lover has not?—can readily imagine the fine effectiveness of the performance. Other orchestral numbers on the list were Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, given in honor of the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, at Mr. Higginson's personal request, a dainty, tuneful, elesuite by the French composer Ravel called "Mother Goose," which had not previously been played in this city and which was very much enjoyed and Peter Cornelius' famous overture to the "Barber of Bagdad," a masterpiece in its genre which is too seldom given.

The assisting artist of the occasion was Mme. Elizabeth von Endert, from Berlin, who ranks as one of the principallyric sopranos of Germany and who achieved a distinct and immediate success. She is gifted with a beautiful voice and an extremely pleasing personality, and in all her selections she proved herself an artist. Her numbers included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss, and two unfamiliar compositions, the "Es Schaukein de Winde" by Humperdinck, and a "Hymne de Venue" by Eugen D'Albert, and in all of these she displayed an appreciative taste, an alert intelligence and a highly cultivated art. She has style and [illegible] g, and the audience seemed [illegible]

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date FEB 17 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADEMY

Es 1884

Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky Symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose"—Madame von Endert Sings Five Lyrics.

PROGRAM.

Mozart ....Masonic Funeral Music
Tschaikowsky—Fourth Symphony.
Songs with Orchestra—
  (b) Hugo Wolf ...."Verborgenheit"
  (b) Strauss ...."Wiegenlied"
  (c) Strauss ...."Caecilie"
Ravel ...."Mother Goose"
  Five pieces for children.
Songs with Orchestra—
  (a) Humperdinck .."Es schaukeln die Winde"
  (b) d'Albert ...."Hymn to Venus"
Cornelius, Overture......"Barber of Bagdad"

As the last program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was classical, pursuant to custom Doctor Muck last evening gave his large and devout Academy audience a program with the modern flavor strongly predominant.

A solemn foreword of memorial significance, however, was Mozart's Masonic funeral music, given in the name of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell as our own orchestra played the Beethoven Funeral March at a recent performance. The music is scarcely in the characteristic vein of the composer, and the interpretation, though polished, urbane and lucidly correct, did not thrill the pulse of the listener with the sense of communicative emotion. It was a graceful tribute, but it seemed formal and impersonal. The Chopin Funeral March, or even that from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, might have been a more felicitous selection, though a more obvious choice, of course.

INSPIRED DELIVERY OF SYMPHONY.

The dramatic intensity absent from this elegiac prelude was found in abundant measure in the inspired and inspiring delivery of the symphony. The exquisite arabesque of woodwind and violins, the splendid choral unanimity of the string choirs, the firm rejoinder of horns to valorous trumpets made the mettlesome setting-forth of the first movement an episode to remember; the fluent and free "canzona" of the oboe, with the beautiful sequel as 'cellos, violas and violins entered upon their melodic inheritance distinguished the second movement; the climax of technical cunning was reached in the Scherzo, where the players (all but one of the 'cellos' laid aside their bows and plucked the strings in the "pizzicato ostinato" with phenomenal fleetness and deftness and a tone entirely unblurred by the clicking of the fingernail in the percussion, as is the unhappy trait of the run of amateurs.

A plenitude of tone and dynamic energy vitalized the last movement.

The audience was charmed with the soloist, Elisabeth van Endert, a lyric soprano well known to the concert stage in Germany, but now heard on her first tour in our country with the Boston players. She sang very difficult songs in a way that made them seem easy—a sure sign of effectual genius in musical art. The appeal of a real and radiant womanhood is through all and in all that she sings. There is personality (very much more than mere platform manner and "stage presence") behind the voice. The direct appeal of the spontaneous, unaffected and seemingly effortless interpretation of the five delectable songs she chose made a complete conquest of Madame van Endert's audience.

Very rarely indeed has any singer established herself so firm'- and so speedily in popular favor. Her voice is not one of the greatest. But her use of it is eminently praiseworthy. Many a singer with a far more brilliant vocal endowment does not reach half so significant a result. The orcchestral support was consummate.

FIVE MORCEAUX CAPTIVATING.

The five morceaux by Ravel were captivating—the somnolant "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty" was a picture of Edmond Dulac set to languorous poppy-waving imagery in music; in "Hop o' My Thumb," the bird-notes of Concertmeister Witek's E string told the tragic story of the devoured bread-crumb trail. In the third portion, "Laideronnette," there was a merry Oriental joggling of harp and flute, discursive aboe and klopping xylophone. The "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast" followed, with a fearsome growling and roaring among bassoons and double basses, as of the zoo at feeding time; and the coda was the enchanted amosphere of "The Fairy Garden."

It is a legitimate question whether there was quite substance enough to the whole argument to warrant its inclusion in a symphony program meant for adult fare; but it can do no real harm to children of a larger growth to be reminded now and then of the nursery days. A picturesque finale in keeping with the curiously heterogeneous character of the program was the "Barber of Bagdad" overture of Cornelis.

The fifth and last of the concerts is appointed for March 16, when Paderewski will be the soloist.

[120]

Bureau in the World

n Dealer
nd Ohio
0 1914

YS BEETHOVEN, EATURE DE LUXE

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Karl Muck, Gives Pleasing Concert.

Director Interprets Spirit of Composer in His 'Pastoral.'

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its annual concert at the Grays armory last evening. Dr. Karl Muck conducted. The house was crowded.

Perhaps it is superfluous to add that it was another musical event that will linger in the memory of all who heard it, just as each visit of this splendid organization seems an immortelle that all music lovers carefully put away in the memory box to be preserved with the really big things of life that have counted.

There were many things last night that made the program notable, but the greatest of these was th combination of Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck and Bethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the sixth.

It was one of those rare combinations like David Belasco, David Warfield and "The Music Master," or one of those unforgettable operatic casts that included Nordica, the DeReszkes and Schumann-Heink.

Let the other orchestras give us the novelties, such as we had at the last symphony concert. When the Bostonians come to the city, the management wisely endeavors to give at least a symphony by this body of players, and if memory serves, the have paid their respects to Brahms. But everyone wants to hear the Boston orchestra play Beethoven, perhaps there would be a majority desiring to hear the "Pastoral."

That was the feature de luxe of the concert of 1914.

It would be a rude awakening to the uninitiated, who believe descriptive music is modern, to hear this symphony as it was played last night. Beethoven was in his most sumblimely poetic mood when he composed it.

While there is all the grandeur of nature in it, there is seemingly a sublime challenge to the pedantic gentlemen who believed that a symphony must be a marble pillar of perfect whiteness, carved according to rule and precedent.

It opens with an apostrophe to the brook. He was living in a country neighborhood when he was working at it. Strauss and other writers to today would probably send the brook splashing down over the rocks of the drums and bells. Beethoven caught the spirit of the brook, the spirit of out-of-doors. And Dr. Muck caught it last night and interpreted Beethoven's message magnificiently.

Then, in another movement, there is a jolly gathering of peasants at a wayside inn. They are dancing, but their dance is overtaken by a thunderstorm. The storm passes. The shepherd pipes his flute, the nightingale sings, so do the cuckoo and the quail. There is general rejoicing that the tempest has passed. It all ends in the boundless joy of life—eternal and sublime.

Dr. Muck, throughout this reading, as is his custom, stood quietly at the desk and barely indicated the time to his men. The had done their work at rehearsal and there was no reason for spectacular display that so many of the frantic gentlemen of the baton consider necessary. He told his men something with his brain that could not be pointed out to the mwith a stick of mahogany.

Beautiful reading of Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture completed the program, but delightful as they were, these lesser numbers were a concession to convention. The audience at an orchestral concert demands a certain length of time.

"Les Preludes" was given in a haunting and thundering manner that would have delighted the old lion of Weimar. "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death?" asks Lamartine in English paraphrase. Liszt asked it in his composition. Dr. Muck and his men repeated the question last night in mighty accents.

It was a concert without a soloist. A soloist would have been a desecration.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 14 1914

Coming Musical Events

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Muck will preface the program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music Monday night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral March as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

Es 884

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, Op. 4; Revel's "Mother Goose" suite and the Overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." As already announced, the soloist will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Cascilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, "Humperdinck's [illegible] die Winde" [illegible] nus."

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Thrilling Performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

k, 1884

Brahms's fourth symphony filled the chief place in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth evening concert, which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. It loomed all the larger, indeed, from the fact that Dr. Muck made the rest of the programme out of pieces of insignificant content. There were Ravel's suite, called "Ma Mére l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's comic opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," familiar to the older generation, who had heard the opera at the Metropolitan Opera House in the days of the German company, but not much played as an item in orchestral programmes. There was also a solo singer, Mme. Elisabeth van Endert, who was heard in songs with piano accompaniment arranged for orchestra: Wolf's "Verbargenheit," Strauss's "Wiegenlied," and Cäcilie," and in Hamperdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and d'Albert's "Mediaeval Hymn to Venus."

Brahms's fourth symphony is spoken of as "academic." It is not academic when it is played as it was last evening; in other words, when it is really played in this composer's spirit. Dr. Muck and the orchestra were very much in the vein. With what magnificent vehemence, passion, and splendor of utterance the performance was filled; with what tenderness in the andante; with what boisterous gayety and overwhelming spirit in the "Allegro Giocoso" that is a scherzo in its essence; with what a superbly fiery sweep in the final passacaglia! The orchestra rarely has played with a more beautiful euphony in every gradation of dynamics. The performance deeply impressed the audience, and Dr. Muck made the players rise to share with him the applause that was so enthusiastically bestowed.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces do not run quite parallel with the English Mother Goose. They are rather suggestions of French fairy stories. These five pieces are orchestral transcriptions of a set originally written as piano duets for children, or at least for childish interests. They had been played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra a little more than a year ago. They are slight in substance, ingenious and appropriate in their orchestral garb, and were found amusing by the audience last evening; for they are the product of a delicate and fertile fancy.

Mme. van Endert has a voice of pleasant quality, more substantial in its upper ranges than in its lower, where its color is rather pale and thin. Her singing of the transcribed songs was agreeable and had musical qualities, but it was not strongly emotional. She was more successful in Strauss's "Wiegenlied" than in the others, because of its lesser demands upon the emotional powers of the interpreter. More thrilling versions of the passionate "Cäcilie" have been heard.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE
ess: New York City
FEB 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Crowded with Enthusiastic Audience.

384

The Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night, and all true music lovers were made happy. No seats could be had, for all were subscribed for long ago, and the enthusiasm was in proportion.

The treat of the evening was Dr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, a reading that came near being absolute perfection, so nobly conceived and so perfectly executed was it. The other two orchestral numbers were Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel suite was most charmingly played.

The solo performer was Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, who sang Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," and songs by Humperdinck and d'Albert. Mme. van Endert's voice was pleasing in the middle register, but much less effective in her upper tones. She displayed not a little interpretive intelligence.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAATSZEITUNG
New York City.
FEB 2

Berichtigung.

In der geſtrigen Beſprechung über das Konzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters war in den Ausführungen über die mitwirkende Soliſtin folgender Satz zu leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikate Muſik ſie auch geſtaltete, zwang die Künſtlerin zu einem gewiſſen al freſco der Darbietung." Der geneigte Leſer wolle ſtatt deſſen leſen: „Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikat Dr. Muck ſie auch geſtaltete, ... „Aus „Dr. Muck" „Muſik" zu machen, iſt übrigens ein etwas nahe liegendes Verſehen."

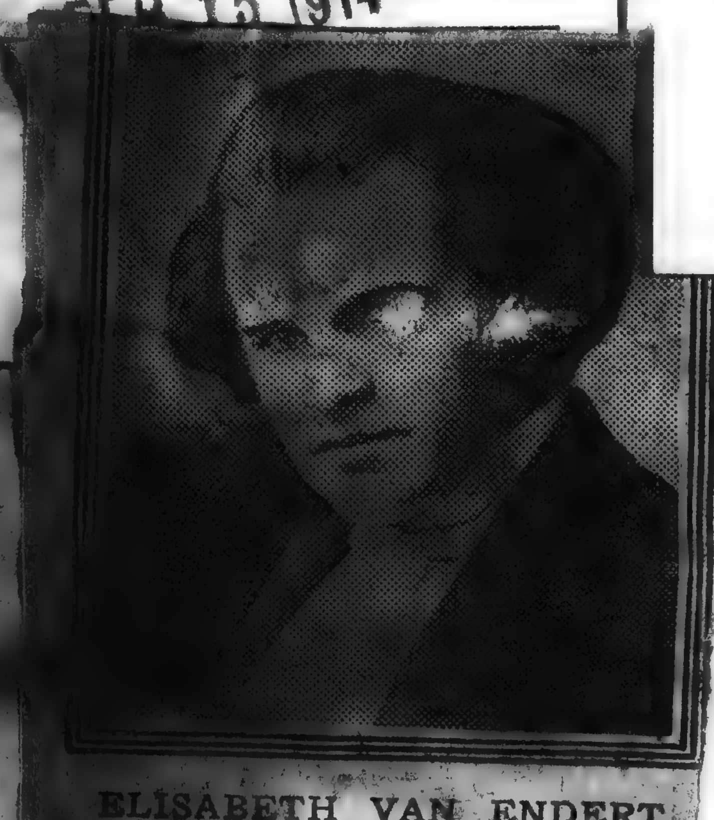
1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress Philadelphia

FEB 15 1914

blished:



ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
With Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM BACHAUS
With Philadelphia Orchestra

The Boston Symphony

AT THE particular request of Henry L. Higginson, Doctor Muck will preface the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow nig with Mozart's Masonic funeral music a token of Mr. Higginson's high resp and regard for the late Dr. S. W Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the progra comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphon F minor, No. 4; Ravel's "Mother Go suite and the overture to the oper Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagd The Ravel music will be new to Ph delphia. It comprises five short pie the entire work taking only 15 minutes perform. Originally they were compo in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleas of children. Their first performance w in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they w played by two children. Toward the cl of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out these pieces and the dances were arran by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet w performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and the Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is of an exquisite Gallic daintiness and delicacy.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's Hymn to Venus." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Tschaikowsky.....Symphony in F minor, No. 4
SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA
Hugo Wolf.....................“Verborgenheit”
Richard Strauss......................“Wiegenlied”
Richard Strauss..........................“Caecilie”
Ravel.....................Suite, “Mother Goose”
SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA
Humperdinck.......“Es Schaukeln Die Winde”
d'Albert................................“Venushymne”
Cornelius....Overture, “The Barber of Bagdad”

From TRIBUNE

The First Est
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date FEB 15 1914

Es 1884

THE ORCHESTRA IN BOSTON

The Philadelphia Orchestra plays today in Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a singularly graceful action on the part of the management of that admirable organization to extend its fraternal patronage, and it is an earnest of reciprocal good feeling, which heralds the way to a widespread generous recognition of kindred aims, instead of embittered rivalry, on the part of all American orchestras.

The Philadelphia Orchestra does not go to Boston to invite an invidious distinction. It goes there for the same reason that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming here for so many years, because variety is the spice of musical affairs as well as of human existence. There is plenty of room for both organizations. Philadelphia is proud of its musical representatives, and deems it a cause for congratulation that such a corps of instrumentalists as that led by Mr. Stokowski is sent forth in the city's name upon its cultural pilgrimage.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 15 1914

k, 1884

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elisabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and she is principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenberg. The reputation which preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration."

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 14 1914

Esta 1884

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, will be the soloist at the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 20. Mme. Van Endert, who is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the German Opera of Charlottenburg, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is coming to America for the first time for a brief tour during which she will sing with various orchestras and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts She also will be heard in recital. On Monday evening, February 16, the initial concert of the six Brooklyn concerts in the Beethoven Festival Series by the New York Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music. Mme. Julia Culp, the noted lieder singer, will be the soloist.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date FEB 17 1914

Est 1884

Boston Sends a New Star.

When the Boston Symphony pays its fourth visit to New York this week Elisabeth van Endert, an opera soprano of Berlin and Charlottenburg, will make her debut on Thursday evening in songs of Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert. The programme includes Brahms's Fourth symphony, Ravel's "Mother Goose" and Cornelius's overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." The Saturday matinee, without a soloist, has Beethoven's Fifth symphony, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Hungaria."

There will be no concert of the Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall this week. The orchestra, after playing in Brooklyn on Sunday with Carreno, is now engaged in a tour to Northampton, Elmira, Syracuse, Rochester, Jamsetown and Poughkeepsie with Mischa Elman.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From HERALD BROOKLYN EDI
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elisabeth von Endert, who is making her first appearance in America. Mme. von Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and now she is the principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg. The reputation which preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows:—Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D minor;" songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Cecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es schaukein die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

Establish

MISS ELISABETH VAN ENDERT, SOLOIST
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
CARNEGIE HALL

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Opera, will appear at the Thursday concert for the first time in New York, singing a group of songs from Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and d'Albert. The orchestral numbers will be Brahm's Symphony No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Saturday's programme will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and the Liszt symphonic poem "Hungaria."

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDIT
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

Estab 1884

NotedGermanSingers to Make Debut Here

Elizabeth Van Endert to Appear with Boston Symphony This Week.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elizabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and now she is the principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Operahaus, Charlottenburg.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Ceasar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows: Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor; songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Caecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration." by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GIVE FOURTH CONCERT.

New Soprano Is on the Programme, Which Includes Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Last night's traffic jam in the streets near Carnegie Hall was such that Karl Muck delayed the start of the fourth evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert fifteen minutes beyond the scheduled hour.

The many persons who disregarded unpleasant weather conditions were rewarded, for the orchestra gave a finished and virile performance of Brahms's E minor symphony No. 4, and was compelled by the audience to share with Dr. Muck the applause bestowed.

Equally satisfactory accomplishment ensued in the presentation of the less exacting work, "Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose), consisting of five descriptive bits by Maurice Ravel, first given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The charm of these brief pieces, which hold an intimate musical relationship to one another, consists principally in their fanciful qualities and the successful employment of dissonance eminently appropriate.

A soloist was presented in Elisabeth von Endert, a German lyric soprano brought here from Europe by the Boston orchestra. The newcomer sang a group of songs by Strauss and Wolf with assurance and commendable skill. Mme. von Endert's reception, however, seemed heartier than her abilities warranted. The overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" closed the concert.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

Estal 4

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elisabeth van Endert Comes From Berlin to Sing Songs.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme contained three orchestral numbers, namely, the fourth symphony of Brahms, Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" sketches and the overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad." After the first and second of these Elisabeth van Endert, a soprano of the Royal Opera of Berlin, sang songs with orchestra. The composers whom she essayed to interpret were Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert.

It is always natural to wonder just what calls certain musical personages across the western ocean, especially when the weather is so forbidding as it has been this winter. If Mme. van Endert were in need of an engagement at the Metropolitan she could doubtless get it without undertaking such an expensive audition. If she is an Alexandria, seeking new worlds to conquer, she might have been better advised to experiment first on a smaller one than the United States.

Not that Mme. van Endert did not dispose gifts of value. She proved to be right good to look at, and that is something of which not every concert singer can boast. Also she revealed a voice of beautiful quality and sympathetic character. Moreover she showed interpretative purpose not to be ignored. But her method of singing is not that to which the connoisseurs of this town give unqualified approval. A little too much unsteadiness in moderate passages, too much forcing and hardness of quality in fortes, too much tendency to wander from the pitch in these moments of forcing and a spasmodic attack in many places marred her delivery. However, she sang so loudly that she excited those hearers, always at concerts, who like everything very strong.

The star of the evening for those more fond of polished art was the orchestra. The performance of the Brahms symphony published once more all those splendid traits of skill and musicianship which make the Boston players dear to this public. It was a brilliant, emotional and beautifully balanced presentation of the noble symphony. The audience was moved by it and the applause was significant.

The Ravel pieces were delightfully done. These five little musical delineations of such things as the conversations of Beauty and the Beast are exquisitely made, impressionistic in parts, realistic in others, modern in melodic and tonal features, but thoroughly musical and alive with dainty fancy. Dr. Muck conducted them con amore and they were admirably

Overture to Cornelius's

7

[121]

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress Philadelphia
FEB 15 1914

blished:

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
With Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM BACHAUS
With Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony

AT THE particular request of Henry L. Higginson, Doctor Muck will preface the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert i the Academy of Music tomorrow nig with Mozart's Masonic funeral music a token of Mr. Higginson's high resp and regard for the late Dr. S. W Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the progra comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony F minor, No. 4; Revel's "Mother Goo suite and the overture to the oper Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagda The Ravel music will be new to Ph delphia. It comprises five short pie the entire work taking only 15 minutes perform. Originally they were compos in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasu of children. Their first performance w in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they we played by two children. Toward the clo of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out these pieces and the dances were arrang by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet wa performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and the Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is of an exquisite Gallic daintiness and delicacy.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's Hymn to Venus." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Tschaikowsky.....Symphony in F minor, No. 4
SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA
Hugo Wolf.........................."Verborgenheit"
Richard Strauss........................"Wiegenlied"
Richard Strauss............................"Caecilie"
Ravel........................Suite, "Mother Goose"
SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA
Humperdinck........"Es Schaukeln Die Winde"
d'Albert ...."Venushymne"
Cornelius.....Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"

From TRIBUNE

The First Esta
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
FEB 15 1914
Date

THE ORCHESTRA IN BOSTON

The Philadelphia Orchestra plays today in Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a singularly graceful action on the part of the management of that admirable organization to extend its fraternal patronage, and it is an earnest of reciprocal good feeling, which heralds the way to a widespread generous recognition of kindred aims, instead of embittered rivalry, on the part of all American orchestras.

The Philadelphia Orchestra does not go to Boston to invite an invidious distinction. It goes there for the same reason that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming here for so many years, because variety is the spice of musical affairs as well as of human existence. There is plenty of room for both organizations. Philadelphia is proud of its musical representatives, and deems it a cause for congratulation that such a corps of instrumentalists as that led by Mr. Stokowski is sent forth in the city's name upon its cultural pilgrimage.

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 15 1914
Date

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elisabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and she is principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Operuhaus, Charlottenberg. The reputation which preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Frank in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration."

k, 1884

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 14 1914
Date

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, will be the soloist at the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 20. Mme. Van Endert, who is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the German Opera of Charlottenburg, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is coming to America for the first time for a brief tour during which she will sing with various orchestras and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts She also will be heard in recital. On Monday evening, February 16, the initial concert of the six Brooklyn concerts in the Beethoven Festival Series by the New York Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music. Mme. Julia Culp, the noted lieder singer, will be the soloist.

Esta 884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

Boston Sends a New Star.

When the Boston Symphony pays its fourth visit to New York this week Elisabeth van Endert, an opera soprano of Berlin and Charlottenburg, will make her debut on Thursday evening in songs of Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert. The programme includes Brahms's Fourth symphony, Ravel's "Mother Goose'.' and Cornelius's overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." The Saturday matinee, without a soloist, has Beethoven's Fifth symphony, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Hungaria."

There will be no concert of the Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall this week. The orchestra, after playing in Brooklyn on Sunday with Carreno, is now engaged in a tour to Northampton, Elmira, Syracuse, Rochester, Jamsetown and Poughkeepsie with Mischa Elman.

Est 84

Newspaper Cutting Bu

From HERALD BROOKLYN ED
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1

THE fourth concert of the Boston phony Orchestra, in the Academ Music next Friday evening, will to Brooklyn one of the most brillia the younger singers of Germany, Elis von Endert, who is making her firs pearance in America. Mme. von E has been singing in public for six yea which time she has been a member o Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal O Berlin, and now she is the principal soprano of the new Deutsches Oper Charlottenburg. The reputation preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows:—Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D minor;" songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Cecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es schaukeln die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDIT
Address: New York City.
FEB 15 1914
Date

NotedGermanSingers to Make Debut Here

Elizabeth Van Endert to Appear with Boston Symphony This Week.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elizabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and now she is the principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Operahaus, Charlottenburg.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Ceasar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows: Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor; songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Caecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

Estab 384

Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GIVE FOURTH CONCERT.

New Soprano Is on the Programme, Which Includes Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Last night's traffic jam in the streets near Carnegie Hall was such that Karl Muck delayed the start of the fourth evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert fifteen minutes beyond the scheduled hour.

The many persons who disregarded unpleasant weather conditions were rewarded, for the orchestra gave a finished and virile performance of Brahms's E minor symphony No. 4, and was compelled by the audience to share with Dr. Muck the applause bestowed.

Equally satisfactory accomplishment ensued in the presentation of the less exacting work, "Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose), consisting of five descriptive hits by Maurice Ravel, first given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The charm of these brief pieces, which hold an intimate musical relationship to one another, consists principally in their fanciful qualities and the successful employment of dissonance eminently appropriate.

A soloist was presented in Elisabeth von Endert, a German lyric soprano brought here from Europe by the Boston orchestra. The newcomer sang a group of songs by Strauss and Wolf with assurance and commendable skill. Mme. von Endert's reception, however, seemed heartier than her abilities warranted. The overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" closed the concert.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

Establish

MISS ELISABETH VAN ENDERT, SOLOIST
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
CARNEGIE HALL

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Opera, will appear at the Thursday concert for the first time in New York, singing a group of songs from Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and d'Albert. The orchestral numbers will be Brahm's Symphony No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Saturday's programme will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and the Liszt symphonic poem "Hungaria."

* * *

From SUN
Address: New York City.
FEB 20 1914
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elisabeth van Endert Comes From Berlin to Sing Songs.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme contained three orchestral numbers, namely, the fourth symphony of Brahms, Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" sketches and the overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad." After the first and second of these Elisabeth van Endert, a soprano of the Royal Opera of Berlin, sang songs with orchestra. The composers whom she essayed to interpret were Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert.

It is always natural to wonder just what calls certain musical personages across the western ocean, especially when the weather is so forbidding as it has been this winter. If Mme. van Endert were in need of an engagement at the Metropolitan she could doubtless get it without undertaking such an expensive audition. If she is an Alexandria, seeking new worlds to conquer, she might have been better advised to experiment first on smaller one than the United States.

Not that Mme. van Endert did not dispose gifts of value. She proved to be right good to look at, and that is something of which not every concert singer can boast. Also she revealed a voice of beautiful quality and sympathetic character. Moreover she showed interpretative purpose not to be ignored. But her method of singing is not that to which the connoisseurs of this town give unqualified approval. A little too much unsteadiness in moderate passages, too much forcing and hardness of quality in fortes, too much tendency to wander from the pitch in these moments of forcing and a spasmodic attack in many places marred her delivery. However, she sang so loudly that she excited those hearers, always at concerts, who like everything very strong.

The star of the evening for those more fond of polished art was the orchestra. The performance of the Brahms symphony published once more all those splendid traits of skill and musicianship which make the Boston players dear to this public. It was a brilliant, emotional and beautifully balanced presentation of the noble symphony. The audience was moved by it and the applause was significant.

The Ravel pieces were delightfully done. These five little musical delineations of such things as the conversations of Beauty and the Beast are exquisitely made, impressionistic in parts, realistic in others, modern in melodic and tonal features, but thoroughly musical and alive with dainty fancy. Dr. Muck conducted them con amore and they went admirably. The conversations perhaps were the

Estal 34

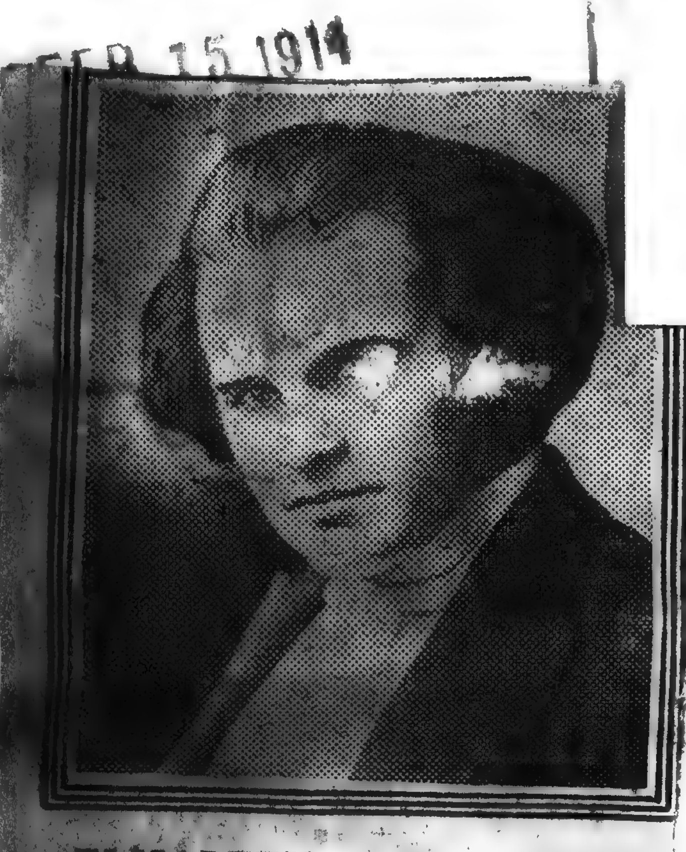
Overture to Cornelius's

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress Philadelphia

EB 15 1914

ublished:



ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
With Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM BACHAUS
With Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony

AT THE particular request of Henry L. Higginson, Doctor Muck will preface the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the programme comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Revel's "Mother Goose" suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only 15 minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children. Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast and the Fairy Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is of an exquisite Gallic daintiness and delicacy.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's Hymn to Venus." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Tschaikowsky.....Symphony in F minor, No. 4

SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA

Hugo Wolf.....................".Verborgenheit"
Richard Strauss....................."Wiegenlied"
Richard Strauss......................"Caecilie"
Ravel......................Suite, "Mother Goose"

SONGS WITH ORCHESTRA

Humperdinck......"Es Schaukeln Die Winde"
d'Albert ...."Venushymne"
Cornelius...Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"

Musical Notes

From TRIBUNE

The First Est...
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in ...

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date FEB 15 1914

Es... 1884

THE ORCHESTRA IN BOSTON

The Philadelphia Orchestra plays today in Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a singularly graceful action on the part of the management of that admirable organization to extend its fraternal patronage, and it is an earnest of reciprocal good feeling, which heralds the way to a widespread generous recognition of kindred aims, instead of embittered rivalry, on the part of all American orchestras.

The Philadelphia Orchestra does not go to Boston to invite an invidious distinction. It goes there for the same reason that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been coming here for so many years, because variety is the spice of musical affairs as well as of human existence. There is plenty of room for both organizations. Philadelphia is proud of its musical representatives, and deems it a cause for congratulation that such a corps of instrumentalists as that led by Mr. Stokowski is sent forth in the city's name upon its cultural pilgrimage.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 15 1914

...k, 1884

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music next Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elisabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and she is principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenberg. The reputation which preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Frank in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration."

TIMES FEB 14 1914
Brooklyn, N. Y.

...884

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, will be the soloist at the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, February 20. Mme. Van Endert, who is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the German Opera of Charlottenburg, has the reputation of being one of the most beautiful women on the Continental stage. She is coming to America for the first time for a brief tour during which she will sing with various orchestras and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts She also will be heard in recital. On Monday evening, February 16, the initial concert of the six Brooklyn concerts in the Beethoven Festival Series by the New York Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music. Mme. Julia Culp, the noted lieder singer, will be the soloist.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date

Est... 84

Boston Sends a New Star.

When the Boston Symphony pays its fourth visit to New York this week Elisabeth van Endert, an opera soprano of Berlin and Charlottenburg, will make her debut on Thursday evening in songs of Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert. The programme includes Brahms's Fourth symphony, Ravel's "Mother Goose'.' and Cornelius's overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." The Saturday matinee, without a soloist, has Beethoven's Fifth symphony, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Hungaria."

There will be no concert of the Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall this week. The orchestra, after playing in Brooklyn on Sunday with Carreno, is now engaged in a tour to Northampton, Elmira, Syracuse, Rochester, Jamsetown and Poughkeepsie with Mischa Elman.

Newspaper Cutting Bu...

From HERALD BROOKLYN ED...
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

..., 1884

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elisabeth von Endert, who is making her first appearance in America. Mme. von Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and now she is the principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Operhaus, Charlottenburg. The reputation which preceded her coming was most flattering and much is expected of her.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Cesar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss' tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows:—Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D minor;" songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Cecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es schaukeln die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

The First ...
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN BROOKLYN EDIT
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

Estab... 884

NotedGermanSingers to Make Debut Here

Elizabeth Van Endert to Appear with Boston Symphony This Week.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening will bring to Brooklyn one of the most brilliant of the younger singers of Germany, Elizabeth van Endert, who is making her first appearances in America in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Van Endert has been singing in public for six years, in which time she has been a member of the Royal Opera, Dresden; the Royal Opera, Berlin, and now she is the principal lyric soprano of the new Deutsches Operahaus, Charlottenburg.

The symphony will be the magnificent work of Ceasar Franck in D minor, with which Dr. Muck has had such great success this year, and the programme includes what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in full is as follows: Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor; songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit," by Wolf; "Wiegenlied," by Strauss; "Caecilie," by Strauss, and "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss; songs with orchestra, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," by Humperdinck; "Venushymne," by d'Albert, and overture, "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

... Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN GIVE FOURTH CONCERT

New Soprano Is on the Program Which Includes Brahms's Fou... Symphony.

Last night's traffic jam in the streets near Carnegie Hall was such that Karl Muck delayed the start of the four... evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert fifteen minutes beyond the scheduled hour.

The many persons who disregarded unpleasant weather conditions were rewarded, for the orchestra gave a finished and virile performance of Brahms's E minor symphony No. 4, and was compelled by the audience to share with Dr. Muck the applause bestowed.

Equally satisfactory accomplishment ensued in the presentation of the less exacting work, "Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose), consisting of five descriptive hits by Maurice Ravel, first given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The charm of these brief pieces, which hold an intimate musical relationship to one another, consists principally in their fanciful qualities and the successful employment of dissonance eminently appropriate.

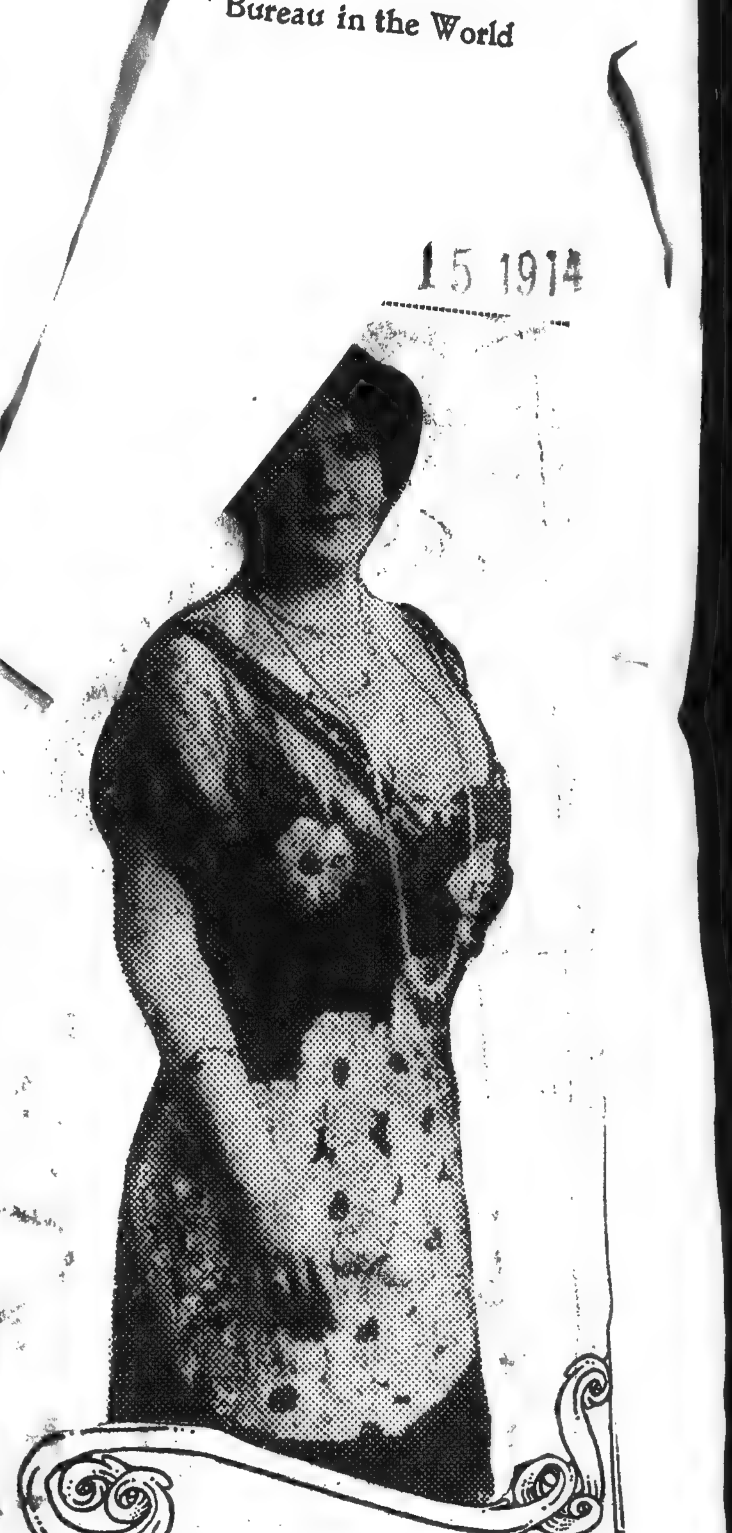
A soloist was presented in Elisabeth von Endert, a German lyric soprano brought here from Europe by the Boston orchestra. The newcomer sang a group of songs by Strauss and Wolf with assurance and commendable skill. Mme. von Endert's reception, however, seemed heartier than her abilities warranted. The overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" closed the concert.

[121]

Overture to Cornelius's

Bureau in the World

15 1914



MISS ELISABETH VAN ENDERT, SOLOIST
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
CARNEGIE HALL

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be given on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Opera, will appear at the Thursday concert for the first time in New York, singing a group of songs from Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Engelbert Humperdinck and d'Albert. The orchestral numbers will be Brahm's Symphony No. 4, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Cornelius' overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Saturday's programme will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and the Liszt symphonic poem "Hungaria."

* * *

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

Estal...

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Elisabeth van Endert Comes From Berlin to Sing Songs.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme contained three orchestral numbers, namely, the fourth symphony of Brahms, Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" sketches and the overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad." After the first and second of these Elisabeth van Endert, a soprano of the Royal Opera of Berlin, sang songs with orchestra. The composers whom she essayed to interpret were Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert.

It is always natural to wonder just what calls certain musical personages across the western ocean, especially when the weather is so forbidding as it has been this winter. If Mme. van Endert were in need of an engagement at the Metropolitan she could doubtless get it without undertaking such an expensive audition. If she is an Alexandria, seeking new worlds to conquer, she might have been better advised to experiment first on a smaller one than the United States.

Not that Mme. van Endert did not disclose gifts of value. She proved to be right good to look at, and that is something of which not every concert singer can boast. Also she revealed a voice of beautiful quality and sympathetic character. Moreover she showed interpretative purpose not to be ignored. But her method of singing is not that to which the connoisseurs of this town give unqualified approval. A little too much unsteadiness in moderate passages, too much forcing and hardness of quality in fortes, too much tendency to wander from the pitch in these moments of forcing and a spasmodic attack in many places marred her delivery. However, she sang so loudly that she excited those hearers, always at concerts, who like everything very strong.

The star of the evening for those more fond of polished art was the orchestra. The performance of the Brahms symphony published once more all those splendid traits of skill and musicianship which make the Boston players dear to this public. It was a brilliant, emotional and beautifully balanced presentation of the noble symphony. The audience was moved by it and the applause was significant.

The Ravel pieces were delightfully done. These five little musical delineations of such things as the conversations of Beauty and the Beast are exquisitely made, impressionistic in parts, realistic in others, modern in melodic and tonal features, but thoroughly musical and alive with dainty fancy. Dr. Muck conducted them con amore and they went admirably. The conversations perhaps was the

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 5 1914

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Elisabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York début at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in E minor, No. 4........Brahms
Songs with orchestra—
"Verborgenheit"..............Hugo Wolf
"Wiegenlied"............Richard Strauss
"Caecilie"...............Richard Strauss
"Mother Goose" Suite................Ravel
Songs with orchestra—
"Es schaukeln die Winde"..Humperdinck
"Venashymne"..................D'Albert
Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"... Cornelius

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.......Beethoven
"Death and Transfiguration" Richard Strauss
Symphonic Poem, "Hungeria"........Liszt

Albert Cornfeld, violinist, will give his first recital at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening. His programme includes, besides other numbers, Grieg's sonata in C minor, Vieuxtemps's concerto in E, and Paganini's "Moses Fantaisie" on the G string. Ellis Clark Hammann will be the accompanist.

ELISABETH VAN
Soloist w. Boston Symphony

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

ork, 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE programme of the Boston Symphony's fourth evening concert, which took place last night at Carnegie Hall, was one of unusual variety and interest. It contained a most dignified symphony; romantic songs by Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss; a set of children's piano pieces enlarged for orchestra; a modern setting to a medieval "hymn to Venus," and the overture to an almost forgotten opera.

The symphony was Brahms's fourth in E minor, completed only a short time before his death.

The First Established
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York City.
FEB 15 1914
Date

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, February 19, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, February 21, at 2:30. Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York debut at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Brahms....Symphony in E Minor, No. 4
Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf..............Verborgenheit
Richard Strauss ....Wiegenlied
Richard Strauss ....Caecilie
Ravel.............Mother Goose Suite
Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck ..Es schaukeln die Winde
D'Albert ....Venushymne
Cornelius..Overture to "The Barber of Seville."

SATURDAY AFTERNOON

Beethoven...Symphony in C Minor, No. 5
Richard Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria."

Elizabeth van Eudert, soloist with Boston Orchestra Thursday evening.

From Press
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914
Established:

NEW PRIMA DONNA NERVOUS IN DEBUT

Mme. Van Endert Striking Stage Figure, but Voice Shows Faults.

In Elisabeth van Endert, who made her first appearance in New York last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, introduced to local concertgoers a German prima donna who deserves recognition among the handsome women of the lyric stage.

After hearing her sing Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Medieval Hymn to Venus"—all with orchestral accompaniment—some persons may have wondered, to be sure, whether the soprano's vocal charms were as remarkable as one would expect to find in an artist who had come all the way across the Atlantic for an engagement of only three weeks. Certainly Mme. van Endert's voice is not wonderful and her method of using it by no means perfect.

It cannot be denied, however, that Mme. Van Endert made a distinctly agreeable impression on many of her auditors, who expressed their approval in emphatic terms, particularly after the first of the Strauss songs, and it is only fair to say that the unsteadiness of her tones, her uncertain rhythm and the faults in her phrasing may have been due to nervousness. It is something of an ordeal, after all, to face a New York audience for the first time.

Decidedly the most enjoyable offering of the evening was Brahms's Symphony in E minor, which came first on the programme. Played superbly by the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, who conducted with unusual fervor and enthusiasm, this work must have bene a revelation to more than a few listeners, who had misgivings at the thought of hearing the great German composer's least popular symphonic composition.

Walter Damrosch and his Symphony Society, who, strangely enough, are to play the same work on next Sunday afternoon, have no small task before them if they wish to approach the standard of technical perfection and

---

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Darbietung von Brahms' Vierter Symphonie ſeitens der Boſtoner als Eröffnungsnummer ihres geſtrigen Abend-Konzerts in Carnegie Hall rechne ich mir zu den höchſten Symphonie-Genüſſen. Ich kann ſagen, daß ich mich einer hinreißenderen Durchführung dieſes Werkes als die geſtrige Dr. Muck's und ſeiner Mannen nicht entſinnen kann. Namentlich das mit faſt geſpenſtiſchem Humor geſpielte „Allegro Giocoſo" und das in fabelhaften Farben wiedergegebene Finale mit den ungemein virtuos gebrachten Variationen, in denen namentlich das Blech „Wunder" vollführte, werden mir unvergeßlich ſein. Leider geſtattet die lange überſchrittene Mitternachtsſtunde ein eingehenderes Eingehen auf dieſe Meiſterleiſtung nicht. Das Publikum überquoll vor Bewunderung, und der Beifall wurde zur Ovation für den Dirigenten und das Orcheſter.

Die zarteſten Paſtellfarben verlieh Muck den fünf niedlichen Klangſpielereien der Ravel'ſchen Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye" („Mother Gooſe"). Er verdeckte die Kargheit der muſikaliſchen Subſtanz, milderte die gewagten Diſſonanzen und hob den grotesken Humor voll. Auch die Ouverture zu Cornelius' „Barbier von Bagdad" wurde fein und virtuos geſpielt.

In der Soliſtin der Veranſtaltung machten wir die Bekanntſchaft der Berliner Hofopernſängerin Frau Eliſabeth van Endert, die ſich mit 5 Liedergaben mit Orcheſterbegleitung einſtellte, Wolf's „Verborgenheit", „Wiegenlied" und „Caecilie" von Strauß, „Es ſchaukeln die Wellen" („Wiegenlied") von Humperdinck und der „Venushymne" aus der d'Albert'ſchen Oper „Die Königin von Cypern".

Dieſe Aufgabe war gerade keine gute Gelegenheit, das Weſen einer Künſtlerſchaft zu ergründen, und das war geſtern umſo ſchwerer, als die Dame ſichtlich und hörbar im Banne einer ſtarken Nervoſität ſtand, die wohl auf die Aufregungen des Debuts zurückzuführen war. Im Verlauf der Leiſtungen ſteigte ſich das ſympathiſche Organ der Künſtlerin, aus dem ich einen deutlichen Mezzoſopran-Charakter herauszuhören glaubte, die Höhe aber blieb etwas unſicher und etwas gläſig. Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikate Muſik ſie auch geſtaltete, zwang die Künſtlerin zu einem gewiſſen Al fresko der Darbietung, ſo daß ihre Qualitäten im Liedergeſang nicht voll zu ergründen waren.

Mir ſchien ein etwas opernhafter Zug darin unverkennbar, und im Minenſpiel trat eine gewiſſe Manirirtheit zu Tage, die ſich zum Beiſpiel in der gewiß ernſt gemeinten „Caecilie" in einem ſüßen Lächeln äußerte. Auch der Rhythmus der Dame erſchien mir nicht gerade unverrückbar. Dies meine Eindrücke, die ſich erſt nach einer weiteren künſtleriſchen Bekanntſchaft unter günſtigeren Umſtänden zu einem feſtgeformten Urtheil verdichten könnten. Dem Publikum gefiel Frau van Endert unzweifelhaft, denn der ihr zugedachte Beifall klang voll und warm. H.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date 5 1914

k, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Elisabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York début at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in E minor, No. 4........Brahms
Songs with orchestra—
  "Verborgenheit"..............Hugo Wolf
  "Wiegenlied"............Richard Strauss
  "Caecilie"..............Richard Strauss
"Mother Goose" Suite.................Ravel
Songs with orchestra—
  "Es schaukeln die Winde"..Humperdinck
  "Venashymne"..................D'Albert
Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"...
Cornelius

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.......Beethoven
"Death and Transfiguration"
Richard Strauss
Symphonic Poem, "Hungeria"........Liszt

Albert Cornfeld, violinist, will give his first recital at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening. His programme includes, besides other numbers, Grieg's sonata in C minor, Vieuxtemps's concerto in E, and Paganini's "Moses Fantaisie" on the G string. Ellis Clark Hammann will be the accompanist.

The First Established
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN
Address: New York City.
FEB 15 1914
Date

, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, February 19, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, February 21, at 2:30. Elizabeth van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York debut at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Brahms....Symphony in E Minor, No. 4
Songs with orchestra:
  Hugo Wolf.............Verborgenheit
  Richard Strauss ....Wiegenlied
  Richard Strauss ....Caecilie
  Ravel..............Mother Goose Suite
Songs with orchestra:
  Humperdinck ..Es schaukeln die Winde
  D'Albert ....Venushymne
  Cornelius..Overture to "The Barber of Seville."

SATURDAY AFTERNOON

Beethoven...Symphony in C Minor, No. 5
Richard Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria."

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB

1884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Darbietung von Brahms' Vierter Symphonie ſeitens der Boſtoner als Eröffnungsnummer ihres geſtrigen Abend-Konzerts in Carnegie Hall rechne ich mit zu den höchſten Symphonie-Genüſſen. Ich kann ſagen, daß ich mich einer hinreißenderen Durchführung dieſes Werkes als die geſtrige Dr. Muck's und ſeiner Mannen nicht entſinnen kann. Namentlich das mit faſt geſpenſtiſchem Humor geſpielte „Allegro Giocoſo" und das in fabelhaften Farben wiedergegebene Finale mit den ungemein virtuos gebrachten Variationen, in denen namentlich das Blech „Wunder" vollführte, werden mir unvergeßlich ſein. Leider geſtattet die lange überſchrittene Mitternachtsſtunde ein eingehenderes Eingehen auf dieſe Meiſterleiſtung nicht. Das Publikum überquoll vor Bewunderung, und der Beifall wurde zur Ovation für den Dirigenten und das Orcheſter.

Die zarteſten Paſtellfarben verlieh Muck den fünf niedlichen Klangſpielereien der Ravel'ſchen Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye" („Mother Gooſe"). Er verdeckte die Kargheit der muſikaliſchen Subſtanz, milderte die gewagten Diſſonanzen und hob den grotesken Humor voll. Auch die Ouverture zu Cornelius' „Barbier von Bagdad" wurde fein und virtuos geſpielt.

In der Soliſtin der Veranſtaltung machten wir die Bekanntſchaft der Berliner Hofopernſängerin Frau Eliſabeth van Endert, die ſich mit 5 Liedergaben mit Orcheſterbegleitung einſtellte, Wolf's „Verborgenheit", „Wiegenlied" und „Caecilie" von Strauß, „Es ſchaukeln die Wellen" („Wiegenlied") von Humperdinck und der „Venushymne" aus der d'Albert'ſchen Oper „Die Königin von Cypern".

Dieſe Aufgabe war gerade keine gute Gelegenheit, das Weſen einer Künſtlerſchaft zu ergründen, und das war geſtern umſo ſchwerer, als die Dame ſichtlich und hörbar im Banne einer ſtarken Nervoſität ſtand, die wohl auf die Aufregungen des Debuts zurückzuführen war. Im Verlauf der Leiſtungen ſteigte ſich das ſympathiſche Organ der Künſtlerin, aus dem ich einen deutlichen Mezzoſopran-Charakter herauszuhören glaubte, die Höhe aber blieb etwas unſicher und etwas glaſig. Die volle Orcheſterbegleitung, ſo delikate Muſik ſie auch geſtaltete, zwang die Künſtlerin zu einem gewiſſen Al fresko der Darbietung, ſo daß ihre Qualitäten im Liedergeſang nicht voll zu ergründen waren.

Mir ſchien ein etwas opernhafter Zug darin unverkennbar, und im Minenſpiel trat eine gewiſſe Manirirtheit zu Tage, die ſich zum Beiſpiel in der gewiß ernſt gemeinten „Caecilie" in einem ſüßen Lächeln äußerte. Auch der Rhythmus der Dame erſchien mir nicht gerade unverrückbar. Dies meine Eindrücke, die ſich erſt nach einer weiteren künſtleriſchen Bekanntſchaft unter günſtigeren Umſtänden zu einem feſtgeformten Urtheil verdichten könnten. Dem Publikum gefiel Frau van Endert unzweifelhaft, denn der ihr zugedachte Beifall klang voll und warm. H.

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
Soloist ~ Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carn Hall

---

the World

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

ork, 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE programme of the Boston Symphony's fourth evening concert, which took place last night at Carnegie Hall, was one of unusual variety and interest. It contained a most dignified symphony; romantic songs by Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss; a set of children's piano pieces enlarged for orchestra; a modern setting to a medieval "hymn to Venus," and the overture to an almost forgotten opera.

The symphony was Brahms's fourth in E minor, completed only a short time before his death.

---

t, soloist with Boston Orchestra Thursday evening.

---

a wrong by which result tory fights, gh many m
ysical conte

Press

City.

DONNA
IN DEBUT

an Endert Striking Stage Figure, but Voice Shows Faults.

In Elisabeth van Endert, who made her first appearance in New York last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, introduced to local concertgoers a German prima donna who deserves recognition among the handsome women of the lyric stage.

After hearing her sing Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Medieval Hymn to Venus"—all with orchestral accompaniment—some persons may have wondered, to be sure, whether the soprano's vocal charms were as remarkable as one would expect to find in an artist who had come all the way across the Atlantic for an engagement of only three weeks. Certainly Mme. van Endert's voice is not wonderful and her method of using it by no means perfect.

It cannot be denied, however, that Mme. Van Endert made a distinctly agreeable impression on many of her auditors, who expressed their approval in emphatic terms, particularly after the first of the Strauss songs, and it is only fair to say that the unsteadiness of her tones, her uncertain rhythm and the faults in her phrasing may have been due to nervousness. It is something of an ordeal, after all, to face a New York audience for the first time.

Decidedly the most enjoyable offering of the evening was Brahms's Symphony in E minor, which came first on the programme. Played superbly by the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, who conducted with unusual fervor and enthusiasm, this work must have bene a revelation to more than a few listeners, who had misgivings at the thought of hearing the great German composer's least popular symphonic composition.

Walter Damrosch and his Symphony Society, who, strangely enough, are to play the same work on next Sunday afternoon, have no small task before them if they wish to approach the standard of technical perfection and

The First
Newsp

...n the World

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

Established:

NEW SOPRANO WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

At each successive visit of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York, the reviewer of musical happenings is tempted and sometimes he succumbs. The temptation is the always irresistible lure of repetition; and repetition is sameness and monotony is dullness, and dullness, in these days, is the unpardonable sin of print. But let us succumb once more and revel in reptition. Those who heard the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening will sympathize with the tempted, and those who did not must be forbearing. The repetition consists in the acknowledgment that the playing of this band gladdens the ears of the discriminating lover of music, makes his heartbeats quicken with a surging joy and drives the blood likewise to his brain at the stimulation of the keenest intellectual pleasure.

Let us also succumb to frankness, as well as to repetition. Why this paean of thankfulness over the two monthly concerts of the Boston Orchestra? Merely the natural ebullition of joyousness on the part of those who are athirst and slake their needs within the wellspring of this oasis. For New York has several orchestras and yet has not one. New York has orchestral music poured down its throat in torrential quantities but it all tastes of the bitter salt of Dead Sea ineptitude, leaving those who quaff it more thirsty than before.

New York has had more or less frequent opportunities of hearing the E minor symphony of Brahms, but these opportunities have been to the greater confusion of the Brahmins and the greater glory of the persistently stubborn "lesser breeds without the law." This Fourth Symphony of the hierophant of lambent quietude that shed its untroubled brilliance upon the city on the Wien, has always seemed a veil of many vapors. But a few expositions of this symphony such as that vouchsafed by Dr. Muck and his men last night would dissip shrouding doubts and questioni

The symphony was revealed crystalline clarity that beat vibrant flood of enlightenmen the auricles of the emotions minor symphony no longer h away undisputed. A riper pu profounder art, a vaster seemed to be bodied forth. He the stir and the doubt, the ex and the brooding spirit of a life, sung by one who knew he sang. Dr. Muck and h achieved a veritably memorabl and memorable things are few

There were other matters paratively minor import. One of these was the first appearance here of a new singer, Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, who has been identified with the opera at Dresden and the Kaiser's opera at Berlin. She sang four songs with orchestral accompaniment by Wolf, Strauss and Humperdinck, and the "Hymn to Venus," from Rudolf Lothar's "The Queen of Cyprus," in the setting by Eugen d'Albert.

Mme. van Endert showed that she is a singer of intelligence and taste, but so far as could be judged last evening, not blessed with a voice of much charm or other attractiveness. It is of mezzo soprano quality and it is thin, without richness, and lacks a carrying resonance. Nevertheless the singer displayed powers of such apt phrasing and so full a grasp of the meaning of what she had to sing that her efforts were often interesting and satisfying.

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme consisted of Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, introduced to New York two years ago by Walter Damrosch, and the second overture to Peter Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," as orchestrated by Liszt. The Ravel suite is a jeu d'esprit and has a dainty charm. It was played with a smilingly facile virtuosity.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Leader
Address Cleveland Ohio
Date JAN 30 1914

Established:

Boston Sym... Like Inspir...

With the balmy winds that blew last night came the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Grays' Armory with Dr. Karl Muck at its head to play a program in such manner as only the Boston band is able.

They played the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, the Brahms "Tragic" overture, the Liszt "Les Preludes" and the Wagner "Flying Dutchman" overture.

Under the baton of Dr. Muck and through the mighty abilities of the individual members of the orchestra these pieces seemed as if they had never existed before, as if they had never lived questionable and lowly relations with other less capable orchestras but as if they were being created spontaneously, joyously and perfectly for the first time.

Even the program notes that the owlish Mr. Philip Hale, of Boston, supplied, which are always learned, rich and colorful, seemed to grow anemic, lean and futile alongside of the gorgeousness and iridescence of the music itself.

There is nothing to be heard in America so wonderful, so pure, so sensuous, so varied and so thrilling and stirring to the emotions as the tone that comes welling up from the instruments of this extraordinary organization.

The joy that is to be had simply in listening to the ensemble tone of the orchestra and not even in paying attention to the ideas that the music is supposed to be giving forth is only intensified when out of the great web of sound one solo instrument after another arises to spin a golden phrase and then sinks back again into the concrete body.

Yet the reading and the playing of the Liszt "Les Preludes" were such wonderful things that the World... ence did its best to ... by applause th... weak...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 12 1914

Established: 1884

COUSINS TO APPEAR AT CONCERT TUESDAY

Misses Baugher Will Sing At Lehmann's With Philadelphia Quartet.

Miss Edna Harwood Baugher, soprano, of Philadelphia, and Miss Anna Gertrude Baugher, contralto, of this city, who will make their first joint appearance in Baltimore next Tuesday night at the concert to be given in Lehmann's Hall by the Philadelphia Quartet and Anton Witek, concert meister, Boston Symphony Orchestra, are cousins and have been singing together for some time.

The Misses Baugher are original members of the Philadelphia Quartet and their work at its concerts has been highly spoken of both in New York and Philadelphia. Miss Edna Baugher has appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra and is engaged for the soprano parts in the rendition of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" that will be given in Philadelphia on March 19.

Miss Anna Baugher made her Baltimore debut last season and her metropolitan debut at the Hotel Plaza, New York, only a short time ago, meeting with marked success on both occasions. She is contralto soloist of First Presbyterian Church and Madison Avenue Temple.

The tenor of the Quartet is Nicolas Douty, a singer of established reputation throughout the country, while the barytone parts are being temporarily sung by Henry Hotz, who is taking the place of George Russell Straun.

The principal feature of the vocal program of the concert will be Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

...RESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
...17 1914

Established: 1884

...ON SYMPHONY ...NGS NOVELTIES

...cert Opens with Mozart ...c in Memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

PROGRAM.

Mozart..........Masonic Funeral Music
In Memoriam, Silas Weir Mitchell
Tschaikowsky..Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36
- I. Andante Sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
- III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement")
Strauss....."Wiegenlied" (Cradle Song)
Strauss.................. "Caecilie"
Ravel:
Ma Mere l'Oye ("Mother Goose"). V. Pieces Enfantines
First time in Philadelphia
- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant (Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty).
- II. Petit Poucet (Hop o' my Thumb).
- III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes (Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes).
- IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete (The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast).
- V. Le Jardin Feerique (The Fairy Garden).

Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck "Es schaukeln die Winde"
d'Albert............"Hymn to Venus"
Cornelius:
Overture to the Opera, "The Barber of Bagdad"
Soloist............Elisabeth van Endert
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Muck

A program of unusual variety was provided for the fourth Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night in the Academy of Music. It is difficult to decide whether greater praise should be bestowed on the program builder for the brilliant realization of his idea, or on the orchestra itself for a superbly restrained and delicate playing of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, about which the concert centered.

The symphony was given here earlier in the season by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Its reception then, and the undoubted appeal it made to last night's audience ought to insure the more frequent playing of what is, in its own way, as much a masterpiece as the overworked "Pathetique." One gathers from it the impression of a rather different Tschaikowsky; much less the man of Byronic glooms and semi-barbaric desperations, more the splendidly vital Russian, with his love of Oriental color, his delight in rhythms that range from the war march to the tread of fairy dances. Than the first part of the opening movement, with its eccentric wood wind motives played against a choir of strings, one could scarcely imagine anything more entirely lovely, especially as it was rendered last night, with amazing delicacy and insight. The Scherzo, with its clear outline of pizzicato themes, was also done in a masterly way.

Elizabeth van Endert, a "lieder singer," was the soloist. Not only her style, but the actual selection of her songs, seems consciously to follow in the steps of that undoubted artist, Elena Gerhardt. If a comparison is necessary, Fraulein van Endert has a voice of perhaps purer tone quality than Gerhardt's, but distinctly less interpretative power, less art. Of the five songs she sung, the last, a "Hymn to Venus," from d'Albert's settings for "The Queen of Cyprus," proved most successful because it was most in her style; yet it recalled Gerhardt's "Du bist mein Land, Orplede." Her first number was Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," always sung here by Gerhardt; after which were heard Richard Strauss "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," and Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde." This last is a wholly charming cradle song—really a German version, though somewhat more literary, of our familiar "Rock-a-by Baby." The melodic pattern has the simplicity of a folk song, and the response of the audience reminded one of a Schumann-Heink concert.

A genuine novelty was the "Mother Goose Suite," by Ravel; five bits of childhood music played for the first time here. The idea is not essentially different from that of the Tschaikowsky "Nut Cracker Suite," yet, as might be expected of Ravel, the music is far more "modern," using the word in the sense of "formless." As in the "Nut Cracker" music, there is a celeste employed, lending an empty, tinkling note to the number entitled "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodes." A translation truer to the spirit of the French title would be "Queen of Tea Cup Land." The oriental color is remarkable; at about the middle of the number are a few bars recalling definitely the pure sensuality of Wagner's "Venusberg" music. The four other numbers were all decidedly interesting.

As a finale, Dr. Muck played the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," an opera by Cornelius; not the original overture, as Mr. Hale mentions in his program notes, but one composed much later, orchestrated by Liszt, and not performed until after Cornelius' death. It sounded a bit old-fashioned, and while rather sturdily romantic, seemed but barely worth while.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 19

Established

Music and Musicians

Van Endert's "Venus" and Muck's Boston "Mother Goose" Are All Swans. Fremstad's Five-Hour "Goetterdaemmerung" as Hertz Ends Matinee "Ring."

By far the worst blockade of carriage north of the grand opera zone thi year, in spite of extra snow remover and special police, held the start of the Boston Symphony Orchestra twenty minutes overtime at Carnegie Hall las night. C. A. Ellis and W. H. Brennan gripped their conductor, Carl Muck, by both arms back of the stage, while Louis Salter sent the Carnegie staff in full-dress relays to dig the 200 limousines out of an arctic ice jam. Even when the concert began every pause in the Brahms Fourth symphony saw a host of late arrivals in the aisles, and Dr Muck beat a new score into dog's-eared tatters rapping for order. Then Elizabeth Van Endert, a hobbled white satin vision of elegance from the Kaiser's opera in Berlin, made her first bow here in Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Cradle Song" and brilliant "Caecilie," and D'Albert's glorious "Venus Hymn." Before this last the new soprano gave a humorous children's song of Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and the big band played five pieces labelled "Infantine" from Ravel's "Mother Goose," with all the polysyllabic prattle of Pater, Meredith and Henry James rolled into one. Finally the overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," like a painted ocean of sea foam blown from sounding brass, signalled a retreat at 10:30 o'clock.

When have the wise men of Boston ever heard an audience laugh in New York? It really happened when Anton Witek's fiddle squeaked the chirp of Ravel's birds eating up the bread crumb trail of "Hop o' My Thumb." Muck's "Mother Geese" were all swans. A French composer can never have known such shimmery shivers of sweet dissonance in "Beauty and the Beast," "Sleeping Beauty" and a "Green Snake," whose Chinese pagoda bells made the house laugh again. Mme. Van Endert herself furnished a pretty smile in German Humperdinck's breezy "Rock-a-Bye." The most beautiful playing was done in the andante of Brahms's symphony, a choral song without words borrowing his own melody of "I wandered by a lonely grave." The flute notes floated on the orchestral flood like rose petals on a river flamed by the setting [illegible]. It is a strong man's dying look on [illegible], this tragic symphony that casts no shadows; there is triumph without scorn and tenderness without pity.

As a programme maker, Dr. Muck was put on his mettle this week by some local events like the start of a Beethoven cycle. To-morrow the Bostonians also play Beethoven's Fifth symphony, with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," adding Liszt's "Hungaria" for the first time in New York. There is no soloist at the matinee. Mme. Van Endert reappears to-night in Brooklyn in all of last night's songs, while the band has Cesar Franck's symphony, the Strauss "Verklaerung" and Smetana's overture to "Bartered Bride." Four-horse trucks were waiting at Carnegie Hall at midnight to carry the instruments over the river to the Academy to-day.

The First
Newspap

in the World

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

Established:

NEW SOPRANO WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

At each successive visit of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York, the reviewer of musical happenings is tempted and sometimes he succumbs. The temptation is the always irresistible lure of repetition; and repetition is sameness and monotony is dullness, and dullness, in these days, is the unpardonable sin of print. But let us succumb once more and revel in reptition. Those who heard the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening will sympathize with the tempted, and those who did not must be forbearing. The repetition consists in the acknowledgment that the playing of this band gladdens the ears of the discriminating lover of music, makes his heartbeats quicken with a surging joy and drives the blood likewise to his brain at the stimulation of the keenest intellectual pleasure.

Let us also succumb to frankness, as well as to repetition. Why this paean of thankfulness over the two monthly concerts of the Boston Orchestra? Merely the natural ebullition of joyousness on the part of those who are athirst and slake their needs within the wellspring of this oasis. For New York has several orchestras and yet has not one. New York has orchestral music poured down its throat in torrential quantities but it all tastes of the bitter salt of Dead Sea ineptitude, leaving those who quaff it more thirsty than before.

New York has had more or less frequent opportunities of hearing the E minor symphony of Brahms, but these opportunities have been to the greater confusion of the Brahmins and the greater glory of the persistently stubborn "lesser breeds without the law." This Fourth Symphony of the hierophant of lambent quietude that shed its untroubled brilliance upon the city on the Wien, has always seemed a veil of many vapors. But a few expositions of this symphony such as that vouchsafed by Dr. Muck and his men last night would dissipate all shrouding doubts and questioning.

The symphony was revealed with a crystalline clarity that beat like a vibrant flood of enlightenment upon the auricles of the emotions. The C minor symphony no longer held its sway undisputed. A riper purpose, a profounder art, a vaster message, seemed to be bodied forth. Here were the stir and the doubt, the exaltation and the brooding spirit of a song of life, sung by one who knew whereof he sang. Dr. Muck and his men achieved a veritably memorable thing, and memorable things are few indeed.

There were other matters of comparatively minor import. One of these was the first appearance here of a new singer, Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, who has been identified with the opera at Dresden and the Kaiser's opera at Berlin. She sang four songs with orchestral accompaniment by Wolf, Strauss and Humperdinck, and the "Hymn to Venus," from Rudolf Lothar's "The Queen of Cyprus," in the setting by Eugen d'Albert.

Mme. van Endert showed that she is a singer of intelligence and taste, but so far as could be judged last evening, not blessed with a voice of much charm or other attractiveness. It is of mezzo soprano quality and it is thin, without richness, and lacks a carrying resonance. Nevertheless the singer displayed powers of such apt phrasing and so full a grasp of the meaning of what she had to sing that her efforts were often interesting and satisfying.

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme consisted of Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, introduced to New York two years ago by Walter Damrosch, and the second overture to Peter Cornelius's opera, "The Barber of Bagdad," as orchestrated by Liszt. The Ravel suite is a jeu d'esprit and has a dainty charm. It was played with a smilingly facile virtuosity. W

From TRIBUNE

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Leader
Address Cleveland Oh
Date JAN 30 1914

Boston Symp Like Inspi

With the balmy winds that blew last night came the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Grays' Armory with Dr. Karl Muck at its head to play a program in such manner as only the Boston band is able.

They played the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, the Brahms "Tragic" overture, the Liszt "Les Preludes" and the Wagner "Flying Dutchman" overture.

Under the baton of Dr. Muck and through the mighty abilities of the individual members of the orchestra these pieces seemed as if they had never existed before, as if they had never lived questionable and lowly relations with other less capable orchestras but as if they were being created spontaneously, joyously and perfectly for the first time.

Even the program notes that the owlish Mr. Philip Hale, of Boston, supplied, which are always learned, rich and colorful, seemed to grow anemic, lean and futile alongside of the gorgeousness and iridescence of the music itself.

There is nothing to be heard in America so wonderful, so pure, so sensuous, so varied and so thrilling and stirring to the emotions as the tone that comes welling up from the instruments of this extraordinary organization.

The joy that is to be had simply in listening to the ensemble tone of the orchestra and not even in paying attention to the ideas that the music is supposed to be giving forth is only intensified when out of the great web of sound one solo instrument after another arises to spin a golden phrase and then sinks back again into the concrete body.

Yet the reading and the playing of the Liszt "Les Preludes" were such wonderful things that the [illegible] ence did its best to [illegible] by applause [illegible] weak[illegible]

EVENING SUN
New York City
FEB 20 19

Music and Musicians

Van Endert's "Venus" and Muck's Boston "Mother Goose" Are All Swans.

Fremstad's Five-Hour "Goetterdaemmerung" as Hertz Ends Matinee "Ring."

By far the worst blockade of carriages north of the grand opera zone this year, in spite of extra snow removers and special police, held the start of the Boston Symphony Orchestra twenty minutes overtime at Carnegie Hall last night. C. A. Ellis and W. H. Brennan gripped their conductor, Carl Muck, by both arms back of the stage, while Louis Salter sent the Carnegie staff in full-dress relays to dig the 200 limousines out of an arctic ice jam. Even when the concert began every pause in the Brahms Fourth symphony saw a host of late arrivals in the aisles, and Dr. Muck beat a new score into dog's-eared tatters rapping for order. Then Elizabeth Van Endert, a hobbled white satin vision of elegance from the Kaiser's opera in Berlin, made her first bow here in Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss's "Cradle Song" and brilliant "Caecilie," and D'Albert's glorious "Venus Hymn." Before this last the new soprano gave a humorous children's song of Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and the big band played five pieces labelled "Infantine" from Ravel's "Mother Goose," with all the polysyllabic prattle of Pater, Meredith and Henry James rolled into one. Finally the overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," like a painted ocean of sea foam blown from sounding brass, signalled a retreat at 10:30 o'clock.

When have the wise men of Boston ever heard an audience laugh in New York? It really happened when Anton Witek's fiddle squeaked the chirp of Ravel's birds eating up the bread crumb trail of "Hop o' My Thumb." Muck's "Mother Geese" were all swans. A French composer can never have known such shimmery shivers of sweet dissonance in "Beauty and the Beast," "Sleeping Beauty" and a "Green Snake," whose Chinese pagoda bells made the house laugh again. Mme. Van Endert herself furnished a pretty smile in German Humperdinck's breezy "Rock-a-Bye." The most beautiful playing was done in the andante of Brahms's symphony, a choral song without words borrowing his own melody of "I wandered by a lonely grave." The flute notes flo[illegible] on the orchestral flood like rose [illegible] on a river flamed by the setting [illegible] It is a strong man's dying look on [illegible], this tragic symphony that casts no shadows; there is triumph without scorn and tenderness without pity.

As a programme maker, Dr. Muck was put on his mettle this week by some local events like the start of a Beethoven cycle. To-morrow the Bostonians also play Beethoven's Fifth symphony, with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," adding Liszt's "Hungaria" for the first time in New York. There is no soloist at the matinee. Mme. Van Endert reappears to-night in Brooklyn in all of last night's songs, while the band has Cesar Franck's symphony, the Strauss "Verklaerung" and Smetana's overture to "Bartered Bride." Four-horse trucks were waiting at Carnegie Hall at midnight to carry the instruments over the river to the Academy to-day.

[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting B
From EVENI
Address:
Date

COUSINS T CONCERT TO

Misses Baugher Will Sing A. Lehmann's With Philadelphia Quartet.

Miss Edna Harwood Baugher, soprano, of Philadelphia, and Miss Anna Gertrude Baugher, contralto, of this city, who will make their first joint appearance in Baltimore next Tuesday night at the concert to be given in Lehmann's Hall by the Philadelphia Quartet and Anton Witek, concert meister, Boston Symphony Orchestra, are cousins and have been singing together for some time.

The Misses Baugher are original members of the Philadelphia Quartet and their work at its concerts has been highly spoken of both in New York and Philadelphia. Miss Edna Baugher has appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra and is engaged for the soprano parts in the rendition of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" that will be given in Philadelphia on March 19.

Miss Anna Baugher made her Baltimore debut last season and her metropolitan debut at the Hotel Plaze, New York, only a short time ago, meeting with marked success on both occasions. She is contralto soloist of First Presbyterian Church and Madison Avenue Temple.

The tenor of the Quartet is Nicolas Douty, a singer of established reputation throughout the country, while the barytone parts are being temporarily sung by Henry Hotz, who is taking the place of George Russell Straun.

The principal feature of the vocal program of the concert will be Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Dat 17 1914
1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS NOVELTIES

The Concert Opens with Mozart Music in Memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

PROGRAM.

Mozart..........Masonic Funeral Music
In Memoriam, Silas Weir Mitchell
Tschaikowsky..Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante Sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Songs with orchestra:
Hugo Wolf "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement")
Strauss.....“Wiegenlied” (Cradle Song)
Strauss....................“Caecilie”
Ravel:
Ma Mere l'Oye ("Mother Goose"), V. Pieces Enfantines
First time in Philadelphia
I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant (Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty).
II. Petit Poucet (Hop o' my Thumb).
III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes (Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes).
IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete (The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast).
V. Le Jardin Feerique (The Fairy Garden).
Songs with orchestra:
Humperdinck "Es schaukeln die Winde"
d'Albert...........“Hymn to Venus”
Cornelius:
Overture to the Opera, "The Barber of Bagdad"
Soloist..............Elisabeth van Endert
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Muck

A program of unusual variety was provided for the fourth Philadelphia concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last night in the Academy of Music. It is difficult to decide whether greater praise should be bestowed on the program builder for the brilliant realization of his idea, or on the orchestra itself for a superbly restrained and delicate playing of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, about which the concert centered.

The symphony was given here earlier in the season by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Its reception then, and the undoubted appeal it made to last night's audience ought to insure the more frequent playing of what is, in its own way, as much a masterpiece as the overworked "Pathetique." One gathers from it the impression of a rather different Tschaikowsky; much less the man of Byronic glooms and semi-barbaric desperations, more the splendidly vital Russian, with his love of Oriental color, his delight in rhythms that range from the war march to the tread of fairy dances. Than the first part of the opening movement, with its eccentric wood wind motives played against a choir of strings, one could scarcely imagine anything more entirely lovely, especially as it was rendered last night, with amazing delicacy and insight. The Scherzo, with its clear outline of pizzicato themes, was also done in a masterly way.

Elizabeth van Endert, a "lieder singer," was the soloist. Not only her style, but the actual selection of her songs, seems consciously to follow in the steps of that undoubted artist, Elena Gerhardt. If a comparison is necessary, Fraulein van Endert has a voice of perhaps purer tone quality than Gerhardt's, but distinctly less interpretative power, less art. Of the five songs she sung, the last, a "Hynm to Venus," from d'Albert's settings for "The Queen of Cyprus," proved most successful because it was most in her style; yet it recalled Gerhardt's "Du bist mein Land, Orplede." Her first number was Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," always sung here by Gerhardt; after which were heard Richard Strauss "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," and Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde." This last is a wholly charming cradle song—really a German version, though somewhat more literary, of our familiar "Rock-a-by Baby." The melodic pattern has the simplicity of a folk song, and the response of the audience reminded one of a Schumann-Heink concert.

A genuine novelty was the "Mother Goose Suite," by Ravel; five bits of childhood music played for the first time here. The idea is not essentially different from that of the Tschaikowsky "Nut Cracker Suite," yet, as might be expected of Ravel, the music is far more "modern," using the word in the sense of "formless." As in the "Nut Cracker" music, there is a celeste employed, lending an empty, tinkling note to the number entitled "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodes." A translation truer to the spirit of the French title would be "Queen of Tea Cup Land." The oriental color is remarkable; at about the middle of the number are a few bars recalling definitely the pure sensuality of Wagner's "Venusberg" music. The four other numbers were all decidedly interesting.

As a finale, Dr. Muck played the overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," an opera by Cornelius; not the original overture, as Mr. Hale mentions in his program notes, but one composed much later, orchestrated by Liszt, and not performed until after Cornelius' death. It sounded a bit old-fashioned, and while rather sturdily romantic, seemed but barely worth while.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 15 1914

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 19, at 8.15, and on Saturday afternoon, February 21, at 2.30. Elisabeth Van Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Deutsches Opernhaus, Charlottenburg, will make her New York debut at the Thursday evening concert. There will be no soloist on Saturday afternoon.

rk, 1884

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT · PRINCIPAL LYRIC SOPRANO OF THE ROYAL OPERA HOUSE, BERLIN, WHO WILL BE SOLOIST AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON NEXT THURSDAY EVENING IN CARNEGIE HALL

VAN
CHIC
OP

NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date B 17 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IS HEARD IN THE ACADEMY

'Masonic Funeral March' Played at Openng in Honor of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell

MME. VAN ENDERT SINGS

SANG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Elisabeth Van Endert, a new German artist, was the scloist of the Boston Symphony's program at the Academy last night.

At the Academy of Music last evening Doctor Muck, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a variant program, with Mozart's grandiose and stately "Masonic Funeral March," in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, as the opening number. Then followed an impassioned allegretto con fusco rendering of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with its haunting melodies and orchestral tours de force.

The experts from Boston play the famous pizzicato third movement as probably no other band of musicians in the world can play it—fast, faster, and still faster, outrunning all aural capacity to distinguish the composer's original intent. Peter Cornelius' rewritten "Barber of Bagdad" overture, an inconsequential composition, was the closing number.

Interspersed were some songs by Richard Strauss, Hugo Wolf and Eugen O'Albert, and a kindergarten essay in Gallic musical modernism—Joseph Ravel's orchestral setting of five "Mother Goose" pieces—originally written as four-hand piano pieces for children. They are for children yet, though the skirts be lengthened and the blouses extended to swallow-tails.

In the third number, "Larderonette," and the fifth, "Fairy Garden," there were evidences of pleasing melodic invention; but for the most part mere extravagances in orchestration, with imitations suggestive of "Chanticler," constituted the sum of the composer's petty message. In its performance Doctor Muck pleasantly wasted the time of his audience.

German songs must be sung—there is a high-browed crowd insistent thereupon—so it is very well—excellent, indeed—that such a pulchritudinous personality as Elisabeth Van Endert, soprano, should sing them to such ravishing accompaniment as Doctor Muck's musicians instinctively furnish.

Mme. Van Endert is well trained in the technique of the concert stage, and employs her mellow, reedy voice with unfailing skill and solicitous regard for its mid-register inadequacy. The Humperdinck "Cradle Song" and Strauss' "Caecile" made pleasing revelation of her capabilities as a modern up-to-date lieder singer.

The inherent pathos and supreme resignation of Wolf's splendid "Verborgenheit," however, was far beyond the singer's psychical ken.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1914

WIN SUCCESS IN CONCERT.

Dr. Muck and Miss Van Endert, With Boston Symphony, Admirable.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its fourth concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Miss Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, as solo. Miss van Endert, though an opera singer, is making her American debut with this orchestra in a series of concerts.

The program opened with the melodious and lovely Schubert "Unfinished Symphony" in B minor, through which Dr. Muck wove the song phrases with great beauty. The development of the allegro moderato was carried up to a tragic declamation with splendid effect, and in the succeeding soft passages the cellos, then the violins, did broad justice to the true song quality of Schubert. The andante con moto was vigorously marked in tempo and stately in spirit. A melodiousness was delightfully sustained and the control of the entire orchestra in the pianissimo close was most impressive.

In the first group of songs, Verborgenbelt" (Hugo Wolf), "Wiegenlied" (Strauss), and also his dramatic "Caecilie," Miss van Endert was badly cast. Her voice is high and clear and light, but has not depth or dramatic power enough to give full value to the songs of these masters. In the second group, however, she was most happy. She interpreted the cradle song of Humperdinck, "Esschaukeln die Winde," with charm. It has the spirit of "Haensel and Gretel," and her high, clear voice was most effective in it. Her airy pianissimo in the last verse was lovely, as were her caressing, warm tones. In the d'Albert "Hymn to Venus" Miss van Endert was more dramatic. Her reading and her climaxes were excellent. The orchestral accompaniments to all of the songs were truly gems.

The Mendelssohn overture entitled "Becalmed at Sea" and "Prosperous Voyage" were two exquisite tone pictures of program music type. The hushed effect in the strings with the soft harmonies of the winds under them were sustained with a swaying, waving rhythm suggestive of a sailboat on the sea, and the joy of the second part with the coming of the breeze, the sailors' song, then the roughness, even ugliness of the getting into port with the tumultuous welcome given by the brass was descriptive and finely woven. The very few bars of soft music at the end was like a benediction at the home coming. The fullness of the orchestral work in this scenic number revealed the excellence of this great organization throughout all the parts.

The Liszt symphonic poem, No. 9, "Hungaria," which was heard for the first time in Washington, has all the national character and swing of his rhapsodies. It was handled vigorously, but it was not always interesting. Mr. Witek had an admirable solo violin passage in it, and the final crescendo was finely builded.

J. MacB.

1884

[124]

From TIMES
Address Philadelphia
Date FEB 17 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLEASES AUDIENCE

An unusually large audience heard the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. For the central feature the concert had Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4, containing the famous pizzicato movement.

Other numbers were Mozart's funeral music, given in honor of the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell; a tuneful composition of the Frenchman, Ravel, called "Mother Goose" and not previously heard in this city, and Peter Cornelius' famous overture to the "Barber of Bagdad."

The assisting artist of the occasion was Mme. Elizabeth von Endert, from Berlin, who ranks as one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany and who achieved a distinct and immediate success. She is gifted with a beautiful voice and an extremely pleasing personality and in all her selections she proved herself an artist. Her numbers included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss, and two unfamiliar compositions, the "Es Schaukein de Winde," by Humperdinck, and a "Hymne de Venue," by Eugen D'Albert, and in all of these she displayed an appreciative taste, an alert intelligence and a highly cultivated art.

INDOOR WILD WEST

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
FEB 2[illegible] 1914
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Brahms's fourth symphony is not heard so often as the other three, nor does it deserve to be, as was shown once more last night at Carnegie Hall, when Dr. Muck and his splendid Boston Orchestra began their programme with it. Brahms himself doubted its value, and when his most faithful champions did not enjoy it, he said to his biographer, Kalbeck: "If people like Billroth, Hanslick, and you do not like my music, whom will it please?"

Foolish question! It pleased the Boston Symphony Orchestra's audience in Carnegie Hall, though it is a work full of senile prattle and wearisome small-talk; a work quite unworthy of the composer of the glorious second symphony. The slow movement may be excepted; it is, as Hanslick wrote (in his "Tagebuch eines Musikers"), "one of the loveliest elegies Brahms ever wrote." It is needless to say that the symphony was admirably played, although the brasses in the last movement seemed somewhat strident.

The loyalty of the audience was also shown last night in the applause bestowed on Elisabeth Van Endert for her singing of songs by Wolf, Strauss, Humperdinck, and D'Albert; singing of a kind that is not usually so much admired in this city as singing which is always agreeable and in tune.

The remaining numbers on the programme were Carnelius's "Barber of Bagdad" overture, at the end, and, between the song-groups, Ravel's quaint five "Mother Goose" pieces, entitled "Ma Mère l'Oye, Pièces Enfantines." They were played last season by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, but were worth doing again, because of the pretty sounds and picturesque noises the composer produces. The audience seemed to be particularly pleased with the bird whistle introduced in the "Hop o' My Thumb." The suite was played delightfully, in the real Parisian spirit.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

It is impossible to imagine a finer performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony than the one given by the Boston players last night. Dr. Muck's reading of the work brought out to the smallest detail the beauties of its classic perfection and the ravishing charm of the melodies.

Ravel's pleasantly tinkling suite, "Ma Mère L'Oye," and Cornelius's overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" were the other orchestral numbers. The soloist was Elisabeth van Endert. She sang the "Verborgenheit" of Wolf, Richard Strauss's exquisite "Wiegenlied" and "Cæcilie," Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and the "Venushymne" by d'Albert. Her singing was, on the whole, pleasant and in good taste, but unimpressive. Her voice is not a particularly remarkable organ, but it is

1884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 1 8 1914

KARL MUCK GIVES A MUSICAL TREAT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Wide Range at Concert in the National.

With a program which included as its principal contributions Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and a wide range of vocal selections by Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, an operatic star fresh from triumphs in Berlin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, gave a treat to Washington music lovers.

Dr. Karl Muck, especially in the Schubert symphony, showed a mastery of instruments that has made him famous as a conductor. He developed the allegro moderato to a tragic declamation, to be followed later by the interpretation by the cellos and violins of the true song quality of Schubert.

Mme. van Endert's first group of songs was unfortunately selected. In "Verborgenheit" (Hugo Wolf), "Wiegenlied" (Strauss), and "Caecilie" by the same author, there is required a voice of greater depth and dramatic power than she possesses.

But if there was disappointment at her interpretations of this group, it was forgotten in the masterly manner in which she sang the cradle song by Humperdinck, "Esschaukeln die Winde." Her pianissimo in the last verse brought forth spontaneous applause, while her low, caressing tones were most effective.

She improved her opportunity for a display of dramatic power in d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." It was an excellent number.

"Becalmed at Sea," the Mendelssohn overture, and "Prosperous Voyage" were pleasing tone pictures. Through a hushed effect in the strings came a realistic portrayal of the swaying boat upon the seas, thence to the coming of the breeze, the sailor's song, and eventually the tumultuous welcome sounded by the brass as the ship makes port in safety.

In the Liszt symphonic poem, "Hungaria," an inspiring selection, Dr. Muck was given an opportunity to demonstrate his mastery of instrumentation by unusual combinations of instruments and the adaptation of certain instruments, seldom so used, to solo passages.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date FEB 2 0 1914

BRAHMS'S FOURTH SYMPHONY HEARD

Boston Company's Concert Brings Crowd to Carnegie Hall—A Disappointing Feature.

SOLOIST DEPRESSES AUDIENCE

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its February Thursday concert last night at Carnegie Hall and, for the first time in an eight years' experience, the present reviewer was compelled to listen to an absolutely amateurish and incompetent soloist. The name of the person in question I forebear to mention, as there is little use in crushing butterflies and, as Virgel says, there is no glory in the self-inflicted defeat of one of the other sex.

Suffice it to say that the spirit of the audience, which had been raised to a high plane by Dr. Muck's interpretation of Brahm's austere Fourth Symphony, was proportionately depressed by the untrained intercessions of a new singer, who had not gauged the caliber of an American audience, and who could not measure up to it even if it had been gauged. A decent respect, however, for the opinion of humanity compels me to record that the singer was very handsome, most beautifully dressed, and sang Wolf, Strauss and Humperdinck.

But, like one of the celebrities in Dante, after two songs "that day we heard no more." The production of Brahms's Fourth Symphony in Vienna will long be remembered; for it was then that, amid scenes of touching devotion to a great musical soul, that the Viennese public took leave of Brahms forever. It was followed therefore last night with peculiar interest, for Boston Symphony audiences have been more than happy in the continued and admirably conceived instruction they have received at the hands of a series of conductors in the works of the neo-classicist in absolute music.

Brahms was the man who was pitted by his friends against Wagner as the real representative and legitimate exponent of modern German national music. The two were never really they were different.

"CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

New Soprano Pleases with Boston Players

Mme. Elizabeth van Endert Possesses Voice of Much Warmth and Beautiful Quality—Sings Modern Songs.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their fourth trip of the season to this city last night and presented in Carnegie Hall one of the most enjoyable programmes heard here in some time.

Aside from the symphony, which was the fourth of Johannes Brahms, chief interest centred in the first local appearance of Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, a soprano who has won fame at the Royal Opera of Berlin and is at present a member of Charlottenberg Opera, of the same city. Endowed with youth and a charming personality, Mme. van Endert also possesses a voice of much warmth and of a beautiful quality. Her songs were all from modern composers, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecile," Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Venushymne." While there was charm in the "Wiegenlied" and in the Humperdinck song the best singing was that of a dramatic character which was heard in the Strauss "Caecile" and d'Albert's "Venushymne." Her legato is not as even and smooth as might be expected, nor does she possess that perfect breath control which Mme. Julia Culp's singing discloses. But in her performance there was little to find fault with, and she met with decided approval from the audience.

The Brahms symphony received a convincing reading from Dr. Muck and the members of the orchestra. Brahms has been heard only at rare intervals this season, and the performance last night was timely. Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces based on Mother Goose stories which was among the novelties offered by the Symphony Society last year, was played with good effect. It is decidely

---

Address Detroit Mich
Date FEB 2. 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts Crowded House

Detroit's first real winter snowstorm, Saturday, failed to find any terrors for or to chill the enthusiasm of music lovers, and the Light Guard armory was filled to the doors with a fashionable audience to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. The orchestra on this occasion paid its only visit of the season to Detroit, in the series of Detroit Orchestral association concerts. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, brought the full complement of his forces, about 100 players.

While motor cars "chugged chugged" impotently in the banks of snow piled high in Larned and Brush-sts., at the armory entrance doors, and their occupants descended into the wet snow with handsome gowns trailing across the uncleaned sidewalks, ordinary folk shivered and tried hard to keep patience and temper while crowding into the building, which is about the worst place on earth to get into, with any decent degree of rapidity on concert nights.

There never was a symphony concert or any other kind of a concert for that matter given in the armory without some annoying incidents, and Saturday evening, it was the collapse of a pile of chairs that caused Dr. Muck to stop the Danish Folk song number, wait for order to be restored and then begin the Juon fantasie all over again.

Aside from these perfectly natural happenings in connection with Detroit's one and only music hall, the concert was a perfectly delightful affair. Everybody felt well repaid for venturing out into the storm.

There is only one Boston orchestra, and that's why music lovers always flock to hear it. The organization was never in better form than on Saturday evening. The program was one to offer genuine enjoyment to the majority. It opened with Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, a wonderfully rythmic, bizarre, colorful Slav composition that one wants to hear over and over again. Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Dvorak's overture "Husitska" and Juon's fantasie of Danish folk songs completed the program. The Juon number was heard for the first time in this city and proved a most fascinating and unusual composition and one which will linger long in the memory, with its haunting phrasing and odd use of the different motifs.

The Minneapolis Symphony will give the sixth number in the association series, Monday evening, Feb. and on Wednesday April 1

The First
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 19 1914

BRAHM'S SYMPHONY IS REAL MELODY

Boston Orchestra Gives Finished Concert—Mme. Van Endert Applauded.

Fine music was heard when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, appeared at the Lyric last night. Dr. Karl Muck conducted well, and Mme. van Endert's singing and voice made one feel as if all the world were beauty and love.

This concert contained sufficient examples to show what a marvelous power music is and how intense is the force which will cause musicians to sacrifice every other comfort and joy, fight absolute poverty, illness, starvation and lack of recognition that they may obtain the sublime satisfaction which accompanies the honest striving for the perfect.

Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4, contributed most largely to this illustration, regardless of its status in his list of symphonies. Other things besides inherently striking themes individualize compositions. It is the development which is the content of a work. Perfect face and form do not make a perfect man or woman, neither do their counterparts in music achieve a like result. Character and attainments are the deciding elements.

Moving music is the E minor symphony, real music abounding with real melody and characteristics which compel its recognition as something worth while. What it says, what it does is none the less vital because, perhaps, it does not have captivating superficial details.

It has been said that Brahms' music is music for the musician. This is inaccurate, true only in so far as it is music of great caliber. Following the same line of reasoning, it can be said that any mental, moral, physical or spiritual attainment is only for the persons laboring in that cause. This is a fallacy, of course. If conditions were the reverse, there would be no progress, for everything would have to conform to the limit of perception of the least developed individual. It is the principle of life that all must wake up and learn as much as possible, learning to appreciate through knowledge of what to appreciate.

Rollicking music in Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, opus 34, contrasted last night with the symphony. It is admirably put together, and its composition was prompted by the same healthy animal joy in living which impels a child to roll down a hill. Trivial? No; we need it all.

Five songs were sung by Mme. van Endert. They gained indescribably with their orchestral accompaniment. Mme. van Endert deserves nothing but praise. Possessing a lovely, smooth voice of power, character and buoyancy, she used it effectively as a means to good purpose. The passages in Humperdinck's song, Es schaukeln die Winde, where high notes are attacked directly, softly, and then softly descend, were sung with exquisite purity. Her work was admirable.

J. N. H.

Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 1 5 1914

Boston Symphony, February 17.

Schubert's Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," leads the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play at its fourth concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. It was necessary sometime ago to go through the repertoire of the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its organization and the interesting fact was that the two works which had received the most performances were Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's "Fifth," with the Schubert symphony a few performances to the good. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's ever-welcome overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." The soloists will be Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, a lyric soprano, who is making her first appearances in America with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She comes to America with a high reputation as a singer and an artist and much is expected of her. The program in full is as follows:

Schubert—Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished."

Songs with orchestra—Wolf, "Verborgenheit"; Richard Strauss, "Wiegenlied"; Richard Strauss, "Caecilie."

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Songs With orchestra—Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert, "Venushymne."

Liszt—Symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1914

KARL MUCK GIVES A MUSICAL TREAT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Wide Range at Concert in the National.

With a program which included as its principal contributions Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and a wide range of vocal selections by Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, an operatic star fresh from triumphs in Berlin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, gave a treat to Washington music lovers.

Dr. Karl Muck, especially in the Schubert symphony, showed a mastery of instruments that has made him famous as a conductor. He developed the allegro moderato to a tragic declamation, to be followed later by the interpretation by the cellos and violins of the true song quality of Schubert.

Mme. van Endert's first group of songs was unfortunately selected. In "Verborgenheit" (Hugo Wolf), "Wiegenlied" (Strauss), and "Caecilie" by the same author, there is required a voice of greater depth and dramatic power than she possesses.

But if there was disappointment at her interpretations of this group, it was forgotten in the masterly manner in which she sang the cradle song by Humperdinck, "Esschaukeln die Winde." Her pianissimo in the last verse brought forth spontaneous applause, while her low, caressing tones were most effective.

She improved her opportunity for a display of dramatic power in d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." It was an excellent number.

"Becalmed at Sea," the Mendelssohn overture, and "Prosperous Voyage" were pleasing tone pictures. Through a hushed effect in the strings came a realistic portrayal of the swaying boat upon the seas, thence to the coming of the breeze, the sailor's song, and eventually the tumultuous welcome sounded by the brass as the ship makes port in safety.

In the Liszt symphonic poem, "Hungaria," an inspiring selection, Dr. Muck was given an opportunity to demonstrate his mastery of instrumentation by unusual combinations of instruments and the adaptation of certain instruments, seldom so used, to solo passages.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

BRAHMS'S FOURTH SYMPHONY HEARD

Boston Company's Concert Brings Crowd to Carnegie Hall—A Disappointing Feature.

SOLOIST DEPRESSES AUDIENCE

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its February Thursday concert last night at Carnegie Hall and, for the first time in an eight years' experience, the present reviewer was compelled to listen to an absolutely amateurish and incompetent soloist. The name of the person in question I forebear to mention, as there is little use in crushing butterflies and, as Virgel says, there is no glory in the self-inflicted defeat of one of the other sex.

Suffice it to say that the spirit of the audience, which had been raised to a high plane by Dr. Muck's interpretation of Brahm's austere Fourth Symphony, was proportionately depressed by the untrained intercessions of a new singer, who had not gauged the caliber of an American audience, and who could not measure up to it even if it had been gauged. A decent respect, however, for the opinion of humanity compels me to record that the singer was very handsome, most beautifully dressed, and sang Wolf, Strauss and Humperdinck.

But, like one of the celebrities in Dante, after two songs "that day we heard no more." The production of Brahms's Fourth Symphony in Vienna will long be remembered; for it was then that, amid scenes of touching devotion to a great musical soul, that the Viennese public took leave of Brahms forever. It was followed therefore last night with peculiar interest, for Boston Symphony audiences have been more than happy in the continued and admirably conceived instruction they have received at the hands of a series of conductors in the works of the neo-classicist in absolute music.

Brahms was the man who was pitted by his friends against Wagner as the real representative and legitimate exponent of modern German national music. The two were never really rivals they were different.

"CABLE ADDRESS: "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914

New Soprano Pleases with Boston Players

Mme. Elizabeth van Endert Possesses Voice of Much Warmth and Beautiful Quality—Sings Modern Songs.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their fourth trip of the season to this city last night and presented in Carnegie Hall one of the most enjoyable programmes heard here in some time.

Aside from the symphony, which was the fourth of Johannes Brahms, chief interest centred in the first local appearance of Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, a soprano who has won fame at the Royal Opera of Berlin and is at present a member of Charlottenberg Opera, of the same city. Endowed with youth and a charming personality, Mme. van Endert also possesses a voice of much warmth and of a beautiful quality. Her songs were all from modern composers, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecile," Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Venushymne." While there was charm in the "Wiegenlied" and in the Humperdinck song the best singing was that of a dramatic character which was heard in the Strauss "Caecile" and d'Albert's "Venushymne." Her legato is not as even and smooth as might be expected, nor does she possess that perfect breath control which Mme. Julia Culp's singing discloses. But in her performance there was little to find fault with, and she met with decided approval from the audience.

The Brahms symphony received a convincing reading from Dr. Muck and the members of the orchestra. Brahms has been heard only at rare intervals this season, and the performance last night was timely. Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces based on Mother Goose stories, which was among the novelties offered by the Symphony Society last year, was played with good effect. It is decidely

---

Address Detroit Mich
Date FEB 2 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts Crowded House

Detroit's first real winter snowstorm, Saturday, failed to find any terrors for or to chill the enthusiasm of music lovers, and the Light Guard armory was filled to the doors with a fashionable audience to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. The orchestra on this occasion paid its only visit of the season to Detroit, in the series of Detroit Orchestral association concerts. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, brought the full complement of his forces, about 100 players.

While motor cars "chugged chugged" impotently in the banks of snow piled high in Larned and Brush-sts., at the armory entrance doors, and their occupants descended into the wet snow with handsome gowns trailing across the uncleaned sidewalks, ordinary folk shivered and tried hard to keep patience and temper while crowding into the building, which is about the worst place on earth to get into, with any decent degree of rapidity on concert nights.

There never was a symphony concert or any other kind of a concert for that matter given in the armory without some annoying incidents, and Saturday evening, it was the collapse of a pile of chairs that caused Dr. Muck to stop the Danish Folk song number, wait for order to be restored and then begin the Juon fantasie all over again.

Aside from these perfectly natural happenings in connection with Detroit's one and only music hall, the concert was a perfectly delightful affair. Everybody felt well repaid for venturing out into the storm.

There is only one Boston orchestra, and that's why music lovers always flock to hear it. The organization was never in better form than on Saturday evening. The program was one to offer genuine enjoyment to the majority. It opened with Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, a wonderfully rythmic, bizarre, colorful Slav composition that one wants to hear over and over again. Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Dvorak's overture "Husitska" and Juon's fantasie of Danish folk songs completed the program. The Juon number was heard for the first time in this city and proved a most fascinating and unusual composition and one which will linger long in the memory, with its haunting phrasing and odd use of the different motifs.

The Minneapolis Symphony will give the sixth number in the association series, Monday evening, Feb. [illegible], and on Wednesday [illegible], April 1.

The First Establishe[illegible]
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 19 1914

BRAHM'S SYMPHONY IS REAL MELODY

Boston Orchestra Gives Finished Concert—Mme. Van Endert Applauded.

Fine music was heard when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, appeared at the Lyric last night. Dr. Karl Muck conducted well, and Mme. van Endert's singing and voice made one feel as if all the world were beauty and love.

This concert contained sufficient examples to show what a marvelous power music is and how intense is the force which will cause musicians to sacrifice every other comfort and joy, fight absolute poverty, illness, starvation and lack of recognition that they may obtain the sublime satisfaction which accompanies the honest striving for the perfect.

Brahms' Symphony in E minor, No. 4, contributed most largely to this illustration, regardless of its status in his list of symphonies. Other things besides inherently striking themes individualize compositions. It is the development which is the content of a work. Perfect face and form do not make a perfect man or woman, neither do their counterparts in music achieve a like result. Character and attainments are the deciding elements.

Moving music is the E minor symphony, real music abounding with real melody and characteristics which compel its recognition as something worth while. What it says, what it does is none the less vital because, perhaps, it does not have captivating superficial details.

It has been said that Brahms' music is music for the musician. This is inaccurate, true only in so far as it is music of great caliber. Following the same line of reasoning, it can be said that any mental, moral, physical or spiritual attainment is only for the persons laboring in that cause. This is a fallacy, of course. If conditions were the reverse, there would be no progress, for everything would have to conform to the limit of perception of the least developed individual. It is the principle of life that all must wake up and learn as much as possible, learning to appreciate through knowledge of what to appreciate.

Rollicking music in Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, opus 34, contrasted last night with the symphony. It is admirably put together, and its composition was prompted by the same healthy animal joy in living which impels a child to roll down a hill. Trivial? No; we need it all.

Five songs were sung by Mme. van Endert. They gained indescribably with their orchestral accompaniment. Mme. van Endert deserves nothing but praise. Possessing a lovely, smooth voice of power, character and buoyancy, she used it effectively as a means to good purpose. The passages in Humperdinck's song, Es schaukeln die Winde, where high notes are attacked directly, softly, and then softly descend, were sung with exquisite purity. Her work was admirable.

J. N. H.

Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 15 1914

Boston Symphony, February 17.

Schubert's Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," leads the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play at its fourth concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. It was necessary sometime ago to go through the repertoire of the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its organization and the interesting fact was that the two works which had received the most performances were Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's "Fifth," with the Schubert symphony a few performances to the good. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's ever-welcome overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

The soloists will be Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, a lyric soprano, who is making her first appearances in America with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She comes to America with a high reputation as a singer and an artist and much is expected of her.

The program in full is as follows:

Schubert—Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished."

Songs with orchestra—Wolf, "Verborgenheit"; Richard Strauss, "Wiegenlied"; Richard Strauss, "Caecilie."

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage."

Songs With orchestra—Humperdinck, "Es Schaukeln die Winde"; d'Albert, "Venushymne."

Liszt—Symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 17 19

Boston Orchestra's Program.

Highly varied, not to say miscellaneous, yet altogether delightful was the provision of entertainment at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy yesterday evening. First came the tribute to the memory of Dr. Weir Mitchell—the Masonic Funeral music of Mozart, fittingly designed and beautifully rendered, with a moving dialogue of the plaintive oboe and fervently impassioned strings.

The same pathetic fervor seemed to continue in the first movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with the sighing main motive, though in the episode of the second the clarinet had a saucy lilt—a foil to the prevailing sadness. Mr. Muck took it a little fast, though the [illegible] interest to the [illegible] the climactic hymnal strain of the brass. It was a fine interpretation with a vivid continuity—until the original theme was reached where the slower pace seemed labored. M. Longy's oboe sang royally in the first theme of the Andantino; the second was taken quite too fast. The excuse was, of course, the contrast with the placid pathos of the main melody. But that is no reason for making the second trivial.

A wonderful speed was again achieved in the famous Scherzo, with the "pizzicato" strings, and a most delicate softness, that made for a very dramatic effect. The tremendous speed was in itself a dazzling piece of virtuosity—it was like one resonant giant guitar. But, as a result, the clarinet in its coursing theme had fairly to exceed limit. There is such a thing as playing a symphony too brilliantly, with too conscious a sense of "bravoura." This was the fault of the performance, and the only one. From the pictorial, dramatic viewpoint it was most impressive.

The last movement began also with a great rush of speed though the march was more restrained. But it was contenting and convincing, especially in the sudden awesome return of the original motto of the trumpet—in the midst of the mad whirl.

The appearance of Madame von Endert as soloist in a group of songs by Wolff, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert, was a source of unalloyed delight. The lady belongs to the kind of singers with whom the voice itself is forgotten in the exquisite art of the rendering—in which the accompanying orchestra had their full share. Completely captivating was the Cradle Song of Humperdinck, while the Hymn to Venus of D'Albert had a wonderful dithyrambic flow of ancient metre.

Novel was the series of "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel. The first number had an almost conventional simplicity. In the second came a sudden surprise of graphic bird-notes in the solo violin and in the flute. Not until the third number, the "Empress of the Pagodes," was there full revel of whole tone dissonance right across the other jingle. The "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," was very amusing in the contrast of timbers, and the "Fairy Garden" was brilliant with modern harmonies.

Of a very opposite mood from the beginning was the closing overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," by Cornelius, that is full of a musical wit of its own and does not lack expressive melody.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 17 1914

VAN ENDERT AS SOLOIST

Modern German Lieder a Feature of Boston Symphony Concert.

Rather more comprehensive than usual, containing a greater number of selections on the program, and covering a wider [illegible] of musical expression, was the concert of the Boston Symphony—the fourth of this season's series—given at the Academy of Music last evening.

Elizabeth van Endert was the soloist. This talented soprano had the courage to begin her part of the entertainment with two songs by Richard Strauss and one by Hugo Wolf. Moreover she had the ability to make her auditors enjoy these selections. Be it said, however, that the Wolf song was that composer's "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement"), one of the few by that modern German song writer in which he followed the more trodden lines of composition, using a regular strophic melody above an ordinary form of accompaniment. In fact, this is considered the simplest of his compositions and was the first to become popular in Germany and in other countries.

Fraeulein van Endert was in excellent voice and sang with beautiful phrasing and expression. Particularly effective were her renderings of the Strauss "Wiegenlied" and the Humperdinck cradle song, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," the last-mentioned of which she sang later in the evening coupling with it the "Hymn to Venus," by d'Albert.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's, in F Minor, No. 4, with its wonderful use of a waltz theme as a solemn motive, its fascinating pizzicato ostinato and the haunting melody for the oboe which introduces the second movement. Needless to say, the work was superbly given under Dr. Karl Muck's leadership.

A novelty, so far as Philadelphia is concerned, was the little suite, "Ma Mere l'Oyle," our old friend Mother Goose in French guise, by Ravel. This curious composition, described in its sub-title as "Pieces Enfantines," was written originally for children and is hardly more than a musical jeu d'esprit, clever in orchestration, but extremely light. It is redeemed somewhat from trivality by the fourth episode, the "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," which is quite poetic in sentiment.

The concert opened with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, and closed with the overture composed by Peter Cornelius for "The Barber of Bagdad."

—Edward Bell, of New York, second secretary of the American Legation, in

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. FEB 17 1914
Date
1884

Boston Symphony Concert

New Lieder Singer and French Orchestral Novelty Heard

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music last night was unusually varied and interesting, though it contained little to satisfy the lover of big emotional music. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor and served to introduce to local audiences Elizabeth van Endert, an accomplished German lieder singer. Moreover, it contained one real orchestral novelty, namely, Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," which, being interpreted, is nothing more formidable than our old friend Mother Goose in the guise of five musical bits written for children.

A touch of local interest was added by the playing of Mozart's Masonic Funeral March in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. This graceful tribute to the late distinguished physician and litterateur, was paid at the special request of Thomas L. Higginson, who was a friend and admirer of Dr. Mitchell. For the purpose the Mozart march was not altogether happily chosen, for it is cold and impersonal as contrasted with the Beethoven march, which the local orchestra played immediately after Dr. Mitchell's death, and gave to the occasion a touch of frigid formality.

Mme. van Endert is a tall, young woman with a beautiful face. Her manner is modest, almost timid, and her personality is pleasing rather than magnetic. Her voice is sweet, fresh and well-placed, but is neither brilliant nor lovely in quality. Indeed, it is not her voice that merits attention so much as her thoroughly artistic method of expressing a variety of sentiment and feeling. Of the five songs she sang, the last, a "Hymn to Venus," from d'Albert's setting of "The Queen of Cyprus," proved to be the most effective because its broad phrasing gave her her best opportunity for free and unrestrained utterance. Her delivery of the thrilling call "Evoe" with which it ends was deeply impressive. Her first number was Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the pathetic beauty of which she seemed scarcely to realize. This was followed by two Strauss songs, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," which she delivered with fine delicacy and intelligence. Humperdinck's "Es Shaukeln die Winde," a delightfully simple folk melody set to intricately orchestrated accompaniment, was sung with just the right touch of lightness and sparkle.

The Ravel morceaux, though written for children, are rather sophisticated tours de force in modern, eccentric orchestration. All the instruments are called upon to lend their touch of color and there is a bewildering variety of quick-changing rhythms and modulations. From the brief pavane of the sleeping beauty to the intricate picture of the marvellous fairy garden, the gamut of weird sounds is run, reaching its climax in the second movement, "Hop O' My Thumb," where a long-drawn squeak on the concertmeister's E string tells the tragic story of what happened to the trail of bread crumbs when the little birds ate it up. Altogether, the composition is interesting as an excursion into unusual fields, though it has, of course, no particular significance.

In the symphony the orchestra was at its very best and gave an interpretation of the beautiful work such as has seldom before been heard here. The well-known pizzicato scherzo was given with amazing dash and unity of tone and there was rare richness of color in the andante, where the strings mingled in exquisite fashion with the various voices of the wood choir. The concert was brought to a close with Cornelius's merry overture to "The Barber of Bagdad."

AMUSEMENTS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 1914
Established

BERLIN OPERA SINGER WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Carl Muck, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, introduced a new singer, Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera House, who, it is understood, is on a visit here of only three weeks. She has an imposing presence of the "Floradora" type, a mezzo-soprana voice that is shrill in the upper register, some mannerisms and no rare gifts of interpretation. She was heard in Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Wiegenlied," d'Albert's "Venushymne."

The feature of the concert was Brahms's imposing fourth symphony, which was superbly played by Dr. Muck and his men, all of whom were made to share in the enthusiastic applause of the large audience. Besides on the programme were Ravel's five children's pieces, "Ma Mere l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914
Established: 1884

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
To Sing With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson Dr. Muck will preface, so to say, the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only fifteen minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children.

Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast, and the Fair Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant, in the finest French manner.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Sym- [illegible] much is expected of her. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukel- [illegible] Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

MADE A NOTE OF

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB [illegible] 9

Boston Orchestra's Program.

Highly varied, not to say miscellaneous, yet altogether delightful was the provision of entertainment at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy yesterday evening. First came the tribute to the memory of Dr. Weir Mitchell—the Masonic Funeral music of Mozart, fittingly designed and beautifully rendered, with a moving dialogue of the plaintive oboe and fervently impassioned strings.

The same pathetic fervor seemed to continue in the first movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with the sighing main motive, though in the episode of the second the clarinet had a saucy lilt—a foil to the prevailing sadness. Mr. Muck took it a little fast, though the [illegible] terest to the plot and [illegible] the climactic hymnal strain of the brass. It was a fine interpretation with a vivid continuity—until the original theme was reached where the slower pace seemed labored. M. Longy's oboe sang royally in the first theme of the Andantino; the second was taken quite too fast. The excuse was, of course, the contrast with the placid pathos of the main melody. But that is no reason for making the second trivial.

A wonderful speed was again achieved in the famous Scherzo, with the "pizzicato" strings, and a most delicate softness, that made for a very dramatic effect. The tremendous speed was in itself a dazzling piece of virtuosity—it was like one resonant giant guitar. But, as a result, the clarinet in its coursing theme had fairly to exceed limit. There is such a thing as playing a symphony too brilliantly, with too conscious a sense of "bravoura." This was the fault of the performance, and the only one. From the pictorial, dramatic viewpoint it was most impressive.

The last movement began also with a great rush of speed though the march was more restrained. But it was contenting and convincing, especially in the sudden awesome return of the original motto of the trumpet—in the midst of the mad whirl.

The appearance of Madame von Endert as soloist in a group of songs by Wolff, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert, was a source of unalloyed delight. The lady belongs to the kind of singers with whom the voice itself is forgotten in the exquisite art of the rendering—in which the accompanying orchestra had their full share. Completely captivating was the Cradle Song of Humperdinck, while the Hymn to Venus of D'Albert had a wonderful dithyrambic flow of ancient metre.

Novel was the series of "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel. The first number had an almost conventional simplicity. In the second came a sudden surprise of graphic bird-notes in the solo violin and in the flute. Not until the third number, the "Empress of the Pagodes," was there full revel of whole tone dissonance right across the other jingle. The "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," was very amusing in the contrast of timbers, and the "Fairy Garden" was brilliant with modern harmonies.

Of a very opposite mood from the beginning was the closing overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," by Cornelius, that is full of a musical wit of its own and does not lack expressive melody.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 17 1914

VAN ENDERT AS SOLOIST

Modern German Lieder a Feature of Boston Symphony Concert.

Rather more comprehensive than usual, containing a greater number of selections on the program, and covering a wider range of musical expression, was the concert of the Boston Symphony—the fourth of this season's series—given at the Academy of Music last evening.

Elizabeth van Endert was the soloist. This talented soprano had the courage to begin her part of the entertainment with two songs by Richard Strauss and one by Hugo Wolf. Moreover she had the ability to make her auditors enjoy these selections. Be it said, however, that the Wolf song was that composer's "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement"), one of the few by that modern German song writer in which he followed the more trodden lines of composition, using a regular strophic melody above an ordinary form of accompaniment. In fact, this is considered the simplest of his compositions and was the first to become popular in Germany and in other countries.

Fraeulein van Endert was in excellent voice and sang with beautiful phrasing and expression. Particularly effective were her renderings of the Strauss "Wiegenlied" and the Humperdinck cradle song, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," the last-mentioned of which she sang later in the evening coupling with it the "Hymn to Venus," by d'Albert.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's, in F Minor, No. 4, with its wonderful use of a waltz theme as a solemn motive, its fascinating pizzicato ostinato and the haunting melody for the oboe which introduces the second movement. Needless to say, the work was superbly given under Dr. Karl Muck's leadership.

A novelty, so far as Philadelphia is concerned, was the little suite, "Ma Mere l'Oyle," our old friend Mother Goose in French guise, by Ravel. This curious composition, described in its sub-title as "Pieces Enfantines," was written originally for children and is hardly more than a musical jeu d'esprit, clever in orchestration, but extremely light. It is redeemed somewhat from trivality by the fourth episode, the "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," which is quite poetic in sentiment.

The concert opened with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, and closed with the overture composed by Peter Cornelius for "The Barber of Bagdad."

Edward Bell, of New York, second secretary of the American Legation, in

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

1884

Boston Symphony Concert

New Lieder Singer and French Orchestral Novelty Heard

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music last night was unusually varied and interesting, though it contained little to satisfy the lover of big emotional music. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor and served to introduce to local audiences Elizabeth van Endert, an accomplished German lieder singer. Moreover, it contained one real orchestral novelty, namely, Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," which, being interpreted, is nothing more formidable than our old friend Mother Goose in the guise of five musical bits written for children.

A touch of local interest was added by the playing of Mozart's Masonic Funeral March in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. This graceful tribute to the late distinguished physician and litterateur, was paid at the special request of Thomas L. Higginson, who was a friend and admirer of Dr. Mitchell. For the purpose the Mozart march was not altogether happily chosen, for it is cold and impersonal as contrasted with the Beethoven march, which the local orchestra played immediately after Dr. Mitchell's death, and gave to the occasion a touch of frigid formality.

Mme. van Endert is a tall, young woman with a beautiful face. Her manner is modest, almost timid, and her personality is pleasing rather than magnetic. Her voice is sweet, fresh and well-placed, but is neither brilliant nor lovely in quality. Indeed, it is not her voice that merits attention so much as her thoroughly artistic method of expressing a variety of sentiment and feeling. Of the five songs she sang, the last, a "Hymn to Venus," from d'Albert's setting of "The Queen of Cyprus," proved to be the most effective because its broad phrasing gave her her best opportunity for free and unrestrained utterance. Her delivery of the thrilling call "Evoe" with which it ends was deeply impressive. Her first number was Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the pathetic beauty of which she seemed scarcely to realize. This was followed by two Strauss songs, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," which she delivered with fine delicacy and intelligence. Humperdinck's "Es Shaukeln die Winde," a delightfully simple folk melody set to intricately orchestrated accompaniment, was sung with just the right touch of lightness and sparkle.

The Ravel morceaux, though written for children, are rather sophisticated tours de force in modern, eccentric orchestration. All the instruments are called upon to lend their touch of color and there is a bewildering variety of quick-changing rhythms and modulations. From the brief pavane of the sleeping beauty to the intricate picture of the marvellous fairy garden, the gamut of weird sounds is run, reaching its climax in the second movement, "Hop O' My Thumb," where a long-drawn squeak on the concertmeister's E string tells the tragic story of what happened to the trail of bread crumbs when the little birds ate it up. Altogether, the composition is interesting as an excursion into unusual fields, though it has, of course, no particular significance.

In the symphony the orchestra was at its very best and gave an interpretation of the beautiful work such as has seldom before been heard here. The well-known pizzicato scherzo was given with amazing dash and unity of tone and there was rare richness of color in the andante, where the strings mingled in exquisite fashion with the various voices of the wood choir. The concert was brought to a close with Cornelius's merry overture to "The Barber of Bagdad."

AMUSEMENTS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

Established

BERLIN OPERA SINGER WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Carl Muck, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, introduced a new singer, Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera House, who, it is understood, is on a visit here of only three weeks. She has an imposing presence of the "Floradora" type, a mezzo-soprana voice that is shrill in the upper register, some mannerisms and no rare gifts of interpretation. She was heard in Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Wiegenlied," d'Albert's "Venushymne."

The feature of the concert was Brahms's imposing fourth symphony, which was superbly played by Dr. Muck and his men, all of whom were made to share in the enthusiastic applause of the large audience. Besides on the programme were Ravel's five children's pieces, "Ma Mere l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914

Established: 1884

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
To Sing With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson Dr. Muck will preface, so to say, the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only fifteen minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children.

Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast, and the Fair Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant, in the finest French manner.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Sym- [illegible] is expected of ner. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln [illegible] Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

MADE A NOTE OF

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 17 19

Boston Orchestra's Program.

Highly varied, not to say miscellaneous, yet altogether delightful was the provision of entertainment at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy yesterday evening. First came the tribute to the memory of Dr. Weir Mitchell—the Masonic Funeral music of Mozart, fittingly designed and beautifully rendered, with a moving dialogue of the plaintive oboe and fervently impassioned strings.

The same pathetic fervor seemed to continue in the first movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with the sighing main motive, though in the episode of the second the clarinet had a saucy lilt—a foil to the prevailing sadness. Mr. Muck took it a little fast, though the [illegible] terest to the plot and [illegible] the climactic hymnal strain of the brass. It was a fine interpretation with a vivid continuity—until the original theme was reached where the slower pace seemed labored. M. Longy's oboe sang royally in the first theme of the Andantino; the second was taken quite too fast. The excuse was, of course, the contrast with the placid pathos of the main melody. But that is no reason for making the second trivial.

A wonderful speed was again achieved in the famous Scherzo, with the "pizzicato" strings, and a most delicate softness, that made for a very dramatic effect. The tremendous speed was in itself a dazzling piece of virtuosity—it was like one resonant giant guitar. But, as a result, the clarinet in its coursing theme had fairly to exceed limit. There is such a thing as playing a symphony too brilliantly, with too conscious a sense of "bravoura." This was the fault of the performance, and the only one. From the pictorial, dramatic viewpoint it was most impressive.

The last movement began also with a great rush of speed though the march was more restrained. But it was contenting and convincing, especially in the sudden awesome return of the original motto of the trumpet—in the midst of the mad whirl.

The appearance of Madame von Endert as soloist in a group of songs by Wolff, Strauss, Humperdinck and D'Albert, was a source of unalloyed delight. The lady belongs to the kind of singers with whom the voice itself is forgotten in the exquisite art of the rendering—in which the accompanying orchestra had their full share. Completely captivating was the Cradle Song of Humperdinck, while the Hymn to Venus of D'Albert had a wonderful dithyrambic flow of ancient metre.

Novel was the series of "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel. The first number had an almost conventional simplicity. In the second came a sudden surprise of graphic bird-notes in the solo violin and in the flute. Not until the third number, the "Empress of the Pagodes," was there full revel of whole tone dissonance right across the other jingle. The "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," was very amusing in the contrast of timbers, and the "Fairy Garden" was brilliant with modern harmonies.

Of a very opposite mood from the beginning was the closing overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," by Cornelius, that is full of a musical wit of its own and does not lack expressive melody.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, P
Date FEB 1

VAN ENDERT AS SOLOIST

Modern German Lieder a Feature of Boston Symphony Concert

Rather more comprehensive than usual, containing a greater number of selections on the program, and covering a wider [illegible] of musical expression, was the concert of the Boston Symphony—the fourth of this season's series—given at the Academy of Music last evening.

Elizabeth van Endert was the soloist. This talented soprano had the courage to begin her part of the entertainment with two songs by Richard Strauss and one by Hugo Wolf. Moreover she had the ability to make her auditors enjoy these selections. Be it said, however, that the Wolf song was that composer's "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement"), one of the few by that modern German song writer in which he followed the more trodden lines of composition, using a regular strophic melody above an ordinary form of accompaniment. In fact, this is considered the simplest of his compositions and was the first to become popular in Germany and in other countries.

Fraeulein van Endert was in excellent voice and sang with beautiful phrasing and expression. Particularly effective were her renderings of the Strauss "Wiegenlied" and the Humperdinck cradle song, "Es Schaukeln die Winde," the last-mentioned of which she sang later in the evening coupling with it the "Hymn to Venus," by d'Albert.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's, in F Minor. No. 4, with its wonderful use of a waltz theme as a solemn motive, its fascinating pizzicato ostinato and the haunting melody for the oboe which introduces the second movement. Needless to say, the work was superbly given under Dr. Karl Muck's leadership.

A novelty, so far as Philadelphia is concerned, was the little suite, "Ma Mere l'Oyle," our old friend Mother Goose in French guise, by Ravel. This curious composition, described in its sub-title as "Pieces Enfantines," was written originally for children and is hardly more than a musical jeu d'esprit, clever in orchestration, but extremely light. It is redeemed somewhat from trivality by the fourth episode, the "Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," which is quite poetic in sentiment.

The concert opened with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, and closed with the overture composed by Peter Cornelius for "The Barber of Bagdad."

—Edward Bell, of New York, second secretary of the American Legation, in

---

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 1914

1884

Boston Symphony Concert

New Lieder Singer and French Orchestral Novelty Heard

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of music last night was unusually varied and interesting, though it contained little to satisfy the lover of big emotional music. It had for its central feature Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor and served to introduce to local audiences Elizabeth van Endert, an accomplished German lieder singer. Moreover, it contained one real orchestral novelty, namely, Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," which, being interpreted, is nothing more formidable than our old friend Mother Goose in the guise of five musical bits written for children.

A touch of local interest was added by the playing of Mozart's Masonic Funeral March in memory of Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. This graceful tribute to the late distinguished physician and litterateur, was paid at the special request of Thomas L. Higginson, who was a friend and admirer of Dr. Mitchell. For the purpose the Mozart march was not altogether happily chosen, for it is cold and impersonal as contrasted with the Beethoven march, which the local orchestra played immediately after Dr. Mitchell's death, and gave to the occasion a touch of frigid formality.

Mme. van Endert is a tall, young woman with a beautiful face. Her manner is modest, almost timid, and her personality is pleasing rather than magnetic. Her voice is sweet, fresh and well-placed, but is neither brilliant nor lovely in quality. Indeed, it is not her voice that merits attention so much as her thoroughly artistic method of expressing a variety of sentiment and feeling. Of the five songs she sang, the last, a "Hymn to Venus," from d'Albert's setting of "The Queen of Cyprus," proved to be the most effective because its broad phrasing gave her her best opportunity for free and unrestrained utterance. Her delivery of the thrilling call "Evoe" with which it ends was deeply impressive. Her first number was Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the pathetic beauty of which she seemed scarcely to realize. This was followed by two Strauss songs, "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," which she delivered with fine delicacy and intelligence. Humperdinck's "Es Shaukeln die Winde," a delightfully simple folk melody set to intricately orchestrated accompaniment, was sung with just the right touch of lightness and sparkle.

The Ravel morceaux, though written for children, are rather sophisticated tours de force in modern, eccentric orchestration. All the instruments are called upon to lend their touch of color and there is a bewildering variety of quick-changing rhythms and modulations. From the brief pavane of the sleeping beauty to the intricate picture of the marvellous fairy garden, the gamut of weird sounds is run, reaching its climax in the second movement, "Hop O' My Thumb," where a long-drawn squeak on the concertmeister's E string tells the tragic story of what happened to the trail of bread crumbs when the little birds ate it up. Altogether, the composition is interesting as an excursion into unusual fields, though it has, of course, no particular significance.

In the symphony the orchestra was at its very best and gave an interpretation of the beautiful work such as has seldom before been heard here. The well-known pizzicato scherzo was given with amazing dash and unity of tone and there was rare richness of color in the andante, where the strings mingled in exquisite fashion with the various voices of the wood choir. The concert was brought to a close with Cornelius's merry overture to "The Barber of Bagdad."

AMUSEMENTS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date FEB 20 191

BERLIN OPERA SINGER WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Carl Muck, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, introduced a new singer, Elizabeth van Endert of the Berlin Royal Opera House, who, it is understood, is on a visit here of only three weeks. She has an imposing presence of the "Floradora" type, a mezzo-soprana voice that is shrill in the upper register, some mannerisms and no rare gifts of interpretation. She was heard in Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss's "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Wiegenlied," d'Albert's "Venushymne."

The feature of the concert was Brahms's imposing fourth symphony, which was superbly played by Dr. Muck and his men, all of whom were made to share in the enthusiastic applause of the large audience. Besides on the programme were Ravel's five children's pieces, "Ma Mere l'Oye," and the overture to Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 15 1914

Established: 1884

ELISABETH VAN ENDERT
To Sing With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the particular request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson Dr. Muck will preface, so to say, the regular program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a token of Mr. Higginson's high respect and regard for the late Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.

The orchestral part of the program comprises Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the overture to the opera of Peter Cornelius, "The Barber of Bagdad." The Ravel music will be new to Philadelphia. It comprises five short pieces, the entire work taking only fifteen minutes to perform. Originally they were composed in 1908 for pianoforte and for the pleasure of children. Their first performance was in Paris on April 20, 1910, when they were played by two children.

Toward the close of 1911 Ravel made a little ballet out of these pieces and the dances were arranged by Mme. Jeanne Hugard. The ballet was performed January 28, 1912, at the Theatre des Arts, Paris. The five pieces are Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes, the Conversations of Beauty and the Beast, and the Fair Garden. The orchestral version which will be performed here was made from the piano pieces. The music is elegant, in the finest French manner.

The soloist, as already announced, will be Madame Elisabeth van Endert, one of the principal lyric sopranos of Germany, who is now making her first appearances in this country with the Boston Sym- [illegible] much is expected of ner. She will sing as her first number three songs with orchestra, Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Richard Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." Her second number will be two works new to Philadelphia, Humperdinck's "Es schaukeln [illegible] Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus."

MADE A NOTE OF

[126]

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date FEB 22 1914

FUTURIST MUSIC LED BY DR. MUCK

Beethoven and Strauss Making Their Way Slowly Among a Blinded Populace.

WHOLE DAY OF GOOD MU

Calls for Tauscher at Metropoli in Evening and Russian Opera in the Afternoon.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BREN

New York enjoyed a thoroughly m cal Saturday. "Boris Godounoff" sung at the Metropolitan Opera Ho in the afternoon and "Die Walkuere" the evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck and explained with a detail almost Germanic by Dr. Davis Hale, paid its antepenultimate visit to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The word antepenultimate, while perfectly correct, is used in a spirit of egotistical and emulatory raillery to prove to Dr. Philip Hale, who is the musical Porson of the age, that he is only a minor member of an interlocking directorate controlling the raw material of a sesquipedalian vocabulary.

The programme contained three numbers and the house contained every one it could. There is no nonsense of patriotism or parochialism about the New York amateur of music. Apparently his spirit is sufficiently proud, rebellious and Satanic to prefer good music to bad.

The three numbers in question were the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This was done partly in honor of Dr. Alexander Konta.

I suppose it would be incorrect to class the Fifth Symphony and the Strauss poem together as Futurist music. Perhaps "Presentist" would be the correct term, though the present is only a second and the future lasts forever. It may be also incorrect to mention Beethoven and Strauss in the same breath. But they have this in common, that they affect the few, the very few, natural souls that take the trouble to listen to them.

Beethoven and Strauss Linked.

Perhaps, in the future, Beethoven and Strauss will attain a general contempotaneous celebrity equivalent to that of Dr. Jack Johnson, the brumous gladiator, and Dr. Daniel Maher, the eminent competitive equestrian. This is another reason why the epithet "Futurist" may be applied to Beethoven and Dr. Strauss. Dr. Marinetti, the head pilgrim of the Futurists, might discover still another. Society, he might urge, has not yet "taken up" Beethoven. Beacon Hill is still a bit frigid, and Fifth avenue almost indifferent. But think of Dr. Uriel; Dr. Davis Hale has done a doughty and worthy action in publishing Dr. Hector Berlioz's eloquent and imaginative description of the Fifth Symphony.

There has been much braying and twaddling about what painters call "the literature" of the symphony, that is to say, its influence on the emotions and imaginative, rather than its purely musical construction and æsthetics. One genius discovered in a characteristic phrase the notes of the oriole. He would have found frogs in "Hamlet." I reproduce some of the remarks of Dr. Berlioz, because it is always attractive and valuable to read the opinion of one artist upon another. Moreover Dr. Berlioz was what very few musicians have been—a man of cultivated intellect and wide reading. The leisure hours of his boyhood were passed in reading Virgil; his early manhood in studying Shakespeare, and his riper years in quarreling with an Irish actress. Nothing is so broadening.

Read What Dr. Berlioz Sayeth.

Here it is: "The first movement is devoted to the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul, a prey to despair; not the concentrated, calm despair that borrows the shape of resignation; not the dark and voiceless sorrow of Romeo who learns the death of Juliet, but the terrible rage of Othello when he receives from Iago's mouth the poisonous slanders which persuade him of Desdemona's guilt. Now it is a frenetic delirium which explodes in frightful cries; and now it is the prostration that has only accents of regret and profound self-pity."

Dr. Muck's interpretation was excellent, though we have heard the last movement played with more fire—and by himself. The stormy, sullen and painful scenes of "Death and Transfiguration" were energetically rendered, and it is difficult to understand why the Pastists were unable to recognize its genius when it was first played. Perhaps it was because their brains were full of oratorios and cheese mites.

"Boris" Powerful and Picturesque.

There is little left to be said of the Russian opera "Boris Godounoff" save that it is one of the most powerful, picturesque and new-sensed operas we have had in years. The choruses are the vertebrae of the work, and they were rendered with amazing spirit. M. Gatti-Casazza and M. Toscanini have had more success in mounting it than most operatic managers have had in spelling it.

"Die Walkuere" was given in the evening with Madame Gadski, the undoubted Ring-mistress; Mme. Olive Fremstad, M. Carl Joern, M. Weil and Mr. Ruysdael. Dr. Alfred Hertz conducted. The enthusiasm at the end of the second expressed itself in loud calls for "Dr. Tauscher."

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1914
Established:

MUSIC LOVERS HEAR BRILLIANT CONCER

Boston Symphony Orchestra Giv Fourth Program of Season at New National Theater.

MME. VAN ENDERT SOLOIST

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was the chief orchestral piece of the concert—the fourth of the season—given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, fresh from her triumphs in Berlin, was the soloist. Of the Schubert Company, the adorable beauty of whose thematic riches everybody knows, it need only be said that this work received yesterday the highest possible presentation. Dr. Muck is the high priest of pure music, of the ideally beautiful in music, that connotes no definite dramatic action. No one ever made the instruments of the orchestra discourse more eloquently of the mystery and the deep inmost significance of the ideal tone world.

This was to be felt also in Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." Chiefly through the subtle management of the inner voices, the atmosphere of fateful calm was given, as well as the psychological impression of helplessness. In the latter part of the composition, the realistic devices, the arrival safely in port, were not strongly insisted upon. Dr. Muck always maintains a high plane of interpretations, rarely lending himself to graphic musical description.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria," is an extremely interesting work, to which Dr. Muck has given the most careful study. A great deal of it is not musical thematically and dissonances abound throughout; rhythmic changes are frequent. The use of unusual instruments in solo passages and of unusual combinations of instruments makes it an instructive study in instrumentation. It is a most brillian piece and useful at the end of a program for the revival of flagging interest.

Mme. van Endert sang Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied," and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss; "Es Schankeln die Winds" of Humperdinck and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice is a clear, beautiful soprano, of sufficient vocal power, but of not extraordinary emotional range. Such songs as she sang yesterday are a severe test of emotional power and depth of tonal portrayal. Of these songs her best work was done in the Humperdinck song and in Strauss' "Wiegenlied." The deep intuitional sense and the dramatic power, combined, necessary to a powerful rendering of Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" is rare, and Mme. van Endert gave that song as powerful an interpretation as one hears from any but the greatest of the great lieder singers. She is youthful, and maturity will doubtless bring with it dramatic power and richness of conception.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1914

Boston Symphony Concert.

With Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, the Berlin prima donna, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under the able direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" and "Hungaria," Liszt's symphonic poem, were presented in the usual excellent manner of the noted organization. Mme. van Endert's [illegible] of songs included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," "Wiegenlied," Richard Strauss' "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Es Schankeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice, a pure soprano, is sweet and appealing and furnished rather a surprise to her hearers in the dramatic "Verborgenheit." That she delighted her audience was manifest by the generous applause bestowed.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strong Modern Programme, With Cesar Franck and Strauss for High Lights.

Had Dr. Muck prepared the programme for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Academy last night, for a town which during the week had been deluged with Beethoven, he could not have chosen its numbers more wisely. His programme was wholly modern, but it was modern music of such strength and beauty that it was impressive even to those who had heard the "Eroica" twice within five days.

The backbone of the programme was Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D Minor," which has been played here recently enough so that auditors could get an added sense of its beauty and power through familiarity. Franck was one of those who helped to lead music back to the symphonic form after raids upon all forms had been made by Wagner and Liszt. In this case he led straight back to Beethoven, whom his work suggests, first of all because Franck had something worth saying and then because he said it with clarity and continence. He uses the chromatic harmonies which had been established by Wagner, but not with the extravagance of a revolutionist or for the sake of sensation. It seems difficult to believe now that the Paris of twenty-five years ago could not make anything out of this symphony, but the public attitude was probably greatly affected by worship of Gounod and by a suspicion that anybody whose music did not sound like Gounod must be a worshiper of the hated Wagner. Certainly, Franck does not sound like Gounod, any more than a great organ in the hands of a master sounds like a couple of thrushes lilting from a thicket. But today he does not seem more difficult to enjoy than the thrushes, although far better worth while.

The other big orchestral number was the "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss. Unlike some other of Strauss' symphonic tone pictures the number does not lose its impressiveness by frequent repetition. There is nothing new to be said about this titanic picture of the struggle of man with death. It is so elemental that its hold on the imagination does not relax, however often it may have been heard. The performance last night would have been amazing had audiences not long ago ceased to be amazed when Dr. Muck does almost unheard-of things with his band of virtuosi. The call which brought the men to their feet to acknowledge the applause was richly deserved.

At the close. Dr. Muck played the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," simple, homely, red-blooded music and well calculated to bring the audience down from transcendental clouds and send them home happy with their feet firmly planted on the icy pavements.

The soloist was Elisabeth van Endert, a German singer new here, whose songs were all modern and most of them highly attractive, notably an exquisite "Cradle Song," by Humperdinck, the familiar "Cradle Song" of Strauss and Retirement," by Hugo Wolf. "Strauss' "Caecalie" and D'Albert's "Hymn to Venus" were less successful. Mme. van Endert has a good voice, especially in its lower range, and she sings sympathetically and with excellent phrasing and diction. Some of her upper tones where she pushed her voice for volume were hard, but the sympathetic quality of her singing atoned for defects which it could not conceal.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 21 1914

FIVE SYMPHONIES WITHIN ONE WEEK

Boston Orchestra Third to Be Heard at Academy Since Last Friday.

EXCELS IN FRANCK NUMBER.

Mme. von Endert, of Berlin Opera, Is Soloist.

Housing five symphony concerts within one week is the newest achievement of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is surely a record for this borough, and there is no doubt that it is sufficiently impressive to allow artistic Brooklyn to look the rest of the world square in the eye. Last evening's appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth of the season's series, was the brilliant climax of all of this activity. It followed the young people's concert of the New n; the Philharmonic Sunday tinee and the two first events of Damrosch Beethoven festival, nday and Thursday.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra wish for no better fate than to judged by its interpretation and dition of Cesar Franck's symny in D minor, which opened last ning's programme. In apprais the value of this musical organiion's work one cannot get far ugh away from the general faith the belief that it is the best orstra in the country, perhaps in world, and that to criticize it ld be a heresy. But one may pare the recent achievements of Dr. Muck's band, even including the onderful Mozart number of last nonth's concert, and the Franck symphony, like Abou Ben Ezra's name, will surely head the rest.

The Bostonians are tone-specialists, just as the Stransky orchestra, heard here Sunday, excels in warmth and snap, as witness the justice done to the Brahms Hungarian dances at that matinee. The Franck symphony has more lilting, moving melodies than the most pretentious Viennese operette; more pleasing harmonies than the Italian or eary Wagnerian opera makers could command, yet with all its abundance of tune rhythm and blending of orchestral voices it forces upon the hearer the consciousness of a master hand at work on the technical problems of the symphony. The third movement combines motives from the first and second with its own new phrases in a way to command admiration for the mere mathematical excellence of the method. Through all of its intricacies run those splendid melodies, particularly one song that recurs in the first and third numbers. The instruments of Dr. Muck's faithful band sang out eloquently in these passages, equally inspiring when the brasses were harmonizing in fortissimo and when strings and harp were being plucked with feathery touch in the scherzo.

Many thought the Strauss number the most important last night. This was the tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." A young woman was added to the ranks of the orchestra, playing a second harp. When occasion came for the two harps to be heard the pair of artists might as well have been pantomimists, for the noise from the brasses was enough to drown six instruments such as theirs. But the tone-poem is a remarkable piece of imagination, and at its close last night the orchestra arose to acknowledge the applause. Its best moments were in the crescendo passages at the close, denoting deliverance and final transfiguration.

The orchestra closed the evening with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." Soloist of the concert was Elisabeth von Endert, from the Berlin Royal Opera, a singer of German lieder. Her selections were a song by Hugo Wolf, two by Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie"; a Humperdinck cradle song and the d'Albert "Hymn to Venus." Some of these selections have been included in Brooklyn concerts by Slezak, Schuman-Heink and others. The d'Albert number was Mme. von Endert's best. She is a young woman of pleasing personality and a winning manner, with a wealth of fresh, clear voice. The audience gave her a warm reception, and her art proved as welcome as any sort of music following closely upon the glorious Franck symphony could be.

The orchestra played last night without the services of its concertmaster, Anton Witek.

[127]

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date

FUTURIST MUSIC LED BY DR. MUCK

Beethoven and Strauss Making Their Way Slowly Among a Blinded Populace.

WHOLE DAY OF GOOD MUSIC

Calls for Tauscher at Metropolitan in Evening and Russian Opera in the Afternoon.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

New York enjoyed a thoroughly musical Saturday. "Boris Godounoff" was sung at the Metropolitan Opera House in the afternoon and "Die Walkuere" in the evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck and explained with a detail almost Germanic by Dr. Davis Hale, paid its antepenultimate visit to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The word antepenultimate, while perfectly correct, is used in a spirit of egotistical and emulatory raillery to prove to Dr. Philip Hale, who is the musical Porson of the age, that he is only a minor member of an interlocking directorate controlling the raw material of a sesquipedalian vocabulary.

The programme contained three numbers and the house contained every one it could. There is no nonsense of patriotism or parochialism about the New York amateur of music. Apparently his spirit is sufficiently proud, rebellious and Satanic to prefer good music to bad.

The three numbers in question were the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This was done partly in honor of Dr. Alexander Konta.

I suppose it would be incorrect to class the Fifth Symphony and the Strauss poem together as Futurist music. Perhaps "Presentist" would be the correct term, though the present is only a second and the future lasts forever. It may be also incorrect to mention Beethoven and Strauss in the same breath. But they have this in common, that they affect the few, the very few, natural souls that take the trouble to listen to them.

Beethoven and Strauss Linked.

Perhaps, in the future, Beethoven and Strauss will attain a general contemporaneous celebrity equivalent to that of Dr. Jack Johnson, the brumous gladiator, and Dr. Daniel Maher, the eminent competitive equestrian. This is another reason why the epithet "Futurist" may be applied to Beethoven and Dr. Strauss. Dr. Marinetti, the head pilgrim of the Futurists, might discover still another. Society, he might urge, has not yet "taken up" Beethoven. Beacon Hill is still a bit frigid, and Fifth avenue almost indifferent. But think of Dr. Uriel; Dr. Davis Hale has done a doughty and worthy action in publishing Dr. Hector Berlioz's eloquent and imaginative description of the Fifth Symphony.

There has been much braying and twaddling about what painters call "the literature" of the symphony, that is to say, its influence on the emotions and imaginative, rather than its purely musical construction and aesthetics. One genius discovered in a characteristic phrase the notes of the oriole. He would have found frogs in "Hamlet." I reproduce some of the remarks of Dr. Berlioz, because it is always attractive and valuable to read the opinion of one artist upon another. Moreover Dr. Berlioz was what very few musicians have been—a man of cultivated intellect and wide reading. The leisure hours of his boyhood were passed in reading Virgil; his early manhood in studying Shakespeare, and his riper years in quarreling with an Irish actress. Nothing is so broadening.

Read What Dr. Berlioz Sayeth.

Here it is: "The first movement is devoted to the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul, a prey to despair; not the concentrated, calm despair that borrows the shape of resignation; not the dark and voiceless sorrow of Romeo who learns the death of Juliet, but the terrible rage of Othello when he receives from Iago's mouth the poisonous slanders which persuade him of Desdemona's guilt. Now it is a frenetic delirium which explodes in frightful cries; and now it is the prostration that has only accents of regret and profound self-pity."

Dr. Muck's interpretation was excellent, though we have heard the last movement played with more fire—and by himself. The stormy, sullen and painful scenes of "Death and Transfiguration" were energetically rendered, and it is difficult to understand why the Pastists were unable to recognize its genius when it was first played. Perhaps it was because their brains were full of oratorios and cheese mites.

"Boris" Powerful and Picturesque.

There is little left to be said of the Russian opera "Boris Godounoff" save that it is one of the most powerful, picturesque and new-sensed operas we have had in years. The choruses are the vertebrae of the work, and they were rendered with amazing spirit. M. Gatti-Casazza and M. Toscanini have had more success in mounting it than most operatic managers have had in spelling it.

"Die Walkuere" was given in the evening with Madame Gadski, the undoubted Ring-mistress; Mme. Olive Fremstad, M. Carl Joern, M. Weil and Mr. Ruysdael. Dr. Alfred Hertz conducted. The enthusiasm at the end of the second expressed itself in loud calls for "Dr. Tauscher."

ERALD
Washington, D. C.
FEB 18 1914

MUSIC LOVERS HEAR BRILLIANT CONCER

Boston Symphony Orchestra Giv Fourth Program of Season at New National Theater.

MME. VAN ENDERT SOLOIST

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was the chief orchestral piece of the concert—the fourth of the season—given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, fresh from her triumphs in Berlin, was the soloist.

Of the Schubert Company, the adorable beauty of whose thematic riches everybody knows, it need only be said that this work received yesterday the highest possible presentation. Dr. Muck is the high priest of pure music, of the ideally beautiful in music, that connotes no definite dramatic action. No one ever made the instruments of the orchestra discourse more eloquently of the mystery and the deep inmost significance of the ideal tone world.

This was to be felt also in Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous ~~Voyage.~~" Chiefly through the subtle management of the inner voices, the atmosphere of fateful calm was given, as well as the psychological impression of helplessness. In the latter part of the composition, the realistic devices, the arrival safely in port, were not strongly insisted upon. Dr. Muck always maintains a high plane of interpretations, rarely lending himself to graphic musical description.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria," is an extremely interesting work, to which Dr. Muck has given the most careful study. A great deal of it is not musical thematically and dissonances abound throughout; rhythmic changes are frequent. The use of unusual instruments in solo passages and of unusual combinations of instruments makes it an instructive study in instrumentation. It is a most brillian piece and useful at the end of a program for the revival of flagging interest.

Mme. van Endert sang Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied," and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss; "E Schankeln die Winds" of Humperdinck and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice is a clear, beautiful soprano, of sufficient vocal power, but of not extraordinary emotional range. Such songs as she sang yesterday are a severe test of emotional power and depth of tonal portrayal. Of these songs her best work was done in the Humperdinck song and in Strauss' "Wiegenlied." The deep intuitional sense and the dramatic power, combined, necessary to a powerful rendering of Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" is rare, and Mme. van Endert gave that song as powerful an interpretation as one hears from any but the greatest of the great lieder singers. She is youthful, and maturity will doubtless bring with it dramatic power and richness of conception.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
FEB 18 1914
Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

